"The Review . . . is destined, we are sure, by its sanity and its wit to a long and prosperous career. It has been a cause of keen regret to many English readers that the once famous New York Nation, which used to reflect the spirit of New England, has become openly pro-German, pro-Bolshevik, and anti-English, while the New Republic, which was started some years ago to compete with the Nation, has also displayed a curious partiality for the Germans and Bolsheviks, though it is less hostile to this country. We are pleased to find the genuine American note sounded in the Review, as it is in the Bellman of Minneapolis, the Villager, and, of course, in the popular illustrated weeklies. It is highly important in these days that the educated public here should study the development of American opinion, and the Review will, we believe, represent the real America and not the wealthy little cliques which are more at home in Berlin or Moscow than in New York or Boston or Washington.—From the (London) Spectator, June 14, 1919.

On the bare announcement of the publication of THE REVIEW, many hundreds of annual subscriptions were received even before the first issue went to press. A magazine dealer of forty years' experience has described as unprecedented the welcome thus accorded this publication.

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 13

New York, Saturday, August 9, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	265
Editorial Articles:
The Country and the Brotherhoods	267
Bernhardi Carries on	268
American Finance and World Restoration	269
A Sweetly Reasonable Anarchist	269
Art Homeward Bound	270
American Gardens Threatened	271
Capitalism and the Proposed Alternative. By W. J. Ghent	272
Why is Kolchak Attacked? By Jerome Landfield	273
Post-War Education. By A. G. Keller	275
Herman Melville. By Frank Jewett Mather, Jr.	276
Correspondence	278
Book Reviews:
The Tariff and World Commerce	280
Possession, Psychic and Spiritual	281
The Fight for Reform	282
The Run of the Shelves	282
Plays Indoors and Out. By O. W. Firkins	283
A Living Poet of Greece. By Aristides E. Phoutrides	284

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

THE question of the treaty and the League has suffered a sudden eclipse. At both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue, and everywhere throughout the country, the railroad issue has taken the centre of the stage, with labor troubles of many kinds and the problem of the high cost of living playing the part of a good second. In this new situation, the exponents of every view of the ratification question are looking about to find strategic advantage. But it is to be hoped that something more useful is also going on. The interval of inertia in the League contest might easily be availed of to shorten rather than lengthen the agony of cross-purposes. While economic and social issues are in the spotlight, intelligent leaders could, if they but understood their duty and their opportunity, quietly mature a final and reasonable programme. Just before the injection of the new issues into the field, the possibility of such an achievement seemed brighter than at any previous time. Seven Republican Senators of weight and standing had started a process which gave promise of resulting in just that kind of reconciliation of apparently conflicting views which the case has all along demanded. To dispose of the treaty promptly is no less important to-day than it was ten days ago. The urgency of it is out of sight for the moment, but is sure to emerge again into the public consciousness before long. Is it utterly impossible for the leaders, and the great body, of the Republicans in the Senate to rise to the manifest requirements of the situation?

"I DON'T know of a Government-owned plant that produces more than two-thirds efficiency, and there are numerous examples much below this line." Coming from Chairman Hurley of the United States Shipping Board, on the eve of his retirement from that post, this verdict has unusual weight. And it is all the more impressive from the care Mr. Hurley takes to make it plain that he has no fault to find with the men who were associated with him in the vast undertaking of which he was the head. He found loyal coöperation on all sides—the public officials, the heads and managers of private concerns under government control, and the workmen employed, did all that could be expected. What was wanting was that force that keeps costs down, which is constantly operative under private ownership—the inevitable connection between good management and business success. "Special appeals," says Mr. Hurley, may "for a short time" take the place of that incentive of profit—or survival—which puts life into private management; but sooner or later the efficiency of the substitute disappears. The difference between the two kinds of stimulation, we take it, is a psychological one of fundamental nature. The motive of profit, or business survival, keeps a man's energy tense while not requiring him to be keyed up to any high state of moral tension—a state which, in time of crisis, bears him up as nothing else can, but which, except in extremely rare individuals, can not be maintained day after day and year after year.

JUSTICE NEWBURGER'S decision to stand for reelection against the candidate chosen by the Tammany boss is of even more interest this year than the like event would have in ordinary times. At all times Tammany's command of judicial nominations has been one of the touchstones of good citizenship in New York. From that undisputed sway which the organization and its bosses had in the days of Tweed, its power in this field has dwindled, until for some decades it has been confined within narrow limits. The renomination of a man like Justice Newburger has come to be regarded as a matter of course, and not only the nomination, but the election, of such a man has been a foregone conclusion, because of the practice of endorsement by the Republicans, which has in a large measure taken New York City judgeships out of partisan politics. Murphy has chosen this particular moment to defy public sentiment, possibly counting on Justice Newburger, who is only four years from the legal date of retirement, not having enough personally at stake to be willing to take up the gauntlet. In doing so, he is performing a high public service, and the first reaction to his announcement appears to be a state approaching panic in the Murphy camp. It remains to be seen whether the public will do its duty and justify the boss's alarm. What tells in favor of Tammany in the impending contest is the overwhelming mass of public questions of the most vital character which are absorbing the attention of the community. It will be most interesting to see whether in the face of all this tumult the simple duties of old-fashioned citizenship will successfully assert their claim. A signal victory in this matter will mean much for the general idea of civic soundness, as well as for the immediate issue of a judiciary free from Tammany's dictation.

THE Chamberlain-Kahn bill for army reorganization has much to recommend it. It provides for a rather small regular army, 225,000, with whatever reserves can be obtained by volunteering. All physically fit male citizens, with the usual exemptions, between 18 and 20 years old are to be required to pass six months of army or naval training. By special exemption, the required training may be taken later, but not later than 26. These trained men may volunteer into the army or navy reserve, in which case they are for five years answerable for three weeks of training each year. If voluntary enlistment should ever fail to maintain the army and navy at the peace figures, the deficiency may be made good by draft from the six-months men. What is proposed is a modification of the Swiss plan, universal training being the central idea. No healthy young man will be required to give more than six months to military training, but he will be encouraged to enlist in the reserve. The plan has the approval of the National Training Camp Association and doubtless represents General Wood's ideas of what is practical in reorganizing our military system. Detailed discussion must await Congressional developments.

AMENDMENTS to the Army court martial code forbid the reviewing authority to increase a penalty imposed by the lower court, or to reverse a finding of not guilty on any charge. Enlisted men are allowed to employ civil counsel at their own expense. For the layman we may recall that every court martial case is twice judged, once by the original court martial and finally by the authority that constituted it. The new regulations somewhat diminish the power of the reviewing authority and similarly strengthen the hands of the court of first instance. Very little practical difference will result from the changes. The reviewing authority almost invariably acts in the direction of clemency, and such an act as sending a case back for retrial and heavier penalties is extremely rare. Rather few enlisted men will want civil counsel. The new regulations chiefly bring into the code the principle that a man may not be put twice in jeopardy for the same offense. As an answer to the exaggerated agitation for tearing up the historic code this revamp is adequate. The reform expresses the judgment of the professional army that the court martial code is good, but was badly administered during the war. Here comparative statistics are eloquent. The army (Col. Ansell's figures) court martialed one man in twelve, the navy one man in seventy-five. The codes are virtually identical in the two services.

BY salving the sunken German ships, England raises an interesting point in law and policy. An abandoned, and all the more a sunken, ship is anybody's ship. It belongs to the first salvor whose grapnels seize it. Hence the problem of the disposition of the German fleet becomes a simple one. Whatever hulls England chooses to raise henceforth will fly the cross of St. George and St. Andrew. We do not see that the most apprehensive American patriot needs to protest at this turn of naval events. The German ships, so highly is naval warfare now specialized, are rather trophies than reinforcement of the line of battle. The law of findings keepings may not work theoretical justice, but the ships are in hands that will not abuse them. What is amusing, and perhaps instructive, in the close of the incident at Scapa is the outcome of the German attempt to spite the English. Here at least is poetic justice, even if the treacherous scuttlers are left at large to be punished only by a contempt seasoned with ridicule.

WHETHER a real anti-tobacco crusade is on or not, it is somewhat difficult at this moment to make out. But there is no inherent improbability in the report, except possibly as to its following so close upon the heels of the Eighteenth Amendment. Accordingly, it is possibly not too soon to point out a few features of the situation with which such a crusade would have to deal. In the first place it would have no barriers to overcome in the shape of an established regard for State rights, for local autonomy, or for the rights of minorities. All that was swept away, like chaff before the wind, in the onrush of the movement for national prohibition of alcoholic drinks. That the idea of personal liberty has suffered complete eclipse would be perhaps too much to say, but surely it has shown but the feeblest capacity to assert itself. Unless a reaction in public sentiment should take place, the fight on tobacco, if it should actually come on in earnest, will be concerned with a mere calculation of specific losses and gains.

It will be shown that a vast amount of money is spent upon tobacco and that the nation's life and efficiency can be sustained without the use of the weed, thus making all this enormous expenditure a dead loss. That the loss is cheerfully incurred by each individual spender has nothing to do with the case. If the tobacco money were translated into food and clothing, the community as a whole, it will be triumphantly argued, would be vastly better off. As regards the gains and losses from a more human standpoint, it may be argued in behalf of tobacco that while it may be highly wasteful there do not result from it the horrible consequences which attend upon excessive drinking; but on the other hand, neither do the joys of tobacco play a part in social and personal life anything like so important as that which has been played by temperate drinking throughout the entire period of recorded history. The abolition of smoking will not be acclaimed by anybody as the one thing needful for the extirpation of vice, crime, and wickedness generally; but neither will its abolition make anything like so radical a change in ordinary human life as the abolition of drinking. If, then, we no longer care anything about local self-government, and care next to nothing about the principle of personal liberty, there doesn't seem to be any very convincing reason why tobacco should not go the way of its elder brother.

DR. JOHNSON'S growl about patriotism has been bandied about a good deal of late without any clear indication that its users were aware of what he meant by it. Like the man who refused to believe in the Bible because of its manifest absurdity in insisting that the voice of the turtle could be heard in the land, they have rashly jumped to the conclusion that by patriotism Johnson meant exactly what they would vaguely and variously understand it to mean. But Johnson meant by it something quite definite. "Patriotism," he burst out in a determined tone, "is the last refuge of a scoundrel." To Johnson and to his hearers patriot was a perfectly understood term of reproach; in a later edition of the Dictionary Johnson wrote: "It is sometimes used for a factitious disturber of the government." Wilkes, who has recently been trotted out to display his martyr's crown to the edification of the Twentieth Century, was in Johnson's meaning a "patriot," and his adherents were even more "patriotick"; for, as Wilkes was anxious to explain, he was no "Wilkite." Other times, other manners. People nowadays are less at pains to assume a virtue if they have it not; they are more willing to set up an ersatz-virtue—philosophical anarchism, or internationalism, or pacifism. But there can be no doubt whom among us Dr. Johnson would to-day regard as perfectly fulfilling his definition.

IT is not surprising that many should now begin to desire that our dead be brought from France and restored, however pitiful a fragment, each to his family. It is a very primitive and human yearning, one not rudely to be brushed aside; yet those who feel it might well consider whether their desire is at the moment wholly wise and reasonable. Many, we know, are hardly capable of reasoning in a matter like this; their instinct rises from strata that were laid down in our common humanity before reason began to work. To such, an idle cenotaph is a mockery, a shrine without its relic to heal and console. Yet to satisfy, and by no means surely or with a complete and lasting satisfaction, this instinctive desire to live amidst our own dead, consider what must be done. The kindly reticence of many thousand graves must be invaded, their pathetically broken yieldings carried through a land burdened already to the breaking point with a grievous sense of loss, subjected to all the restlessness and uncertainties of the ocean, and here distributed from one end of the country to the other. No, particular disappointments would be too many, and the general indignity of the proceeding too painful, to admit of it. Roosevelt spoke wisely: "In the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be." And the place is worthy of them. By the side of comrades with whom they shared the great vision of life and death, in the fields which their blood shall serve again to make beautiful, their simple monuments lovingly tended for all time and hallowed by the reverent visitings of a whole world, let them rest in proud tranquillity. Let us leave them there with their enduring glory.

CITIZENSHIP in a democracy is a great and glorious privilege, no doubt, but it involves so much responsibility that the common man, if he realizes his limitations, must feel quite unequal to the task. Consider, for example, the duty of keeping posted on the questions of the day—the League of Nations, intervention in Russia, the Shantung concessions, government ownership of railways, domestic and foreign trade, the management of the world in general. Consider the time it would take to read up on the least of these "social problems," for, if we may believe the scholars, the reading of a dozen books and fifty magazine articles would only give a beginning of knowledge—not light, but only darkness visible. So the case is hopeless, unless the citizen can himself drink deep of the Pierian spring or keep in constant communication with those who do. Such considerations as these should make the citizen realize that it is just as democratic to follow as to lead. In certain fields this democratic humility has already been attained. No layman pretends to original views on questions of mathematics, chemistry, physics, and other relatively exact sciences, except a few paranoiacs who have squared the circle, invented perpetual motion, or discovered that all animals were vegetarian before the fall of man. In the fields of political and economic science the case is otherwise, for there important interests are in conflict, sympathies are involved, doctors differ, authority is despised, and there is such a riot of loud-mouthed opinion that the still, small voice of truth can scarcely be heard. And yet, in a time of great emergency and danger men instinctively crave some form of authoritative guidance.

"SPEED up production" is so much the cry of the hour that even the British poet laureate becomes a target for the shafts of Parliamentary wit. The raw material is supplied him—England's part in the war, triumphantly concluded; he has been paid his salary; where is the finished product? Where are the battle songs? Where the odes to peace and to the League of Nations? Does the excellent Dr. Bridges realize the transcendent importance of his position? As Fletcher of Saltoun said, "Let me make the songs of a nation and I care not who is Food Director or Home Secretary." One facetious member asks whether the cash payment made to the Laureate might not be once more recomputed for the traditional butt of Canary wine. Perish the thought! Better to be a butt than, in these days, to draw inspiration from one. In short, they dare the poor man to produce something—anything. It isn't fair. Dr. Bridges is a scholar and a gentleman, a poet of taste, if of no greater enthousiasmos. He can cite excellent authority for an incumbent of his position writing nothing at all, just as he can point to the horrible example of those who wrote too much, even in days when to write a pretty good poem was about equivalent to writing a pretty good sermon. If this sort of thing keeps on, the unhappy poet will be driven to eat his laurel wreath and go mad. Some seem to regard this eventuality as highly desirable. Like Orpheus, harried and torn by the mad women of Thrace, the head of the disjected poet might not remain, it might become, vocal.

The Country and the Brotherhoods

THE plan proposed by the four Brotherhoods of railroad employees for national ownership and coöperative control of the railroads has been put forward with great suddenness. Nevertheless it demands and will receive the most serious and concentrated attention of the public as well as of Congress. The questions which it raises are of the most profound and far-reaching importance, and will be considered from every possible point of view. But, profound and vital as is the issue in itself, a still more vital question confronts us on the very threshold of the discussion. It is a question transcending that of railroad status or management, transcending the claims of labor and the interests either of capitalists or of consumers in the economic effect of what may be done or left undone in regard to the railroads. What has to be settled from the very start is whether Congress is going to be a free agent in dealing with incomparably the most momentous question—other than one involving the preservation of the nation itself—that it has ever been called upon to decide. The charge that the Brotherhoods are "holding up Congress and the Government" has been promptly denied by them in a formal statement; let every Congressman and every right-minded American citizen see to it that the denial is made good. Here is a proposal the adoption of which would mean a permanent and basic change in the entire economic structure of the nation, a change inevitably involving also the most far-reaching effects upon government itself. To pass upon it otherwise than deliberately, and according to the best judgment of the people's representatives, would be a gross betrayal of the country. Whatever else may be doubtful in regard to public sentiment on the question, it is absolutely certain that a manly assertion of Congressional independence would be met with the enthusiastic applause of the nation.

Coming to the proposal itself, one can in a brief space take up but a very small part of the questions it raises. Among the foremost of these must be counted the question whether the plan is calculated to accomplish the object which is put forward as the immediate occasion for the demand. That demand was made at this particular moment on account of the assumed impossibility of meeting in any other way the difficulties presented by the high cost of living. The raising of wages, the Brotherhoods say, can effect nothing, because it is immediately counterbalanced by increased prices due to that very raising of wages. Their plan, on the other hand, they claim, will keep costs down. The workmen, being given a share in any surplus of revenues over expenditures, will be interested in reducing costs through increased efficiency; and it must be admitted that the share they propose to themselves in the surplus is a most reasonable one—being limited to five per cent. of the gross operating revenue. The full argument by which this scheme is to be supported has not yet been presented to Congress or to the public; but on its face there does not seem to be anything in the scheme to warrant the expectation that it will keep down costs. Obviously, the interest of the workmen in increased wages will be far greater than their interest in the five per cent. dividend. The gross operating revenues of the railroads are now in the neighborhood of $5,000,000,000 annually, five per cent. on which is $250,000,000. This amount divided among upwards of two million employees would give them not much more than $100 each, and it is not for increases of thirty or forty cents a day that the great fights of the railroad organizations in these times are carried on. Moreover, that limit once having been reached, the only thing left to do would be to strike, as of old, for higher wages. The coöperative or profit-sharing idea is, in itself, excellent. Presented on its merits as a separate proposition, it would be entitled to most favorable consideration; but as a solution of the cost-of-living question it appears to offer nothing of substantial value.

It is further most important to observe that, whatever advantages the principle of participation in surplus revenue may present, either to the employees as such, or to the public as interested in efficiency and economy, it is in no way bound up with nationalization of the roads. It would be quite as feasible under private ownership, and it is essential that the country be not stampeded into acceptance of Government ownership upon the plea of its being necessary for this purpose. The interest of stockholders in keeping down costs is of a radically different kind from that which the employees would have under this proposed five per cent. arrangement. The whole dividends of all the railroads of the country amount to less than ten per cent. of the operating revenues, and accordingly a matter of five per cent., or even much less than that, is of vital importance to every stockholder. This it is which gives the spur to efficient railroad management under private ownership; whereas under the Brotherhoods' plan, not only would the absence of a surplus be on its face of comparatively little importance to those in control, but there would remain the Fortunatus's purse of the public treasury to draw upon by special legislation.

In the case for the scheme as presented by the Brotherhoods, it is assumed not only that the present high level of prices will be maintained permanently, but that it is sure to continue to rise indefinitely and without limit. For this assumption there is no sound basis. No one can confidently predict the course of prices, but there is quite as much reason to suppose that in the natural course of things they will in the near future begin to decline as that they will continue to rise. As it is all more or less matter of conjecture, this might have no important bearing on the impending discussion, were it not for the circumstance that in attempting to rush legislation by whip and spur the assumed certainty of indefinitely continued rise of prices will be worked to the utmost. Among the many things upon which it will be necessary to keep our heads level, this is by no means the least important. To give in to the demand for the adoption of a policy to which only yesterday it was generally admitted that the whole country was opposed, on account of the sudden discovery, for which no rational ground is assigned, that ordinary adjustments of wages are henceforth impossible, would be the height of fatuous folly.

The Brotherhoods say that they are not engaged in holding up Congress and the Government. "This appeal," they declare, "is made to the American people direct. It invokes the judgment and common sense of public sentiment, of all the public which earns a wage or a stipend." There is one way, and only one, of ascertaining "the judgment and common sense of public sentiment." It is for that purpose that under our system of government elections are instituted. By means of elections, and in no other way, can the nation's verdict be obtained on an issue so serious and of such vital and permanent import to the whole future of the country. In the interval between elections, upon a question on which there has been no popular mandate, nor the faintest semblance of one, the duty of every member of Congress is to act according to the true dictates of his own judgment and conscience. That the members of both houses shall do this, without fear or favor, without calculation of partisan or personal advantage, is all that the country demands. With this the American people will be satisfied; upon anything less than this they will be sure to pass the judgment of a righteous condemnation.

Bernhardi Carries On

EARLY in the Great War the world made the terrifying discovery of General Bernhardi. He had prophesied, perhaps even made, the war. The sensation passed, and General Bernhardi fell to the relative obscurity of Corps Commander, first in Russia and then in Picardy. From his present peaceful retirement under the Riesengebirge he resumes his most successful occupation, that of choragus of all Ancient voices prophesying war.

Nay, he even foretells the particular next war. It is not, as the merely superficial surmise, to be between the United States and Japan. There is neither adequate clash of material interests nor satisfying promise of a real military conclusion. Neither nation can beat the other, then why should they fight? No, the war of the future is to be between the United States and England. Against that Tag we must cherish a by no means unfriendly Germany to be our European bottle-holder.

General Bernhardi takes pains to explain that he is not trying to stir up enmity anywhere, he is merely doing a plain duty as predictor of inevitabilities. He wishes ill to nobody, his fighting days are over. His voice and pen are engaged in the interest of humanity to let humanity know the worst. What is impressive in the attitude is its old-fashioned grace. Bernhardi must be pretty nearly the last leaf on the mechanistic tree, and he is cheerful in his isolation. He still holds, in the face of recent facts, that the fates of nations are mechanically determined. National free will, national morality are snares of the lexicon; the reality is national egotism, an incontinent will to greatness. To have held this view thirty years ago was to espouse the fashionable commonplaces of philosophy; to hold it now is as heroically idealistic as wearing a Websterian beaver hat and swallow-tail coat in daylight.

The quaintness and pathos of the view almost inspire respect. It is so neat, so self-sufficient, so regardless of the millions that lie in untimely graves and of the tens of millions of mourners that go about our streets. They occur, says Bernhardi, it is deplorable, but the formula requires it. The formula is, in simplest terms, that if two locomotives manned by blind and deaf engineers approach on the same track there must some time be a head-on collision, in which the weaker mechanism will get worst smashed. Nations are like that. They must advance, they will clash. Foresight is limited to making good provision for the collision.

Here is perhaps the logical weak spot in the formula. No nation, to continue our similitude, can be foreseeing enough to provide the locomotives with engineers neither blind nor deaf, nor yet to build switches or erect danger signals. To do so might be good for the locomotives, but it would impair the formula. But, lo! one may add unnecessary steel to the locomotive, accelerate its speed, furnish it with spurs and rams, so that when it does crash into its fated opponent it may with least damage to itself do most harm to him. Philosophy permits no benevolent but only malignant precautions. A nation's will to power is unalterable, nothing is controllable by man except the particular tactics by which that will to power shall wreak itself. All this from a benevolent and clever old gentleman sipping his beer sub tegemine, with the midsummer clouds slowly balancing over the gentle undulation of the Giant Mountains.

The human picture is appealing. Is this the Bernhardi at whom we used to shudder? The voice is the same, but how different the effect to-day! Long may he live, keeping the formula warm, venerable gossip of such unsundering survivors as Julian the Apostate, Prince Charlie "the young Pretender," and Parson Jasper, who manfully lived and died in the faith that the world was shaped not like an orange but like a flapjack.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1913, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

American Finance and World Restoration

IN considering the problems of the rehabilitation of Europe's economic life and our relation to them, it is to be hoped that the American people will be at least as much interested in the duty of organized endeavor to meet the need, so strongly insisted upon both by Mr. Vanderlip and Mr. Davison, as they were in the vivid and probably too terrifying picture drawn by the former of the European conditions themselves.

We lack somewhat the historical perspective which would enable us to look upon an after-war situation with the comparative calm that is natural to Europeans. Our own Civil War is just beyond the border of memory for most of us, but some may find something reminiscent in the stagnation of industrial life which Mr. Vanderlip describes. It is easy to forget that through fourteen centuries the nations of Europe have known many periods of apparent general destruction and chaos, disastrous defeats, and triumphs often equally disastrous. They have been many times in a worse plight economically than they are now, their populations more extensively cut down by famine and intestine strife, their lands and industrial equipment more thoroughly laid waste. Yet nothing is clearer in the historical record than the fact of the quick recovery of even the most hopelessly crushed and ravaged. Ten years after the Parisians were dining on rats, and France trampled and despoiled by a relentless victor and torn by internal dissension, the nation had made an industrial gain of fifty-five per cent. and was able to mock with her prosperity the financial indigestion and depression which the billion-dollar indemnity had given Germany. During the Thirty Years' War the population of Germany was reduced from 20,000,000 to 6,000,000. Saxony lost half her people and the rest were burdened with the support of the army with which the Swedes occupied the country. From then to the time of Napoleon the nation was racked by civil strife and repeated devastations of invaders, her population starving amid gruesome horrors that make Mr. Vanderlip's picture of Europe to-day seem sunny and joyous. Yet less than a hundred years later this nation could dare to bid for world domination and could hold practically the rest of the globe at bay for four years.

But every European peace readjustment in the past, as well as our own reconstruction struggle after the Civil War, was almost wholly a local and national process, more or less haphazard. On the other hand, it is clear that the present readjustment, like the war itself, will involve international coöperation on a scale and by methods hitherto undreamed of, and it is here that there is the greatest call for the American imagination and for a constructive national consciousness. Europe will recover from the destruction of this war as she did from the equally paralyzing devastation of the Napoleonic wars a hundred years ago. But while it was then a matter of comparatively little concern to us whether she recovered in ten or fifty years, it is now of vital importance to every American that she recover as quickly as possible. Industrial stagnation in Europe means industrial stagnation here, perhaps on an even greater scale, since our industrial plant has been vastly extended by the stimulus of the war.

Only by some such "capitalization of faith" in the quick recovery of Europe as Mr. Davison calls for, can she and we recover without long and dark difficulty. As a basis, however, for the practical handling of the situation it is evident that we need in the first place a reliable and unbiased survey of the economic needs and capacities of the various nations. We can no longer depend upon each individual nation to take care of itself in coming out of the war chaos, nor can we depend upon the uncoördinated work of individuals or single organizations in this matter, involving, as it does, broad questions of international relations. At present there is little exact information on the financial and material requirements of the old and new nations of Europe. Various governmental and private agencies have, without coördination, submitted estimates of their requirements, making the situation appear worse in some instances and failing to present the needs of certain nations in others.

A second need is for some effective machinery commanding the confidence of all nations for allocating supplies and credit and for arranging the basis of security and the method of distributing the burden of such international financing as this unprecedented situation requires. Only a body of international character and responsibilities similar to and working along the lines of the Inter-Allied Supreme Economic Council, but representing all nations, and not only those of the present alliance, can make such a survey and adequately supervise such machinery. Since the United States will be called upon to furnish the bulk of the supplies and credits it is especially interested in seeing an organization of authoritative character established for these purposes. However constituted, such an organization of the world's recuperative resources is as imperative now as like organization was to the needs of war, and should command the earnest thought of all Americans.

A Sweetly Reasonable Anarchist

"THE Problem of the State" is the title of an editorial "featured" on the cover page of the latest issue of the Nation. Let it not be supposed that it is with any mere fiddle-faddle of improvement or reform that the article is concerned. One may speak of the problem of typhus, or the problem of counterfeiting—things that are not to be regulated or improved, but abolished—and it is in this way that the Nation, from and after August 2, 1919, must be regarded as looking upon the problem of the State. Half disease and half crime, the time has arrived when the human soul is going to throw off the incubus. The duel has begun, and "the ultimate issue is certain and near at hand; the instrument must finally yield to its creator."

Such being the Nation's conviction, we can not forbear to compliment it upon the exemplary patience which it manifests in looking forward to the emancipation of mankind from the miseries of government. By "near at hand" some thoughtless enthusiast might mean a few years, or at most a decade or two; not so this shrewd and sagacious guide. "Philosophic anarchism," he says, "is a creed that postulates too much nobility, too much self-restraint and self-abnegation, in common human nature to be immediately practicable. For many decades (perhaps even a few generations) longer, man must continue to bear as best he may with those accusing symbols of his moral imperfection, the policeman and the soldier." The arithmetic is a trifle puzzling, for it is difficult to see how one can have "many decades" in less than "a few generations"; but that is a detail. The plain fact is that the Nation does not expect to have the moral nature of all men completely perfected, thoroughly saturated with nobility and self-abnegation, in a period less than, say, sixty years, and is prepared to wait as much, we take it, as a round hundred years if absolutely necessary. Whether the editor of the Nation plumes himself on this exhibition of self-restraint, we have no means of knowing; but we think he is quite entitled to be, like the British conqueror in India, astonished at his own moderation.

Nor does this careful and sweet-tempered anarchist fail to make due provision for the guidance of mankind in the interval. "If, then," he prudently reflects, "the State can not at once be dispensed with, the alternative is reform, revision, melioration of the State idea." Just how this is to be accomplished is not, indeed, indicated with any definiteness; but as to the source from which the improvement is to come we are left in no doubt. Just as the end is to be embodied in the moral perfections which are to be the common attribute of all men, so the means by which the end is to be attained are to be the contribution not of some superior mind here or there, but of the common thinking of common men. The Nation quotes the remark of a well-known writer that history is chiefly a record of the failures of government, and solemnly declares that "every good citizen must feel the stigma of that humiliating truth." Just how long it will be before "every good citizen" will feel that stigma as he should, we are not informed; but presumably it will be very soon indeed, for it is under the stimulus of that feeling of burning shame that he is apparently supposed to be stung into immediate action. Once get him going, however, and progress will be rapid:

He [every good citizen] must grapple as best he can with the problem of the State. As a beginning, Thoreau's suggestion is perhaps as good as any: "Let every man make known what kind of government would command his respect, and that will be one step toward obtaining it."

Easy as rolling off a log—what a pity that it has taken the world some thousands of years to think of this simple method of finding forms of government to choose from! The only open question is as to whether the eighty years, more or less, of waiting are to be consumed in discussing these various interesting proposals or in trying them out, one after another.

With so much to praise in the broad lines of the article, it may seem a small matter to point out any special merits in the merely incidental reasoning that occurs in it. Yet there is one point of this kind that is so indicative of the superior mentality of the writer that we can not refrain from dwelling on it. After urging the absolute claims of individual freedom—"not the shadow of freedom but its substance; not political freedom merely, but moral and economic freedom," he exclaims: "If a government can not permanently exist half slave and half free, how much less can a human being!" A knock-down argument against the restraints of authority which has been waiting to be urged these sixty years; for we do not remember this obvious application of Lincoln's famous declaration ever having been made before. The trouble with so many people is that they are slaves not only to the traditions of politics, but to the traditions of logic. When Lincoln declared that the country could not permanently endure half slave and half free, he was talking about two physical halves of the country, in one of which slavery existed and in the other not; a situation which he thought was bound to result, sooner or later, in a decisive trial of strength between the one part and the other, unless the discrepancy was removed. That was just plain ordinary logic; but here we have something that spurns the limitations of logic. Human beings have lived, each separate one of them, "half slave and half free"—in other words at liberty to do as they please about some things and not about others—as long as there has been such a thing as human society; but no human being has consisted of two physically separate parts, one free and one slave, as would be necessary in order to make Lincoln's saying have any bearing whatever upon the case. That is, any bearing according to the principles of rational thinking; but that only shows how necessary it is to abolish not only the laws of society but also the laws of thought.

If there is any fault to be found with this remarkable article, it is that it gives no hint of there being any excuse whatever for the blindness of the past. Mankind has borne so long with the State in spite of "its crimes against humanity," in spite of history being "chiefly a record of the failures of government," so many men accounted among the best and wisest of the race have in all ages looked upon government as the most indispensable agency of human welfare, that it can hardly be supposed that there is no good side to the thing. Far be it from us to defend either intellectual or moral cowardice; but possibly the supporters of the idea of law and government are to be accused rather of a lack of courage than of downright stupidity or absolute moral callousness. What they have done, and what the Nation is too high-minded to do, is to make comparisons not with that perfection which is now seen to be had almost for the asking, but with what mankind has been in the past, and with what, so far as human judgment can discern, it would have been in the absence of law and government. "The failures of government," these old-fashioned people have thought, measure what government has not succeeded in doing, but show nothing about what it has succeeded in doing. If history deals so largely with the failures, it is because the successes, when once firmly established, no longer call for recording—they are taken for granted. When men no longer go armed for self-defense, the fact is never mentioned in the annals of nations; when robber barons no longer levy toll on peasants and burghers, robber barons cease to figure in historic record; when women are safe from violation, when the highways of a whole kingdom are as secure as the centre of its capital city, when justice is meted out equally to high and low—nothing is said about these things. Of course, all that law and government has accomplished for human welfare and human development since the days of the cave-man is a small matter in comparison with that sublimated perfection which the next eight or ten decades are sure to achieve; yet the contemplation of it does afford some slight explanation of the blindness of those who have not yet seen the light that shines on the editor of the Nation.

Art Homeward Bound

THERE is an interesting provision in the Peace Treaty, which gives to Belgium two masterpieces of old Flemish painting owned by the German Government. This is not a restitution. The wings of the "Altarpiece of the Adoration of the Lamb," by the fathers of modern painting—Herbert and John van Eyck—were honestly acquired by the Berlin Museum some ninety years ago. So were the wings of Dirk Bout's famous "Last Supper," painted for the now desecrated church of St. Peter at Louvain, legitimately purchased by the Museums of Berlin and Munich. The reunion of these severed wings to their parent panels at Ghent and Louvain is in no sense a restitution of stolen property. It is partial indemnity for the destruction of works of art in Belgium caused by German ruthlessness.

The transfer very clearly asserts the principle that indemnity for destroyed works of art should be rendered in kind. In most cases no other reparation is possible, since a fine work of art is unique and irreplaceable. There is not money enough in the world to repay the outrage wrought at Reims. A hundred million dollars will not restore her Cathedral to its former beauty. But the city of Reims could be partially compensated for the loss of her chief artistic attraction by receiving, say, all French Gothic stained glass, sculpture, and enamels in German museums. That would make Reims once more a place of pilgrimage for lovers of Gothic art. No mere payment of money would do so.

From the strictly legal point of view it may be noted that to give objects in German museums to communities deprived of their art treasures through German violence would be merely to attach national property for the payment of a national debt. With the former royal collections, the museums are state property. As the particular awards of indemnity are considered, there will be many instances in which German money will not pay the bill Justice demands that in every case where German responsibility is legally shown and money can not pay, reparation should be made in objects of art—in kind. In this regard the Peace Treaty does inadequate justice to Belgium. It does afford a valuable precedent for similar future awards.

In the Treaty with Austria the precedent is considerably extended. The R

American Gardens Threatened

public of Austria agrees to negotiate amicably for the return to their country or origin of "artistic, archaeological, scientific, or historical objects" in the national or crown collections. For a special list of precious objects, including the relics of the Norman kings of Sicily and the Crown Jewels of Tuscany, with Polish and Bohemian archives, a judicial committee of three is to decide. If these objects turn out to have been illegally acquired, they are to be returned to the place of origin. Naturally Austria must give back all works of art seized during the present war. But here the Italians with amazing foresight and energy snatched the more important objects from under the batteries advancing from Caporetto. What is asserted in the Treaty is that exiled objects of art belong where they originated unless very good cause to the contrary can be shown. Evidently a general application of this principle would mobilize the public and private galleries of the world. We have to do, however, with a special case due to recent spoliation. Having certain restitutions to dictate, the Allies simply apply to objects of art the principle of self-determination. No question if the Berlin Van Eycks could speak they would vote to go back to St. Bavon's church at Ghent, and assuredly the insignia of the Norman Kings would prefer to rest within sight of the Matorana and Monreale.

Vienna, when all is said and done, will remain a capital of art. Most of the pictures in her museums go back to the old Hapsburg collections and were legitimately acquired. On the other hand, a proper insistence on reparation in kind may well transfer to Italy certain important pictures now at Vienna. Austria can not repay Venice in money for the shattered splendor of the Scalzo, once painted by Tiepolo, nor yet for the destruction of that rightly named jewel of a church, Santa Maria Formosa. But Austria can and should give to Venice that rarest of Venetian pictures, the Philosophers by Giorgione. That would somewhat make up for the destruction wrought upon Venice by the Austrian airmen.

We believe that as the committees on reparation consider the destruction of works of art, they will constantly be faced with the dilemma of fixing no indemnity or assigning futile damages in money. They will also find the defeated nations very reluctant to add to the indemnities for purposes of artistic reparation. Simple justice will then require that the indemnity be paid in kind from the national art treasures. Thus a general homeward tendency of older art may be merely foreshadowed in the Peace Treaties. As far as such reinstatements are called for by justice, they will be welcome to all lovers of history and art.

IT is not easy to get at the essential merits of the controversy that rages between the nurserymen and the Federal Horticultural Board over a ruling known as Plant Quarantine 37. Protests against it accumulate and the Board rejoins, explains, and scatters "releases" until the literature on the subject has attained formidable proportions. Yet it is a matter which profoundly concerns all lovers of growing things throughout the country, a matter in which they ought to inform themselves with the object of forming some sort of opinion. Briefly, the ruling, which went into effect on June 1, prohibits, with a few carefully guarded exceptions, the importation of all foreign nursery stock. This means that no yew or box or rhododendrons from Holland, no roses of name and pedigree from England, no peonies of the great French hybridizers, to name only a few of the more sumptuous of garden ornaments for which we are almost wholly dependent on Europe, can find entrance into this country. The object of this drastic action is not to exclude the shrubs and vines and trees which have conferred distinction on the recent renaissance of gardening in America; it is to exclude the pests that come with them.

No object, in the abstract, would be more laudable than this. Pests are not pleasant things. Our chestnuts are gone, the poplars, perhaps, are going, the white pine is troubled. The San José scale wrought havoc in our orchards, though the spraying necessary to check it worked to the improvement of fruit crops. Pests uninvited, like the gipsy moth and the brown-tail, or invited, like the grackles and starlings which bid fair to oust the sparrow from his pinnacle of disfavor, have no place in the best of all possible worlds in which we are about to live. The question here, as in so many fields, is not between good and bad; that brings its own answer with it. It is rather to ask whether the guarantee of future immunity from trouble promises to be good enough to compensate for the present sacrifices that must be made. If not, is there any other way to meet the situation?

The picture painted in the publications issuing from the Department of Agriculture is most doleful. The system of foreign inspection established by the law of 1912 has completely failed to cope with the difficulty. Some of the pests defy even the most expert detection in their early stages. Reinspection of importations from Holland, whose system is counted among the best, discloses no less than 148 species of injurious insects. Perhaps it is fair to say that none of these plagues has yet got a foothold in this country. Our real troubles nearly all date back of 1912, and most of these, though not all, had their origin in the Orient. It is plain that even the sweeping action of the Horticultural Board merely reduces, without wholly removing, the danger of introducing unwelcome guests among us; such are not given exclusively to committing their pupæ to nursery stock or the earth about its roots; the burlap of bales, the wood of boxes or crates which enclose quite other merchandise will at once compass their purpose and our ruin. Since Eden, it has proved difficult to keep intruders out of gardens.

In the present controversy neither side can be regarded as unprejudiced. The scientific mind is always a little unscrupulous in cutting its way through the facts of life toward the conclusion of an interesting experiment. Government just now has the feeling that it has a free hand to make a thorough job of ridding the world of all that's wrong with it, with a hint that the action taken was necessary as a war measure, and now that it has gone so far the matter may as well be pressed to the end. The importers and growers, on the other hand, are ready to take some risk rather than see their business crippled. They can hardly lay claim to complete innocence of interested motives, although the campaign carried on by such a paper as the Florists' Exchange is characterized by a genuine desire to discover the course of wisdom. Though warned of the impending fall of the axe, the commercial men do not feel that they were consulted as to where it should fall.

Doubtless with this bit of legislative perfection, as with much else, we shall contrive to get on. Perhaps it will even achieve part of what its proponents claim for it. It may be that it will encourage the development of our native plant resources. It may be that the amateur gardeners of the country will be willing to pay the price necessary to justify in this country the propagating and continued transplanting of yew and rhododendrons. But it is only too apparent that for a long time any man who aspires to a garden must pay a high price for poor stuff. Fortunately the quarantine is subject to future modification; it is not embodied in a Constitutional amendment; it is only a ruling of the Horticultural Board. And surely as time goes on there will be ample opportunity for the experts of the several countries to come together in conjunction with the more far-seeing importers in the hope of finding more and more points at which the ruling may with safety, and with great advantage to our gardens, be considerably modified.

Capitalism and the Proposed Alternative

THERE is an old adage to the effect that however painful it is to be sizzled in a frying pan, a leap into the fire is unlikely to furnish relief. To the collectivist who, though he has no love for bourgeois capitalism, yet clearly sees the evils of Bolshevik sovietism, the aptness of this adage is constantly borne home. He has small desire to exchange a system under which, for all its defects, he has definite guarantees, a wide range of opportunities, and a certain freedom of action, for one under which he would have nothing but the memory of what he had lost.

Yet Bolshevism, or some variant of that political and ethical chaos, is the only alternative to capitalism that is now offered him. All the so-called radicals, of all conditions, from mere left-wing democrats to transcendental super-Socialists, and from "blanket stiffs" to the illuminati of the coteries, unite in singing its praises. Though rival factions quarrel a good deal over its terms and conditions and still more over the manner in which it is to be brought in and the agencies which are to be intrusted with the dictatorship, Bolshevism or near Bolshevism is their common goal. Up to five years ago the official Socialists had an alternative proposal which every collectivist could accept. From a variety of causes, however, these official Socialists have reacted from almost everything for which they stood in the years before 1914, and have now succeeded in virtually identifying Socialism with Bolshevism. Some recent tendencies toward a modification of their attitude are observable; but they have to do with means rather than ends, and they have been forced by the excesses of the dervishes and the impossibilists of the movement. They indicate no fundamental change. And thus, since all radical roads lead to Bolshevism, more than ever before it becomes necessary for the open-minded collectivist seriously to compare the thing that is with the things proposed. On the one hand is the system of capitalism as it obtains in the "bourgeois republic" of the United States. On the other is the set of conditions which prevails in Russia under the rule of Lenin, Trotsky, and Peters, and the proposals advanced by pro-Bolsheviks in this country.

In the first place, capitalism promotes political democracy. No one has shown this fact more plainly than Marx himself. The progress of political democracy has been greatest in the most highly developed capitalist countries. Bolshevism, on the other hand, openly repudiates popular rule. There is nothing novel in the fact that an oligarchy, by whatever name it calls itself, mercilessly uses the bayonet in maintaining its power. The novel thing—the complete break with the past—is found in the attitude toward democracy now held by Socialists and other pro-Bolsheviks. Formerly, with most of these, democracy was a cardinal article of faith. Now it is either disavowed and rejected, or disingenuously explained to mean something other than what they have heretofore held it to mean. The first duty of a proletarian revolution, says Lenin, is to crush out opposition; and where this necessity rules, he further says, democracy can not exist. This doctrine, so brutally frank, is by the more fervent pro-Bolsheviks accepted as holy writ. But it is too strong for the stomachs of many who call themselves Socialists or radical democrats, and so they resort to new interpretations. Democracy, it would appear, is any kind of rule imposed by an oligarchy so long as it is imposed in the holy name of the proletariat; if this be not democracy in perfection it is at least a preparation, and will be complete, pure, and perfect as soon as all its opponents are bayoneted, hanged, or starved to death. It is something less than democracy only because misguided and wicked persons, blind to its blessings, refuse to accept it. This latter view has been developed at length by several Socialist and near-Socialist pundits and appears now to be the most favored one among the moderates. But whatever the angle of view, all the Bolsheviks and pro-Bolsheviks agree that opposition is to be suppressed. Capitalism allows for wide differences of opinion and constructs elaborate machinery for the protection of minorities and for the change of rulers as yesterday's minority becomes to-day's majority. Bolshevism in practice, as well as its sister creeds in theory, protects neither minority nor majority so long as it is in opposition to the régime. All opposition must acquiesce or be blotted out.

In the second place, capitalism does not convict the individual offender by secret accusation but by public trial according to long-established forms. Neither Bolshevism nor any of its sister creeds has any scruples about the means so long as it gains its end. Let it be granted that before our courts there is often found to be one law for the rich and one for the poor; it is certain that in Russia there is one law for the Bolshevik and another for the non-Bolshevik. Granted that in this country we sometimes have a Mooney trial; in Russia all trials are Mooney trials if only the accused is a bourgeois, an intellectual, or a Menshevik; and so they would be in America under any revolutionary group—I. W. W., S. L. P., W. I. I. U., Left-Winger or Right-Winger—that succeeded in bayoneting itself into power. The cynical apologies for terrorism as a means of installing and maintaining the reign of brotherhood, benevolence, and justice, which one now hears on every side, leave no intelligent person a doubt that what has happened in Russia would be wrought out here on a larger scale and with a more ferocious intensity. Let it be further granted that in this country we have outbreaks of lynch law. But in the first place, our lynch law is sporadic; it has not been developed into a system, as in Russia; and in the second place its most typical example—that of the hanging or burning of a negro for rape—has nothing to do with the economic conflict and might conceivably as readily happen under communism as under capitalism. Nothing that our vociferous revolutionists offer us in the matter of the administration of justice is likely to convince others. It is even to be said that these revolutionists do not convince themselves; for there is not a sane one among them who would not, as he reflects upon the animosities of the contending groups, a thousand times rather trust his chances before a tribunal to a capitalist judge than to a revolutionary judge from a rival faction.

In the third place, capitalism permits its opponents to live and move and have their being. Bolshevism, on the other hand, is largely occupied with putting its opponents out of the way; and the pro-Bolsheviks sanction this course as one eminently wise and necessary for the protection of the régime. Under capitalism the antagonist of the government seeks the limelight. Under Bolshevism, unless he can buy immunity, he is more likely to seek an underground cell; and he would be equally self-effacing under a régime of any of the groups that are now clamoring for a proletarian dictatorship. This "bourgeois republic" draws the line at interference with the prosecution of a war and at plotting for a violent overthrow of the government; but outside of these self-preservative restrictions it allows its antagonists an almost unrestrained freedom of speech, press, and assemblage. Of all contradictions in a contradictory world there can hardly be one more absurd than the sight and sound of voluble agitators giving themselves up to every violence of accusation and incitement and in the same breath denouncing the government for its repression; in the same breath, moreover, while denouncing the minor repressions of a democratic republic, excusing and even extolling the major repressions of a usurping oligarchy in Russia. No very lively sense of reality can be predicated of such persons. They see—that is, those of them for whom the rôle is not a mere theatric pose—everything in a distorted perspective. They have fanned their emotions into fanaticism, and as fanatics they see, and feel, and speak.

These are but three instances in a list of comparisons which any sincere and intelligent collectivist can indefinitely extend. Such a one has no need to forget or ignore what he has always regarded as the inherent defects and the attendant evils of capitalism. He has no need to surrender any part of his faith. He may believe as ardently as ever in the ultimate coming of the coöperative commonwealth. He has merely to compare, open-mindedly and point by point, the system under which he lives with what now prevails in Russia and to test the comparison in the light of the utterances of the Bolsheviks and their American disciples. He can not but conclude that the part of wisdom is rather to bear those ills he has than fly to others that he knows too well. Many of these ills, he will see, are remediable ills—amendable or eradicable even under the system which he believes creates them; and he can, in his devotion to the cause of humanity, far more profitably give himself to the common effort toward amelioration than to the countenancing of turbulent and anti-social revolutionism. He may grieve that a fusion of charlatanism and revolutionism has for the time despoiled him of his hopes and that the goal which a few years ago seemed so promising has been pushed back into a future more remote. Yet he can not but see that this flamboyant and corybantic revolutionism is a transitory thing; that it has no roots in the great mass of the people; that it is almost unanimously rejected by labor, which has most to say in the matter, and that its high priests and apostles are for the most part mere dilettanti of the coteries.

And possibly he could further see, if only he might read the inner selves of these revolutionary super-souls, that the goal they profess to seek is not at all the thing they want. Despite the evils they attribute to this bourgeois republic and notwithstanding the blessings they attribute to a Bolshevik régime in another country, they choose to remain right here; while the threat of deportation directed against some of their allies rouses them all to an extreme frenzy. They are, in fact, happiest and most fortunate in their present environment. Bolshevism would prove sorry times for them indeed. For a few of them there might be the brief ecstasy of sharing in the group dictatorship of power; and as they are all idolaters of power for its own sake, the transport and rapture of this experience would be transcendent. But to most of them Bolshevism could provide none of the things which they now lack, and it would deprive them of all that now contributes to the perpetual flood of stimuli so necessary for their life and proper functioning. In no conceivable order of society could they be so favorably placed as in bourgeois capitalism. It can hardly be doubted that in their lucid moments they recognize this fact. It is further gravely to be suspected that with many of them the intensity of fervor for Bolshevism is in direct ratio to the degree of realization that it is unattainable. American Bolshevism can not be sure of its own supporters.

The capitalist order can assuredly draw no plaudits from one who has seen and comprehended the vision of the co-operative commonwealth. But when set off in sharp contrast to the wretched alternative now proposed, it reveals at least an acceptable modus vivendi—a workable means of going on. At any rate it carries a franchise from the majority; it is responsive to criticism; and it maintains itself by a constant series of adjustments to human needs. Bolshevism and its sister creeds base themselves on a terroristic reaction which denies the most primal rights of human beings and asks no other franchise than the bayonet.

W. J. GHENT

Why Is Kolchak Attacked?

In the Review of July 12, I called attention to the malicious misrepresentations of Admiral Kolchak and the Omsk Government contained in an article by Dr. Joshua Rosett in the New Republic of July 9. In answering this attack I endeavored to analyze fairly the character of his argument and explain in detail its bias and falsity. I made no statement that could not be supported fully by reliable witnesses and documents.

In its current issue, the New Republic attempts a rebuttal of my answer, partly by editorial comment and partly by a memorandum by Dr. Rosett. The editorial comment states that "the answer admits the essential charge—that Kolchak crushed a democratic, anti-Bolshevik government in Siberia. It does not deny that acts of cruelty and tyranny without number have been committed by Kolchak and his clique. Mr. Landfield not only corroborates the accusations, but approves of the coup d'état and its methods." It further states that I characterized the Constituent Assembly as Bolshevik!

The best answer to this grotesquely unfair comment is my article itself, from which no such inferences can possibly be drawn. So far from admitting any such charges, I entirely disproved them by reference to the established facts. That the New Republic should seek refuge in such comment is in itself a confession of its inability to meet the facts.

In his memorandum, Dr. Rosett is no more fortunate in putting his case than in his original article. Again he not only falls back on newspaper comment but disingenuously twists it to suit his needs. The main feature of his memorandum deals with the attempted rising of December 22-23, 1918, at Omsk. Not having been in Omsk himself, but three thousand miles away, he makes up a story concerning this affair based upon quotations from the Omsk newspaper, Zaria, which he manipulates rather stupidly to prove his thesis that members of the Constituent Assembly were murdered by Kolchak.

A simple statement of the authentic facts of the rising and of the lynching that followed its suppression will sufficiently indicate the general untrustworthiness and malice of Dr. Rosett's charges. A month before, Admiral Kolchak had been asked to take upon himself the task of reorganizing the government at a time of great crisis. The Avksentiev Directory had not only shown itself utterly incapable of running a government and of forming an army to meet the Bolshevik menace, but its head had been discovered intriguing with Chernov, chairman of the Socialist Revolutionary Committee at Moscow, who had come as an emissary to persuade Avksentiev and Zenzinov to betray their more moderate colleagues and deliver Siberia over to the Soviet Government. They had already started propaganda among the soldiers. At the same time, news of the armistice had come and the Czechoslovaks were planning to withdraw, which, thanks to Avksentiev's incompetence in forming a Russian army, would have left the people at the mercy of the Bolshevik forces.

Kolchak had nothing to do with the coup d'état. Let that be clearly understood. He was at the front when it occurred, returned in response to an urgent telegram, was offered the onerous task of leadership because he was the one man suited to it, and accepted unwillingly, but as a patriotic duty. During the following month there were two plots against him. The first was a monarchist plot. This was discovered and frustrated. The second was a plot of disgruntled Socialist Revolutionaries and Bolsheviks, and resulted in the affair to which Dr. Rosett refers. It was elaborately organized and the conspirators even went so far as to have an office, with typewriters and other equipment.

The insurrection took place as per schedule, but it was quickly put down. One feature of it was the release from jail of the prisoners, both political and criminal. Certain of the prisoners voluntarily returned to their confinement when they saw that the rising had failed. A reactionary officer with a squad of soldiers subservient to him went to the jail, and by presenting a forged order removed several of the prisoners, who were members of the old Constituent Assembly, and killed them. To hold Admiral Kolchak responsible for this lynching, as Dr. Rosett does, is foul slander. The Government deplored this outbreak of mob violence and Admiral Kolchak rose from a sick-bed, where he was lying threatened with pneumonia, to put an end to it and to prevent a recurrence. He had an enquiry instituted at once. The officer and a government official implicated were arrested, tried by court-martial, and shot. When this rising occurred, it must be borne in mind that the new government had been established but a month, that conditions were exceedingly disturbed, and that everybody was fearful lest there should be a return of Bolshevik rule.

Now read the paragraphs from Zaria quoted by Dr. Rosett. They do not only corroborate this true statement of the affair, but they reflect the embarrassment of the Government lest it should be held responsible in the eyes of the world for an act that they would have prevented at all costs. Admiral Kolchak's declaration, thanking the troops and uttering a stern warning against any further uprisings, referred to the quelling of the insurrection and had nothing to do with the lynching. But the gem of Dr. Rosett's collection of misused quotations is the following:

"Why was this done?" asks a governmentally-disposed newspaper. "Is it possible that the members of the Constituent Assembly were murdered with a view to killing the idea of a Constituent Assembly itself?"

The purport is perfectly clear and evident. The editor, probably mindful of the earlier monarchist attempt against Kolchak, ventures this explanation of the purpose of the officer guilty of the crime. Most assuredly he did not imply that this was the purpose of the Government which executed the officer for his crime. Instead, it shows the loyalty of Kolchak to the Constituent Assembly pledge which he had made.

It would seem hardly necessary to advert to Dr. Rosett's other charges. He objects to my characterization of Agareff, whom he speaks of as "the regularly elected Mayor of Vladivostok, a man of great ability, sincere and firm in the performance of his duties." Picture to yourself a corresponding situation in an American city. Imagine a notorious Bolshevik securing for himself a position as Mayor through the franchise of a mob of transient I. W. W.'s, and then resisting the authority of the Federal Government that loyal Americans had set up to restore their country after the chaos wrought by Bolshevism. This was the position of Agareff at Vladivostok. As to Nikiforoff, I have only to refer Dr. Rosett to the criminal records at Vladivostok.

But after all Dr. Rosett is only an insignificant Bolshevik. Under ordinary circumstances his misrepresentations and false statements would scarcely circulate beyond his own radical circles. The significant fact is that the New Republic exploits his story. The editors may, of course, have been taken in by him, but surely it was their duty to make the necessary enquiries concerning his record in America and his record at Vladivostok. The head of the American Red Cross there would have given them information. Further than this, they could have checked his statements by consulting with such men as Mr. John A. Embry, Dr. R. B. Teusler, Lieut. M. P. Cushing, and others, all absolutely trustworthy men with first hand information, men who had observed these things on the spot, and not simply heard about them as gossip three thousand miles away at Vladivostok. Why do the editors feature such tales? Why do they persistently attack Kolchak and Denikin, and advocate dealings with the Soviet tyranny that has killed democracy in Russia? It is for them to answer.

Some months before the outbreak of the Great War there was formed in Berlin an association for influencing the press of other countries. Sir Edward Goshen in February, 1914, reported it as a vast system of international blackmail. It was directed by Harmann, head of the Press Bureau of the German Foreign Office, and participated in by representatives of the Deutsche Bank, the Diskonto Gesellschaft, the North German Lloyd, the Hamburg-American Line, the Gruson Works, the Allgemeine Elektrizitäts-Gesellschaft, the Schuckert Works, Siemens & Halske, and Krupps. There is no space here to enumerate even a few of their known operations or how they acted as a sort of special General Staff to direct the activities of a great organization all over the world that was the complement of Germany's military machine. Many of their operations in Spain, Switzerland, and in Italy have been exposed through treason trials, through the confessions of anarchists, through the discoveries of the secret service. Everywhere they promoted strikes and labor unrest, subsidized socialist and other radical papers, influenced public opinion by the circulation of lies. Their biggest success was in Russia.

But here in America they were no less active. They worked through many groups and in divers ways. First there was the honest pacifist group. Innocent-appearing peace societies were organized. In one instance a fine old Civil War veteran became the president and leading spirit of such a society and did not discover until later that he had been made use of by German agents. Berlin chortled when Mr. Hearst espoused the German cause and began his attacks on England and Japan. Lying tales of Russian atrocities in East Prussia, tales of which the Germans themselves now admit the falsity, were circulated to alienate sympathy from Russia and to offset the authentic reports of German misdeeds in Belgium. Agents were sent among the negroes to stir them up against the whites. Later on these fiendishly clever men seized upon the Zimmerwaldian formula of "No annexations and no indemnities," the secret treaties, and the restatement of war aims as a means of splitting the Allies and confusing liberal thought in America. But these are only a very few of their manifold activities. Their military machine broke down and the war was ended—that is to say, military operations ended. But their propaganda machine is still doing business at the old stand, endeavoring to weaken the application of the terms of peace, and to gain control of the vast resources of Russia.

I have no space to chronicle step by step the campaign they have carried on in our own press. It is enough to indicate the anti-interventionist propaganda, the pro-Soviet propaganda, the "Why are American soldiers in Russia?" propaganda, the "Let the Russians settle it themselves" propaganda. At the present moment it is the anti-Kolchak propaganda. The scheme is clear and simple. If Kolchak and Denikin succeed in their noble and patriotic efforts, the national Russian state will emerge again. It will be directed by Russians and will be friendly to the Allies who helped them. If, on the other hand, this attempt can be killed, then chaos will reign again and the only power left in Russia will be the Soviet Government. The Germans have no illusions as to this grotesque experiment in government, but they have commenced trade with it and they will allow it to continue for a time while they are acquiring from it all possible stocks of raw materials. They know perfectly well that it can not last, but they know that with the fall of the Omsk Government the stock of the Allies in Russia will go to zero. What will happen when Lenin and Trotsky come to the end of their tether? The line is already indicated. It is not likely to be a violent revolution. Already the Soviet Government has departed far from its communist programme and its Marxian theories. The Bolshevik leaders are now chiefly concerned, not with theory, but with the retention of their loot. Already thousands of Russians, despising the Bolsheviks, but hating the Allies for their betrayal of Russia and their treatment of her at the peace table, are working whole-heartedly in the Soviet organization. They do so because they realize that the Bolshevik rule is but a passing phase and they are preparing against the time that Russia will come into her own. The Germans realize this and know that they will be called upon to take part in the work of re-organization. The prize is in their grasp if only the Allies and America continue their stupid policy and let the Omsk Government fail. Why then should they not stir up the workingmen in all the Allied countries to demand that their Governments withdraw from Russia and give no aid to Kolchak and Denikin? Why should they not propose the absurd idea of an immediate Constituent Assembly to undermine Kolchak, just as they harped on the revision of war aims as a means of splitting the Allies? Why should they not attempt to damn Kolchak the Liberal and Patriot, by representing him in their subservient press as an autocrat, a tyrant, and a restorer of Czarism? God grant that America may awake and see the truth before it is too late.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Post-War Education

THERE are those who expect too much from a crisis and talk of a new dispensation or a new world-order; and there are others who are without vision or who close their eyes to the signs of the times and clamor for "business as usual." It is folly to expect too much: the chemical elements of the earth and the laws of physical nature, the mind of man and the character of human nature, are not to be altered by that which, though it looks to the awe-stricken participator like a convulsion, is, in the infinite perspective of things, no more than a flurry. It is the same old world, even after the Great War. And yet it is not altogether the same, either. Things are never the same after such a stirring of what are, to our slight fathomings, the depths. However loud the cry for life-as-usual, life has not been as usual—not then, during the war, and not now, after the war. Indeed, it seems quite safe to assert that one phase of the life of this nation, not to say of human society in general, has passed and another phase begun. Between has lain a transition period, as indefinable as that which separates youth and manhood.

The nation has sensed this change and it is recognized in the much talk about reconstruction. It is as if a great fire had wiped out part of a city and provided a chance for wider streets and better architecture. Or it is as if rigid forms had been broken down and dissolved into wet plaster, capable of being re-shaped, if it can be kept stirred up until we can decide into what new forms to cast it. The idea of reconstruction has been pervasive. There are few social forms that have not been subjected to questioning scrutiny: economic relations, government, religion, even the constitution of the family. But it is the educational system, perhaps, that has come in for the most thoroughgoing criticism and prospective overhauling. This is natural enough if education is to be conceived of as an induction of a new generation into its responsible place in the general social order of the nation.

The crisis past, we naturally prize that which saved us. But what did save us? There has been a test as by fire, and certain sorts of knowledge seem to have come out of it resplendent. Why should we not feel that the next generation must concentrate more attentively upon that which preserved the nation and, indeed, civilization itself? The studies of the future, according to one clear-minded educationalist, are to be the physical sciences with their applications, especially in engineering; the modern languages, particularly those of the Romance group; history; and, perhaps above all, the social sciences.

On the face of it the chemist seems to have emerged from the late ordeal with the greatest acclaim; but he is closely followed by the physicist, the geologist, and all those specialists whose knowledge has made possible the better care of the wounded, the sick, and the undernourished. In this "war of the laboratories" the physical scientists have had their chance to make a demonstration, and they have seized it. Also, the monolingual American has derived from his European contacts the realization that it is well to know another language; and he has come to be enlightened, particularly, as to the utility, present and prospective, of the other great tongue of the Americas. The world has compressed and drawn together during the recent struggle, and language-barriers to free communication, formerly pretty much ignored by us as distant and theoretical, are now seen to be nearer than was thought, and practical. We are more nearly in the situation of the smaller European nations at whose command of foreign tongues we have marveled in the past—we have lost our traditional position of isolation and self-sufficiency, and are crowded together closer upon our fellow nations.

It is not that we propose to practice the vindicated arts of war in preparation for other wars. Those of us who feared the inoculation of our nation with militarism have felt an ever deepening content during the post-armistice period, for if the last half year has shown anything it has shown the nimble recession of the American people from an enforced status of militancy. Chemistry does not possess its undoubted eminence as an indispensable to the art of war; it is cherished because of its promise, more sharply revealed during the exigencies of war, as fundamental for the arts of peace. For through all the ages the arts of war have thus transformed themselves into, or at least have contributed copiously, to the arts of peace.

The claims of history and the social sciences are a little less obvious than those of the physical sciences and the modern languages. It was not alone by our knowledge of chemical formulas, beneficent sera, or the laws of hygiene that we were saved. The faith that engendered morale rested its case upon the repeated verdicts of history and a perspective of the undiverted course of social evolution. This is implicitly recognized in the publishers' lists and in the records of libraries. There seems to be a feeling that we had better know the past life of our fellow nations a little more intimately than we knew that of Germany, and that it is well to understand, in general, how this recent cataclysm came to be. The past has been brought nearer to the present in somewhat the same way as the nations have been thrown into closer proximity; barriers of time as well as of space have become subject to attrition. There is a practical side to all this. The war has revealed to us that there were many economic, political, and social phenomena under our eyes which we did not apprehend or understand, but which ought to have been seen and appraised; as a consequence of the war still other vital questions of the same order challenge us; and now we want the next generation to be better prepared to grasp and deal with them—not in view of war again, but under conditions of prospective peace, and with a view to an enduring peace.

It is doubtful whether any studies can aspire to much prominence unless they are seen to have a practical bearing on the art of living. The race has always been obliged to cultivate utilities, as a condition of existence or of reaching a better existence. The popular studies of any nation have always been those that issued in utilities, or were thought so to issue. But if any one is listing evidences of design in the universe, he should note that studies which are plainly pursued in view of their practical product always carry with them unforeseen influences of a less material order. They both stimulate and satisfy intellectual curiosity, and every one of them leads at length to an insight into the nature of things that fathers sentiments of wonder and awe in the presence of power—of limitless force acting in orderly fashion under all-pervading law. Thus there are no purely practical studies at all; and even if the curricula of the future are to be limited to the subjects of science, language, and history, provided these are really taught and really studied, there need be no misgiving as to irreparable spiritual loss.

There are said to be certain studies which yield the immaterial satisfactions, but do not yield, or do not any longer yield, actual services in the art of living: Greek, for example, or astronomy. This is disputable, of course: if the happiest man is, as some one once defined him, the man with the greatest number of interesting thoughts, then, since no one can very well contend that happiness is not practical, studies like Greek can not be stripped of all utility for the art of living. For certain endowed and fortunate souls these less practical studies will always be the most practical.

But for the average citizen they can not be so. He can not work up into the empyrean because his life is irrevocably concerned with the immediacies. There is no convulsion of society that could conceivably arouse in him a taste for the remoter studies. In general, and more specifically, he gets what can be presented in the public schools, including, if he is better-to-do, the high school. He has always seen the value of the three R's. He has never seen the value of the studies, especially as they have been pursued, that educational reformers and pedagogists (who are not clear in their minds, though enthusiastic with the vision of half-knowledge, and wordy to the hypnotizing of school boards) have succeeded in foisting upon the schools. But now a crisis has revealed a popular interest in certain subjects—disciplines more advanced than the elementary ones, yet with a character sufficiently practical to be practicable. It is the acceptance and development of this lead, vouchsafed by the automatic out-working of things, that is indicated as a policy of educational reconstruction. The list of subjects used as a text in the foregoing may not be exhaustive, but it is typical. The hint is unmistakable to any intelligence not prepossessed: it is time to drop out the educational fads and fancies and to develop those studies interest in which has been evoked by the revelations of the recent crisis.

A. G. KELLER

Herman Melville

(IN TWO PARTS)

MY introduction to Herman Melville is due to Edwin Lucas White, the author of "El Supremo" and of much verse equally notable, if too little known. Amid the rigors of philology, to which we were then both bound, we kept certain private delectations of a literary sort. One afternoon he took me to his study and instead of the expected sonorous passage from Victor Hugo's "Légende des Siècles" he read me the following words out of a stout, shabby, cloth-bound book named "Moby Dick, or The Whale":

To a landsman, no whale, nor any sign of a herring, would have been visible at that moment; nothing but a troubled bit of greenish white water, and thin scattered puffs of vapor hovering over it, and suffusingly blowing off to leeward, like the confused scud from white rolling billows. The air around suddenly tingled and vibrated, as it were, like the air over intensely heated plates of iron. Beneath this atmospheric waving and curling, and partially beneath a thin layer of water also, the whales were swimming.

(Then began the chase)

It was a sight full of wonder and awe! The vast swells of the omnipotent sea; the surging, hollow roar they made, as they rolled along the eight gunwales, like gigantic bowls in a boundless bowling green; the brief suspended agony of the boat, as it would tip for an instant on the knife-like edge of the sharper waves that almost seemed threatening to cut it in two; the sudden profound dip into the watery glens and hollows; the keen spurtings and goadings to gain the top of the opposite hill; the headlong, sled-like slide down its other side—all these, with the cries of the headsmen and harpooners, and the shuddering gasps of the oarsman, with the wondrous sight of the ivory Pequod bearing down upon her boats with outstretched sails, like a wild hen after her screaming brood—all this was thrilling. Not the raw recruit marching from the bosom of his wife into the fever heat of his first battle; not the dead man's ghost encountering the first unknown phantom in the other world—neither of these can feel stranger and stronger emotions than that man does, who for the first time finds himself pulling into the charmed, churned circle of the hunted sperm whale.

The tang of this was unforgettable. That reading made a Melvilleite out of me. I bought everything Melville published—it took me ten years to do it, and my collection was only completed with the two privately printed pamphlets of poems, through the gracious gift of Melville's daughter. I read my collection up and down with increasing delight. Gradually I learned that to love Melville was to join a very small circle. It was like eating hasheesh. Robert Louis Stevenson and Charles Warren Stoddard had given him brave praise. John La Farge told me of meeting in the South Seas two American beachcombers lured towards the Marquesas by the spell of "Typee." La Farge made the charming drawing of Fayaway standing in the bow of a canoe and serving as mast and sail. It was for the ill-fated reprint of "Typee" and "Omoo" edited by the late Arthur Stedman, and I saw another charming Fayaway in clay in the studio of the sculptress, Miss Elizabeth Cornwall. I owe to my enthusiasm for Melville acquaintance with extraordinary persons on both sides the seas; for no ordinary person loves Melville. So on the centenary of his birth it is a double debt of gratitude which I repay most inadequately in giving some account of one of the greatest and most strangely neglected of American writers.

I

Herman Melville was born August 1, 1819, in New York City, of fighting Revolutionary stock on both sides. His paternal grandfather, Major Thomas Melville, had been prominent in the Boston Tea Party. His maternal grandsire, General Peter Gansevoort, made a gallant defense of Fort Stanwix against Burgoyne's army. His father, Allan Melville, was a prosperous merchant in Boston and New York. He himself married the daughter of Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw. His youth was passed in such mansions as he describes in "Pierre"—"an embowered and high-gabled old home." He lived much with his Gansevoort kin at Albany, where he got his schooling, and much at Major Thomas Melville's farm at Pittsfield, "Arrowhead," which Melville himself later owned. Major Melville had lived long in France and retained "a faded brocade of French breeding." Thus young Herman Melville came up a rare combination, a country boy nurtured in good books, gentle manners, and a cosmopolitan tradition. It was a paradoxical fate that led him to pass his young manhood in forecastles, and on Polynesian beaches, and his old age in the obscurity of a New York customs inspectorship.

Like many another well-born lad of the day, Herman Melville chose an adventurous life and went to sea. At eighteen he shipped before the mast for Liverpool, and his experiences later were told in "Redburn." There was an interval of school teaching. Then in January, 1841, he shipped on a New Bedford whaler. Magnificently poetized, his impressions of whaling are presented in "Moby Dick." Disheartened by the brutality and hardship of this life, he jumped ship with a companion "Tony" at Nukaheva. His flight took him to the liveliest vale of the Marquesas, Typee, where he spent four months amid the gentlest of savages. A whaler needing a hand rescued him from this earthly paradise, and Melville soon again took French leave at Tahiti. For months he lived as a beach-comber, and finally shipped on the Frigate United States, reaching Boston in October, 1844, bearing with him quite unconsciously literary treasure trove of purest assay.

Melville repeatedly told the story of his Polynesian days to friends. He was rehearsing his best loved books, "Typee" and "Omoo." By 1845 the manuscript of "Typee" was ready. Melville's brother, Gansevoort, who was going to London as Secretary of Legation, handed it on to John Murray, and it was simultaneously published in London and New York in 1846. It brought Melville intoxicating acclaim, making him the most talked of author of the day. On the strength of this success he married Elizabeth Shaw, August 4, 1847, and through their long union and its sadder vicissitudes she made him an ideal wife. Late in 1849 he made a flying trip to London, where he was much lionized. "Omoo," 1847, describing his Tahitian wanderings, fairly followed up the success of "Typee." "Redburn," 1849, being the log of his first voyage, and "White Jacket," 1850, were less favorably received. The great whaling epic "Moby Dick," 1851, found an indifferent public. Meanwhile, in 1850, Melville, now bearing a father's responsibilities, took over the old Major Melville place, "Arrowhead," at Pittsfield, and tried to settle down as a gentleman farmer, in a life diversified by lyceum lecturing, active but unremunerative literary production, and occasional Southern cruises with his sailor brother, Thomas. His neighbor, Hawthorne, through the happy accident of their being both driven by a storm to the same mountain ledge with only the encyclopaedic Duyckinck as chaperon, became his fast friend, and Melville, Hawthorne's enthusiastic critic. The association may have accentuated certain mystical tendencies already preponderant in Melville.

Melville, in prose, for he was also no mean poet, had three styles, like an old master. The swift lucidity, picturesqueness, and sympathy of "Typee" and "Omoo" have alone captured posterity. Melville lives by his juvenalia. "Redburn" and "White Jacket" are straightforward manly narratives, less colorful than their predecessors. They have not stood the competition with Dana's quite similar "Two Years Before the Mast." They are not quite as solid as that classic, but their chief fault was merely in being later. Then Melville developed a reflective, mystical, and very personal style, probably influenced by Carlyle, which the public has from the first eschewed. It asserts itself first in the strange allegory, "Mardi, and a Voyage Thither," 1849, it pervaded "Pierre, or the Ambiguities," 1852, and other later books. "Moby Dick" shows an extraordinary blend of the first and the last style—the pictorial and the orphic; is Melville's most characteristic and, I think, his greatest book. Still, for the average reader Melville is merely the author of "Typee" and "Omoo." Chronology and the popular will, if it can be at all invoked in Melville's case, alike bid us slur his single historical novel, "Israel Potter," 1855, and his middle-western character sketches in "The Confidence Man," 1857, and even the excellent "Piazza Tales," 1856, in favor of the Marquesan idyl and the picaresque account of Tahiti.

As Herman Melville staggered down the cliffs and cascades above the happy valley of Typee, a famished cripple fearing the redoubtable cannibals, the first human beings he saw were:

A boy and girl, slender and graceful, and completely naked, with the exception of a slight girdle of bark, from which depended at opposite points two of the russet leaves of the bread-fruit. An arm of the boy, half screened from sight by her wild tresses, was thrown about the neck of the girl, while with the other he held one of her hands in his; and thus they stood together, their heads inclined forward, catching the faint noise we made in our progress, and with one foot in advance, as if half inclined to fly from our presence.

The direct, assured, unaffected style of this holds through the entire book.

Melville was adopted by the king, Mehevi, nursed back to health by the loveliest of mistresses, Fayaway, and most devoted of aged retainers, Kory Kory. For four months he saw the life of the gentlest of barbarians in every aspect. He chatted with the bachelors at the Ti (men's club); he saw the wild dancing at the feast of calamashes, shared in the rites of the puppet god Moa Artua, entered the funeral fastnesses where the effigies of former heroes eternally paddled canoes adorned by the skulls of their foes. He heard the clamor of a cannibal feast, and lifted the cover of a tub where lay a fresh human skeleton. He heard the superb warrior Marnoo incite the folk to resistance against the invading French. He mused by pools, splashing with laughing bronze nymphs. Every evening these anointed him for the healing of his wounds and better sleep. He saw, without fixed religion or other law than a wholly capricious tabu, an entire population living in brotherhood and peace. He saw honesty without courts or prisons. He measured this idyllic life against civilization and wrote:

The term "Savage" is, I conceive, often misapplied, and indeed when I consider the vices, cruelties, and enormities of every kind that spring up in the tainted atmosphere of a feverish civilization, I am inclined to think that so far as the relative wickedness of the parties is concerned, four or five Marquesan Islanders sent to the United States as missionaries, might be quite as useful as an equal number of Americans dispatched to the Islands in a similar capacity.

But it is, after all, less opinion than pictures which counts in "Typee," and the pictures are so vivid because there is no condescension in the observer's attitude. Melville was one of the earliest literary travelers to see in barbarians anything but queer folk. He intuitively understood them, caught their point of view, respected and often admired it. Thus "Typee" in a peculiar sense is written from the inside. The ready tolerance that Melville had learned in the fore-castle had not blunted the gentleman in him, but had prepared him to be the ideal spectator of a beautiful life that has forever passed. As having distinctly saved a vanishing charm for posterity, "Typee" is perhaps Melville's most important book.

Quite unlike the well-compacted proportions of the Marquesan idyl, is the straggling, picaresque vivacity of "Omoo." From the unspoiled loveliness of Typee, Melville passed to the tainted life of the Tahitian beaches. His companion was one of those amazing derelicts which the sea best affords, Dr. Long Ghost, reduced to the fore-castle, but having at some time or other "spent money, drunk Burgundy, and associated with gentlemen." They jumped ship, were imprisoned and put in the stocks; wandered in rags from village to village; saw strange British despots who ruled by virtue of rifle and powder-horn; and even reached the presence of Queen Pomaree. The casual, care-free flavor of the book can not be suggested in quotations. Its manly vigor, as certain British reviewers duly pointed out, recalls the masterpieces of George Borrow. Among underworld romances it is strange that it has not taken the high place which on its merits it deserves. The style, as in the case of "Typee," had doubtless profited through Melville's habit of telling these yarns to friends. There is a clarity which tends to fade in the later and more consciously literary works. I don't know that any American writer has had a better eye than Melville. He is not merely a capital storyteller, but a most trenchant picture maker. In a few just strokes, without pretentiousness or faltering, he achieves his sketch. I choose, not from the famous books but from "Redburn," a picture whose original I have often seen—calm and the sea-approaches to New York:

The ship lay gently swelling in the soft, subdued ocean swell; while all around were faint white spots; and nearer to, broad milky patches, betokening the vicinity of scores of ships, all bound to one common port, and tranced in one common calm. Here the long devious wakes from Europe, Africa, India, and Peru converged to a line, which braided them all in one.

Full before us quivered and danced, in the noonday heat and mid-air, the green heights of New Jersey; and by an optical delusion, the blue sea seemed to flow under them.

In its combination of precise and delicate observation, curious felicity of phrase, and implications of mystery and immensity, with just a tinge of conceitfulness, this passage is purest Melville. In one sense "Typee," the adventure and the book, made Melville. At twenty-seven, from being an oddity of the fore-castle, he jumped into fame. From "Typee" and his antecedent experience at sea came the subject of every book of his that has lived. In another sense "Typee" undid Melville. Its success barred other roads. Surviving himself by nearly forty years, Melville tried restlessly in one direction and another to work out a sort of philosophic romance in which he relatively failed. The sojourn under King Mehevi's palm trees had made a skeptic of Melville, yet a skeptic with philosophical yearnings and profoundly religious intuitions. It had destroyed also all political and social theories and gone far to efface conventional maxims of morality.

These may seem only long words for the fore-castle mood, which "bolts down all events, all creeds, and beliefs, and persuasions, all hard things visible and invisible; as an ostrich of potent digestion gobbles down bullets and gunflints." It is a mood, however, endurable only for one who thinks little, and Melville thought tremendously. To doubt everything, yet to retain certain saving intuitions became his avowed programme. This work of critical destruction and reintegration was that of Melville's times—the Victorian mood. But few of Melville's contemporaries had gone so far in disillusion, few had razed prejudice so thoroughly, few had lived so much. What might have been a triumphant process of reconstruction—for Melville had the intelligence and apparently the force—lapsed through invalidism and misfortune into occasional strenuous gropings not without their nobility and pathos. Herman Melville was gradually eaten up by his desire to understand the eternal mysteries, and his activities were not of a sort to clarify his quest. His fate superficially was that of the Ohio honey hunter, described in "Moby Dick," who "seeking honey in the crotch of a hollow tree, found such exceeding store of it, that leaning too far over, it sucked him in, so that he died embalmed. How many think ye, have likewise fallen into Plato's honey head, and sweetly perished there?"

The human interest of Melville's later and forgotten work is so great that I can not follow my predecessors and betters in criticism who have agreed to ignore it as unreadable. We may best approach Herman Melville's cavernous phase from the vantage point of the great transitional romance "Moby Dick."

FRANK JEWETT MATHER, JR.

Correspondence

Self-Determination and Expediency

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

May I carry one step further the very interesting discussion that has been developing in your columns over the matter of self-determination and some other political principles that are now so seriously agitating the minds and the consciences of us all? The articles that I have especially in mind are that entitled "The Psychology of Woodrow Wilson" (May 24), and the letter called forth by it (May 31), as well as the reviews by Professor Willoughby in the same issue.

We have, most of us, taken existing political systems very much for granted—have in a cold-blooded fashion analysed and described them, and noted their tendencies. Aware of some of its faults, we have seen in democracy the forward-looking movement of the age—but our active interest in it has very often gone no further than that; and when we have realized that in many places its development was being thwarted by reactionary governments, most of us have, I fancy, calmed ourselves with the comfortable faith that in time the forces making for progress must prevail over those making for reaction—that where autocracy existed it must finally give way to popular government, and where old conquests still held people more or less unwillingly subject, some sort of system would ultimately work itself out whereby greater local self-government should be accomplished.

But all this we have, to repeat, thought and felt in a very passive way. Our belief in democracy—for the nineteenth and twentieth centuries have on the whole believed in it—has been becoming more and more a belief in its general expediency, rather than in its unique character as ordained by the laws of nature or of God, and for this very reason—because the expedient carries with it no great inspiration—this belief has been accompanied with little fire.

The burning enthusiasm for democracy as a gospel belongs to the period of the French Revolution especially—and to a lesser degree, perhaps, to the revolutionary periods of the nineteenth century. It is, of course, particularly to Rousseau that we look as the chief exponent of the doctrine, and his teachings were at the time received "with the fervor of a religious faith," as one recent writer has put it. If we were to seek the reason for this state of things, we should find a very significant explanation in the fact of the then common belief in the theory of Natural Rights, which Rousseau in his writings put forth in perhaps its most extreme form. A very fundamental characteristic of this theory is its absoluteness and finality: these rights thus described as natural and inalienable belong to each and every individual by the very fact of his birth, and depend on no incidental circumstances or relationships. They are his to do with as he will, and no outside power may rightfully tamper with them without his consent—hence the inevitably democratic form of any government logically derived from this doctrine. As the nineteenth century wore on, however, this doctrine was first questioned, and then disproved, and accordingly, little by little, it lost its poignant force. Belief in political democracy remained, but it was in its later phases a belief based on the conviction that self-government is in the majority of cases ethically right because practically most expedient, and grounded also in large part on the actual facts of social development—on the natural desire of men to manage their own affairs, and on the growing power of the masses to insist on the fulfillment of their desires. From one point of view it may be said that much of the early enthusiasm of the doctrine of political democracy was shifted to the economic field; for, in the works of Karl Marx and others, the ringing appeal of Rousseau is certainly to be found, and in this present revolutionary age is being heard anew in the revived "Proletarians unite!" of the Bolsheviks and the Spartacists, who, like Marx, also, are fusing in their programme the political and the economic in the so-called democracy that they claim to wish to establish, and who are putting forth a doctrine as absolute and as final as any of the era of the French Revolution.

In more recent times, also, some of the more purely political aspects of democracy have again been attracting much attention, and so far as formal expression, at least, is concerned, the doctrine of political democracy has taken on a somewhat changed emphasis from that of earlier days. The "consent of the governed" is a more than a century old formula, but the "right of self-determination," although recognized and applied in former periods, belongs in its more definite formulation rather to the present age. Even so, however, it is already proving a stumbling-block, and the interesting and significant thing about it is, that the reason why it thus sometimes seems to be serving as an obstacle rather than a help to a peaceful settlement of the difficult world situation, is because it is by many being adopted in as absolute and final a form as that which at the beginning of the revolutionary era the larger doctrine of Natural Rights assumed. In President Wilson's earlier enunciations of the doctrine he himself gave it somewhat this universal character. In his 1917 speeches and addresses one finds it in this form:

No peace can last or ought to last which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right "anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property. . . . I speak of this not because of any desire to exalt an abstract political principle which has always been held very dear by those who have sought to build up liberty in America; but for the same reason that I have spoken of the other conditions of peace which seem to me clearly indispensable,—because I wish frankly to uncover realities. Any peace which does not recognize and accept this principle will inevitably be upset.

And again:

I am proposing as it were . . . that no nation should seek to extend its polity over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own polity, its own way of development unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful. (Address to the Senate of the United States, January 22, 1917, on The Terms of Peace.)

In April, 1917, in his request that Congress declare war against Germany, he said: "We are glad . . . to fight them . . . for the rights of nations great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience." In his later speeches he seems to have realized that modifying circumstances must sometimes be recognized in the application of this principle—that it can be a right only in so far as it is expedient and makes for the real peace and welfare of the world, and in that sense not a "natural but an ethical right under the given circumstances." Early in his address to Congress of February 11, 1918, it is true, he says:

The Reichstag resolutions of July themselves frankly accepted the decisions of that court [of mankind]. There shall be no annexations, no contributions, no punitive damages. Peoples are not to be handed about from one sovereignty to another by an international conference or an understanding between rivals and antagonists. National aspirations must be respected; peoples may now be dominated and governed only by their own consent. "Self-determination" is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action, which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril.

But later in the same address, he sums up the principles to be applied in the peace that should end the war, in part as follows: ". . . Second: that peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, but . . . Fourth: that all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world"—qualifying statements that clearly remove this principle from the realm of absolute natural right to that of practical expediency.

Among the oppressed peoples of the earth, moreover, it has quite naturally been taken up in the more absolute form of President Wilson's earlier utterances. Indeed, before his official statements of the doctrine, it had already received some expression among those nations themselves. In Russia, as early as 1915 a treatise by Lenin and Zinoviev had stated it as a socialist ideal: "The socialists can not attain their great aim without combating all national oppression. They must therefore insist that the Social Democratic Parties of the oppressing countries recognize and defend the right of oppressed nations to self-determination, in the political sense of the term—that is, as a right to political independence," and Leon Trotsky in his book "The Bolsheviki and World Peace," written for the most part, apparently, between 1915 and 1917, states unqualifiedly as one of the necessary conditions of a possible peace "the right of every nation to self-determination." One has, also, but to understand the spirit that has animated the peoples that chafed so long under the Turkish yoke and under Austrian domination, to know that the belief in such a "right" was there, although not always definitely expressed as such.

However, although belief in the more extreme form of this principle is quite natural, it is equally impossible that in an ordered world it should prevail and be applied in that form. As the writer of the letter in the Review of May 31 very rightly fears, and as Professor Willoughby in his reviews of Mr. Laski's and Miss Follett's books very ably points out, so applied, it could only make for political disruption and anarchy. Like the original doctrine of Natural Rights, such a doctrine of self-determination, carried to its logical conclusion, might lead us to an individualistic régime in which each individual self might prove entirely self-conscious and self-determined.

My especial point in making these observations lies, to repeat, right here. We shall, I believe, find the answer to the present difficulties—logical and practical—in which, in connection with the matter of self-determination, we find ourselves only by taking this aspect of the doctrine of democracy out of the realm of absolute natural right into which men are tending to put it, and bringing it over into that of practical expediency and ethical right.

ELLEN DEBORAH ELLIS
Mount Holyoke College,
South Hadley, Mass., July 19

Japan and Shantung

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In a letter published in your issue of July 26, "B. W.," after describing China as a heterogeneous "region" and Japan as a homogeneous nation, goes on to say:

Chinese patriotism is a philosophic abstraction; Japanese patriotism is a personal passion.

Under modern conditions, the independence of Japan demands, for safety, that no considerable centre of military or naval force be established on the continental shore of the sea behind the Japanese archipelago. Any such centre would be a standing danger of attack on Japan from the rear.

After describing the strong fortification of Tsingtao by Germany, and her procedure "so to connect it by railway with interior China as virtually to base it on the whole available resources of the Chinese dominions," your correspondent goes on:

When the world war broke out, Japan took advantage of it to seize this threatening base of attack on herself, as needful for her protection as the Panama Canal is for that of the United States, or the Suez Canal for that of British India. Unless she continues to control it—particularly so long as the multiplex political nationality of China remains in a state of recurrently revolutionary chaos—she will be in constant danger of attack from the rear by indefinitely considerable forces directed against the most homogeneous and passionately patriotic of recorded nations.

In view of the fact that the population density of Japan is about twice that of China and that Japan's natural resources are negligible compared to those of China, one is first moved to wonder why China should ever contemplate an aggression on Japan. An aggression by Japan on China would seem more logical under the circumstances.

A nation, or "region," which "remains in a state of recurrently revolutionary chaos,"—a house divided against itself—is hardly as likely to inaugurate an overseas aggression as is a naturally poor and overcrowded nation, characterized as "the most homogeneous and passionately patriotic of recorded nations."

In view of the natural, racial, and political conditions of Japan and China, as above suggested, is it not more likely that Japan in control of Shantung would seek to penetrate by rail "the whole available resources of the Chinese dominions" than that the distraught Chinese, whose "patriotism is a philosophic abstraction," should spring overseas to land on an already overcrowded archipelago?

Quite apart from such considerations in "Realpolitik," there is the human fact that the Chinese province of Shantung is Chinese and not Japanese—that it is occupied by 38,347,000 Chinese.

G. H. W.
New York, July 28

Book Reviews

The Tariff and World Commerce

COMMERCIAL POLICY IN WAR TIME AND AFTER. A Study of the Application of Democratic Ideas to International Commercial Relations. By William Smith Culbertson, member of the United States Tariff Commission, with an Introduction by Henry C. Emery, sometime chairman of the Tariff Board. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

IT is interesting to find the author of this excellent book following so closely the lines laid down a century and a quarter ago by the great Federalist, Alexander Hamilton. The states that had so lately broken away from British control could not live in harmony under their feeble confederation largely because of commercial rivalry, so they formed a "more perfect union" and gave to the central government power to regulate commerce between themselves and with foreign countries. Thus it came about that Hamilton laid the foundations of the tariff policy of the Union, the corner stone of which was—and still is—the desirability of the diversification of American industries, that the United States might become, not a nation of mere cultivators but "a nation of cultivators, artificers and merchants." Hamilton could not, of course, foresee that these foundations would be strongly reinforced by the world war; but such has been the outcome, and now they seem likely to last indefinitely unless superseded by some broader principles under a still "more perfect union."

Until that time—probably remote—the question as to whether we are to have a tariff or not may be regarded as decided in the affirmative; while the second and third questions—as to the articles to be protected and the extent of the protection required—are still open for debate. Dr. Culbertson carefully avoids discussing the protection of particular articles, but points out in a suggestive way the development of certain industries during the war, as, for example, the manufacture of coal-tar dyes and glassware for scientific purposes. The relation between the production of dyes and the manufacture of explosives is very intimate, as Germany was well aware. A good example of this is found in dinitrophenol, one of the derivatives of benzol, which melted with sulphur and sodium yields sulphur black, a dye; but when heated with nitric acid gives picric acid, a high explosive. Doubtless the United States will not lose interest in the dye industry for some time to come.

It is not the business of the Tariff

Commission to give advice to Congress as to matters of policy, but it can and does prepare data for the use of the Congressional committees in their arduous task of constructing a scientific tariff. If a given article is to be protected the import duty must of course be equal to the difference between the normal costs of production at home and abroad, due regard being had to varying costs, transportation charges, bounties, and all the other factors which enter into the problem. For example, the cost of production of beet sugar in the United States in the year 1916-1917 varied from $47.31 per ton in one group of factories to $123.48 in another, while the cost of production of cane sugar in Cuba varied from $44.57 to $78.65 per ton. If, therefore, these figures were used as a guide to the fixing of the duty on sugar, representative factories in the United States and Cuba might be taken and the tariff fixed to cover the difference in costs with a fair margin. Or, if it were decided to remove the tariff, it is evident that the price would fall to some extent, the high cost American factories might be eliminated, new Cuban producers would take their place, and other results would occur, some predictable, some highly uncertain. In reading Dr. Culbertson's lucid discussion of such facts and figures one wonders how Congress got along before the days of the Taft Tariff Board and the present Tariff Commission, and to what extent the Congressional committees now rely on the Commission for advice on questions of policy as well as for the statistical data which it is their chief duty to supply.

Dr. Culbertson gives many details as to the commercial policies of various nations before the war, together with his own interpretation of their significance. The practice of dumping is to his mind a serious evil, justifying the special legislation passed against it in the year 1916; but how the manufacturers of the United States endured it before that time, or how Great Britain, which has long been the dumping ground of all nations, has existed at all, is not made clear. There are at least three varieties of dumping: a merely temporary bargain-counter selling of surplus stock, a constant and deliberate selling abroad at a price insufficient to cover total costs, and a predatory price-cutting intended to destroy competition in the import market. Export bounties encourage a peculiarly persistent form of dumping, but Dr. Culbertson does not tell how the nefarious devices of the wicked may be circumvented for the benefit of the just, as when the German sugar bounties became the basis of the jam and marmalade business of Great Britain.

Discrimination in tariff making is another bogie that Dr. Culbertson raises, and it must be confessed that the recital of its misdeeds in the past and its bad intentions for the future are enough to scare us back to free trade or forward to the League of Nations and an international tariff commission. Unquestionably, some discriminations are serious, but some are merely amusing, like item No. 103 of the German conventional tariff, which surreptitiously favors Swiss alpine cattle by a special rate on "large dappled mountain cattle or brown cattle, reared at a spot at least 300 metres above sea level and which have at least one month's grazing each year at a spot at least 800 metres above sea level." Less amusing to us, but possibly more so to the Swiss, was the prohibition of the importation of American hog products by Germany from 1883 to 1891, on ostensibly sanitary grounds. Similarly, special taxes were levied by Italy and Austria on imported cotton-seed oil when other edible oils were exempt. A free-trade country, the author thinks, is helpless when confronted with such discrimination, as it has no bargaining power; but he omits to state that such a country might impose a penalty duty and that when a protected country makes a concession it reduces its bargaining power in the direction of free trade, especially when a concession to one country is automatically granted to many other countries by the most favored nation clause so common in commercial treaties.

No doubt the nations of the world have been engaged in unseemly and dangerous rivalry in their eagerness to obtain colonies, concessions, spheres of influence, open doors, preferences, financial control, and all the other prizes of international competition. This ruthless competition—back of which is the pressure of increasing population and the demand, even more insistent, for better standards of life—was one of the chief causes of the world war, and is likely to bring on other wars unless measures are taken for the amelioration of the struggle for commercial supremacy.

To this end, as the author believes, the ratification of the Covenant of the League of Nations is a prerequisite, after which international commissions should be appointed which should do for the associated nations what the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Tariff Commission have done for the United States. Such commissions would naturally have two functions. In the first place, they would administer such rules, perhaps in the nature of a code, as were adopted in treaties, provision being made for appeal when desired to the League of Nations. Secondly, they should have wide powers of investigation and publicity relative to all economic questions arising between nations, whether covered by treaties or not, and their work should do much to remove misinformation and misunderstanding.

But—and here again we are reminded of Hamilton and Marshall and the other Federalists—all this makes for centralization and limitation of independence. It is well to see the direction in which we are moving even though there may be no looking back. Economically no country is independent, for the commercial nexus is binding the civilized nations into one, and the political development, if it lags too far behind, will be cast aside like an old-fashioned and outworn garment.

Possession, Psychic and Spiritual

ACROSS THE STREAM. By E. F. Benson.
New York: George H. Doran Company.

MISS FINGAL. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford.
New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE WHITE ISLAND. By Michael Wood.
New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

WITHOUT departing from his easy, chatty manner, Mr. Benson here undertakes to tell a story more difficult than his wont. That interest in "psychical" matters which the sudden bereavements of war, and certain depositions like the "Raymond" of Sir Oliver Lodge, have notably intensified during the past year or two, is naturally reflected in Anglo-American fiction. Algernon Blackwood and others have given imaginative treatment to the themes of reincarnation, possession, multiple personality, and so on. More and more the minor creative fancy is playing with ideas of the interflow and continuity of then and now, here and there. The motive exists more subtly and therefore more powerfully in "The Three Black Pennys" of Joseph Hergesheimer; not merely heredity but some obscure or even occult inheritance links the three distant generations of that striking chronicle. One may call Mr. Benson's instance a case of auto-possession, if there be such a term in the lingo of the occult. After Mr. Blackwood's method, he takes an English youth of robust body and healthy, normal mind, and endows him with abnormal psychic powers. These powers are a puzzle to himself, but do not make him morbid, or queer in the ordinary business of life. They spring from a natural trick of self-hypnotism. In his trances, at first brief and involuntary, he seems in communion with the spirit of a brother, dead in childhood, whom he has never seen. This spirit's influence upon the living boy is beneficent, but is withdrawn as he reaches manhood. Then a malign spirit masquerading as the other gets control of him. We take it to be the embodiment of his lowest self; it springs in the form of vapor from the youth's own breast, takes form and substance, and before withdrawal intensifies by direct speech and action its influence over the victim. A case of possession, as it would have been called in old days—but of possession by a subtly embodied subconscious self. The case of Dr. Jekyll is analogous; but Mr. Benson succeeds in giving the idea a fresh twist, and permits the almost doomed one to be rescued in time by the woman who loves him. But for his dropping here and there into that sort of wordy languor in which, in all his later books, this writer seems to be talking agreeably against time, the tale is effectively told. At bottom, it is hardly more than an episode, fit for the more compact handling of the novelette, or, to use a somewhat less clumsy makeshift for a form which has no good English label, the nouvelle.

"Miss Fingal" is another example of the easy and verbose British novel dealing with "the better sort" socially, but given a new turn by the inclusion of a "psychical" motive. Miss Fingal is as nice for a girl as Mr. Benson's young man is for a boy. But circumstances and her nature have brought her well into womanhood in a kind of negative state, a delicate but empty vessel into which life has not yet been poured. The signal of her awakening is conventional enough—nothing less than that sudden and unlooked-for inheritance of wealth which has been setting shabby-genteel heroines on their feet since heroines began to have feet. With the charming ingenuousness of British chroniclers, Mrs. Clifford now shows us Miss Fingal being cordially taken up, for her money's account, by the kind of people who have (quite as naturally) ignored her in her shabby years. The ensuing action concerns two persons especially, a pair who have loved and parted because they had to, to make the story. The still young and beautiful wife is ill and doomed; the husband is regretful but unbending. Miss Fingal is drawn to both of them. Then she is smashed up in a motor accident, and lies unconscious at the moment when the wife dies. There has been strong sympathy between them. Now into the pure but empty cup which is Miss Fingal is poured the richer personality of Linda. When she recovers consciousness she is, we take it, a sort of composite rather than (as the publishers say) dual personality. She is Aline Fingal plus Linda Alliston. For the children of the dead wife she conceives a strong devotion, and it is through her relation to them that her new-old personality attracts the husband, and the desirable thing, romantically speaking, happens.

From the not too exigent field of polite psychical romance we make something of a step in turning to "The White Island" of Michael Wood, who is, since Hugh Benson, the most eloquent among Roman Catholic novelists in English. He also has a story of possession to tell, but of that divine possession to which we give other names. His René Clinton, unlike Mr. Benson's Archie, is markedly odd from the beginning: with "a wraith-like quality about the whole personality" and with a strange effect as of a physical luminosity. He cares nothing for boyish matters, and can not be taught the usual things at school. He has nearly reached manhood when his parents, both normal, intellectual people, fairly give him up as half-witted, and by chance commit him to the care of a kindly priest who is at the head of a private religious community in the country.

Here René's spiritual quality, of which he seems wholly unconscious, slowly manifests itself. Released from pressure towards conformity, he expands healthily, like a plant set in the right place. He has mystical powers of healing by his presence those who are spiritually diseased, and of confounding those who are spiritually vile. He is not exceptionally religious in the formal sense. His only vivid emotional experience relates to a vision, recurrent from childhood, of a White Island in which are green pastures and a Joyous Shepherd and perfect beauty and harmony of sight and sound. Something, in short, dwells in him, an angel his body entertains unaware. The good priest who tells the story leads up to, as climax, the only vision of his sixty years—the mystical glimpse by him and René's father of the boy alone on the downs at night, "wrapped in a turmoil of white light. . . . It was the divine Substance of Life; it was a living Body, and Handmaid of Him Who made It. I saw it did not wrap René round. It flowed through and through him; so that the pure body and childlike soul became an expression and an instrument of the White Glory. I gazed, as I thought, on a foreshadowing of the mystery of the resurrection of the body. I saw holy, holy divine Power linked in an eternal marriage with perfected and glorified matter." And about the youth, all unconscious of this shining, move companies of angels going upon their good errands. . . . We see no more of René, need see no more of him, since his function is to be, rather than to strive or to grow: to demonstrate, in the unconscious play of his influence, how incalculably the hand of God may work for the good of man. In its character of religious novel, the book has as true a quality of art as a religious painting by an "old master." Why not, indeed, "religious novelist," as well as "religious painter"?

H. W. BOYNTON

The Fight for Reform

FIGHTING THE SPOILSMEN. REMINISCENCES OF THE CIVIL SERVICE REFORM MOVEMENT. By William Dudley Foulke, LL.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

AFTER Theodore Roosevelt, no American publicist of the closing generation has enjoyed a lively political battle more keenly than William Dudley Foulke. Politically, he is to be classified as an independent, deserving, perhaps, a good deal of extra credit for the moral strength which enabled him, on due occasion, to reverse a natural tendency towards a vigorous Republican partisanship. Two concrete illustrations of his independence were furnished by his refusal to support Blaine in the election of 1884, and Harrison in 1892. In the latter case, the sole reason for his opposition was the unsatisfactory record of Harrison in the administration of the civil service reform measures provided for under the Pendleton Law of 1883.

Mr. Foulke entered the field of Indiana politics, as a member of the State Senate, just after the organization of the National Civil Service Reform League at Newport, in August of 1881. Sound conceptions of public duty led him naturally into the new movement, and the condition of Indiana politics gave to his convictions an immediate opportunity for practical expression. There was a large Democratic majority in the legislature, and its political leaders saw an opportunity for profitable patronage in the three great asylums, for the insane, the blind, and the deaf and dumb. It was, of course, a far easier matter to unite the Republicans in opposition to this abuse of power than it would have been if the spoils had lain open to their own grasp; but in Mr. Foulke's case there is no ground for the suspicion that the grapes of patronage at the expense of the unfortunate would have been any less repulsive if within his own reach. Frequent as such lootings of benevolent institutions have been, inevitably attended by brutality to the inmates, one hates to think that any man of humane and gentlemanly instincts ever looked upon such work with anything but sincere aversion. The bill was passed, and was soon followed by its normal crop of corruption, inefficiency, and cruelty. A fight for the reform of the asylums was immediately begun, under Mr. Foulke's leadership, and was finally successful.

In 1885 Mr. Foulke began to attend the annual meetings of the National Civil Service Reform League, and soon formed a very close personal friendship with its president, George William Curtis. From that time on, his name has been inseparably linked with the civil service reform movement, and no man living is better fitted to write a personal record of the vicissitudes which the movement has undergone. If there is any flaw in his treatment of the subject, it lies in a failure perhaps fully to realize the peculiar difficulties encountered by Cleveland in 1885, and Wilson in 1913, as compared with Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, no one of whom followed a long era of opposition control. One may question, too, Mr. Foulke's apparent view that ambassadors and ministers to foreign powers should always be appointed from the lower ranks of our diplomatic service. A hard and fast rule of the kind in the past would have excluded men who have been among the very brightest lights in American diplomacy. Perhaps the author went just a little further than he intended in his justifiable feeling that a President should give no occasion for suspecting that a diplomatic appointment is a reward for a campaign contribution. It must be admitted, however, that we have had diplomatic service of very high value, occasionally, from men who have made campaign contributions used in the election of the Presidents by whom they were later appointed. The true solution of this difficulty lies in no absolute rule that a campaign contribution shall exclude the contributor from appointment to office, but in the cessation, either voluntary or enforced, of the acceptance of any campaign contribution of sufficient amount to be regarded as a possible bribe. The day has passed when an enormous campaign fund can really do much to improve the chances of a party or an individual at the polls, and one may be excused for suspecting that these funds are solicited to satisfy the appetites of hungry campaigners, fully as much as to insure success in the campaign.

Mr. Foulke passes in review the growth of the movement from its inception in his early manhood to the present day, constantly enlivening his pages with humorous incidents of the struggle, or brief character sketches of prominent persons involved, such as George William Curtis, Carl Schurz, Dorman B. Eaton, John R. Proctor, and Presidents Cleveland, Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft. The Presidents, he thinks, have all been at heart friendly to the reform movement, and the differences in consistency of its application under different administrations have been very largely due to differences in power to resist the enormous pressure of office seekers and Congressional office brokers. To Roosevelt he gives credit for the highest measure of success in this respect, with Harrison at the opposite end of the scale. If one finishes the story with some pride in the evidence that the high ideals with which Curtis and his followers began the reform had a practical basis, and have in very profitable measure been realized, he will also be convinced that it is not a gain which can be put in safety deposit, as it were, and retained with no further effort. Honest and efficient government, in any single one of its many phases, will never come, or continue, except as the result of unflinching watchfulness and intelligent endeavor.

Briefly stated, character and ability in the appointive public service has been the aim of the movement recorded in Mr. Foulke's volume. Perhaps one may add that the most obviously necessary defensive movement for the preservation of the ground already gained lies in a similarly persistent effort to improve the character and ability of our legislative personnel, local, State, and National. It may be questioned whether the "army of office seekers," of which we have heard so much for nearly a century, would ever have been numerous enough to give trouble except for the stimulation which it has continually received from the low grade of politicians allowed to creep into our legislative bodies, from the United States Senate down. It is they alone who stand in the way of the adoption of adequate civil service regulations, they chiefly through whom pressure to neglect or violate such regulations is brought to bear upon executive officials in whom appointing power is lodged. But we choose our legislators by the vote of the mass, and relief will come only with the quickening of intelligence and sense of duty in the electorate. Every life of vigorous effort for definitely conceived and attainable ideals of good government, such as the life of Mr. Foulke has been, every book such as the record which he has just given us, is a well-marked advance in the direction of that quickening.

The Run of the Shelves

AT last we may know the reason for the rise of the radical tide in American social life to-day. Our Bolshevik apologists, Rand School idealists, and I. W. W. agitators, are the reincarnated souls of North American aborigines, who, disinherited from their free ownership of this land, are now inhabiting white bodies (preferably of the European immigrant variety) and are impelled by their past wrongs to rebel against restraining influences. Furthermore, the souls of the American Indians still on the spirit plane are filled with hatred of civilization, and are by fixity of thought "trying to excite a scattered company of men in these United States—men of a low grade of intellect but of psychic temperament—to deeds of violence and destruction." This information, conveyed to Elsa Barker through automatic writing in "Last Letters from the Living Dead Man" (Mitchell Kennerley), would seem to indicate the desirability of a Psychic Division of the Department of Justice. The Living Dead Man has already conducted a considerable automatic correspondence with Mrs. Barker, in successive volumes of "Letters" and "War Letters," and he is a spirit acquaintance of the Vagrom Angel, whose "Songs" were also brought from the spirit plane to earth level by Mrs. Barker. The present volume, we are earnestly assured, concludes the Living Dead Man Series, for the transcriber, in an extended psycho-analytical-occult introduction, records her decision, unless "accidentality" intervenes, to do no more automatic writing.

The letters themselves were written between February, 1917, and February, 1918, and portray the Living Dead Man, by precept and example, portentously doing his bit to end the war. Exhortations to the souls of the North American Indians, designed to calm their revengeful passions, exhortations mentally projected into the consciousness of earth-bound American legislators, and spiritual discomfiture of pacifists, were among his activities. On July 18, 1917, he solemnly announces: "No lecturer on earth ever had so busy a month as I have had this last month. I have spoken to hundreds several times every day, going from place to place, from state to state, from city to city. I can speak in San Francisco in the morning, in New York at noon, in New Orleans at two o'clock, in Butte, Montana, in the evening. I am not limited to railway time-tables, nor do I pay my fare." Dwelling on the spirit plane, with a cosmic view of this world, he offers counsel and consolation striking in its force and originality: "Do not fancy this war will end without greater changes than the world has ever known before." "America, do not despair, your destiny is assured!" "I am all for unity now. Do not let yourself be weakened by fear of the parts. America is a whole and as a whole she must work." "Build ships, build more ships, keep the men occupied." "The time has now come for America to get out into the world and take her place in the federation of nations." There is special cogency in the following: "The world will go on, and you will go with it. Make no mistake about that. The world is going very fast. All these new 'psychic' books are an evidence that the world is going fast. A few years ago no publisher would have issued them. I do not wonder that your head swims."

There is a summer resort of Whitmanites at Bon Echo, in Ontario, Canada, and the Review has received the last issue of the "Sunset of Bon Echo," of which Mrs. Denison, otherwise Flora MacDonald, is the editor. Mrs. Denison's occult powers may be divined from her ability in the year 1919 to hold extended conversations with Walt Whitman. Her literary attainments may be inferred from her description of Mrs. Anne Gilchrist as "marvelously wondrous," and her announcement that "love and cheer exuded" from the being of John Burroughs—a being which is characterized in the same passage as "jaunty." These remarks are entirely friendly on Mrs. Denison's part; Mr. Burroughs must long for the shelter of enmity. One can imagine the sort of praise which is lavished upon Whitman by the Bacchic choir to which Mrs. Denison acts as corypheus. He is extolled in almost the precise spirit, in almost the precise diction, in which the poets of the New England group were extolled by the followers of that convention to which the Burly Whitman is supposed to have given a quietus. Even Mr. John Haynes Holmes employs this language: "To-day when we chant the 'barbaric yawp' of 'the good, gray poet.'" The world moves, if it does not progress. The "barbaric yawp" can now be chanted, and the "good, gray poet," the phrase which annuls all distinctions between Whitman and Bryant, for example, is the title under which his followers now delight to cloak his originality. Whitman, of course, is not responsible for the conduct of his disciples. The imprint of bronze on mush will be mushy, and the strong man—assuming Whitman's right to that title—will be loved by his weaker followers after the fashion of their weakness, not in the measure of his strength. But the orthodoxy of these Whitmanites, the prevalent similarity and complacency of their opinions, remains a curious and amusing fact. It is probable that Mrs. Denison would no more admit a rebellious or discordant note into the "Sunset" than the Atlantic Monthly in 1858 would have published a chapter from "Enfans d'Adam." But is an outcome of this kind, which assimilates Whitman's fame with the correct and immaculate fames of the New England school, the most perfect of rewards or the artfullest and most ironical of retributions? The second view is at least possible. There was one method of paralyzing Voltaire which the Papacy never thought of: it might have canonized him.

"A Year in the Navy" by Joseph Husband (Houghton Mifflin Company) begins rather tamely at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, where the author enlisted, but ends excitingly enough in the transport, big yacht and destroyer service off France. We have seen no better account of the difficulties of convoy guard, which the author experienced in the responsible position of a watch officer.

Plays Indoors and Out

THE LIVING CORPSE. By Leo N. Tolstoi. New York: Nicholas L. Brown.

WITHOUT THE WALLS. By Katrina Trask. New York: The Macmillan Company.

THE OPEN-AIR THEATRE. By Sheldon Cheney. New York: Mitchell Kennerley.

A WORSE title than "Redemption" for the Tolstoian drama which was presented to New York last October, it would be difficult to imagine, unless it were the "Living Corpse," under which title an English version of the drama by Mrs. E. M. Evarts is now published. There is a good novel and a good play in the idea of the man who feigns to die, or dies legally, to allow his virtuous wife and her virtuous lover to reconcile virtue with felicity in a second marriage. But the novel should be long, the play short; Tolstoi has pared the novel and gorged the play; the result is too obese for a play, too meagre for a novel. The six acts are a mere extravagance, since the second and half the third are useless. The crises, the botched suicide, the feigned suicide, and the real suicide, together with the reports of the husband's life and death to the palpitating lovers, should be good; but Tolstoi's interest in non-essentials is so uncontrollable and his interest in essentials, though genuine, is so entirely controllable that the play, which saunters between the culminations, may almost be said to saunter through them. Fedya, living among crises, is cushioned against shock by the indolent placidity of his temper; and the play's temper is patterned upon Fedya's. In his final suicide, the crisis, though not the revolver, misses fire; the act, like Hamlet's actual slaying of Claudius, is a rectification, and rectifications do not startle us.

The handling of the thesis is still worse. Something is wrong with the divorce laws in Russia. Undoubtedly, but just what? We have a floating indictment of a hovering iniquity. Where the accusation is momentous, it is vague; where it is precise, it is diminutive. When Tolstoi, for instance, descends to the littleness of blaming an official for asking the vocation, age, and faith of a defendant, we feel that the captiousness of law has supplied him, not only with a target, but with a model. The truth is that the story and the moral suffer from the same ailment; the shredded thesis is the exact counterpart of the crumbled tale.

The work, of course, has valuable qualities; of that fact its authorship was the guarantee. Its psychology, though imperfectly dramatized, is astute; the dialogue, though not witty, and far from literary in the greyness of the English version, has warmth, warmth as of new milk or a new-laid egg, the sign of recent contact with vitality; several of the episodes might interest us, if they did not furnish a dilatory story with an excuse for slackening its pace or stopping altogether. The strength of the play is Fedya. Some of his actions are merely pinned to his character, but, taken in the round, he is authentic and appealing. The feigned suicide has precisely that mixture of shiftlessness and magnanimity which would recommend it to both sides of his divided nature. His goodness will hardly make his badness incredible except for readers who have yet to learn that goodness may be shelter as well as screen for the faults which ripen undetected in its shadow.

Mrs. Trask's "Without the Walls" need not detain the serious reader long. It may interest moderately the reader who thinks himself serious, for whom a limpid and tepid account of a love-affair between a Jewish girl and a Roman soldier can be enlivened by a nominal articulation with the preaching and martyrdom of Christ. The relation ceases to be perfunctory at one point only—when the earthquake that accompanies the Crucifixion shatters the prison wall that opposes the reunion of the lovers. Standards of reverence differ; Mrs. Trask is doubtless reverent in her fashion; but to my mind the employment of that august means for that frivolous end is as if one used a splinter of the Cross for a toothpick. The drama, however, has its moment of elevation on a hill outside Jerusalem at the time of the Crucifixion, where four men, a Roman soldier, a Roman courtier, a Greek philosopher, and a ruler in Israel, participating in the animation of the tumult from the safety of its edge, discuss the news from Calvary as the lips of gasping messengers report it. The idea is fortunate, and the execution not unskillful.

Mr. Sheldon Cheney is readable and sensible in his compact monograph on the "Open-Air Theatre." His interests are mainly contemporary, and the history of the form, though not overlooked, is treated with that incidental homage with which a well-bred young man salutes his elders on his way to more inviting companionship among the juniors of the party. Mr. Cheney divides open-air theatres into three groups: the architectural theatre, man-made, but placed in the open; the nature theatre, which man finds and chooses, but does not make; and the garden theatre, in which nature is supplemented by such man-made adjuncts as pergolas, stairways, stone walls, and trellis-work. The garden theatre is clearly only the architectural theatre with scant architecture, and the classification has the logical insecurity which marks all divisions whereby differences of kind and of degree are coordinated; as if one, for instance, should divide weathers into rain, drizzle, and sunshine. Here the harm done is very slight; where shelf-room for facts is the grand desideratum, convenience is paramount to logic.

The architectural theatre, according to Mr. Cheney, is adapted to Greek plays, the nature theatre to pageants, and the garden theatre to the poetic drama. This fitness for specialties is a virtual acknowledgment of the unfitness of the open-air theatre for plays in general, and Mr. Cheney is wise and candid enough to make the acknowledgment not merely virtual but explicit. At this point—I leave Mr. Cheney for a moment—the relation of auditorium to scenery becomes instructive. The indoor auditorium is universal in its utility because it is neutral; scenery, that is, any given piece or "set" of scenery, adapts itself notably to a few occasions at the cost of unfitness or futility everywhere else. Now what the open-air theatre does is to put the auditorium on the footing of scenery, to destroy both its neutrality and its generality, to contract and to intensify its fitness. There is meaning, also, in the fact that, in all three of the dramatic kinds which Mr. Cheney indorses for the open-air theatre, drama is subordinated, or at least accommodated, to some non-dramatic element, to ritual in the Greek play, to picture in the pageant, to poetry in the poetic drama.

Another point occurs to me which I advance with the tentativeness of one whose first-hand knowledge of the open-air theatre is inconsiderable. A drama is a figment. Do we help a figment by making reality its neighbor, even its servitor? A normal playhouse is doubtless real in a sense, but, like the play, it is a human fabrication, and a fabrication, moreover, which the interests of a play have prompted, fashioned, and adorned. In the normal theatre the shell of art is art. Would the substitution of nature be a help? Is not a real sky or a real forest among a group of semblances liable to the same misgiving that would attach to a real friar in the part of Friar Laurence or a true prince in the part of Hamlet? Reality may crush and domineer; its position among mere simulacra may be as incongruous and disconcerting as that of Achilles in woman's dress among the maids. The mention of Achilles recalls the success of the open-air theatre among the Greeks. I grant the force of this example, but one must remember that the Greek in his mild climate viewed sky and earth with that habituation which annuls their intrusiveness, and that a Greek play, though including representations, was to the reverent Greek what the Mass is to a Catholic—a part of actuality, a veritable deed. It is noteworthy, also, that the pageant, the one form of drama which Mr. Cheney thinks appropriate to the purely natural theatre, is the form which comes nearest to being an act or fact in its own right, which stresses least the mimetic element in drama. I voice impressions rather than views in the above argument, and they are impressions which I hold myself ready to surrender at a moment's notice to the persuasions of so liberal and kind a critic as Mr. Cheney.

O. W. FIRKINS

A Living Poet of Greece

"YOU might just as well say that the glory that was Greece is no more."

This was the sad conclusion of a modern traveler who had just returned from Greece. Homer, it seems, had not come down to the docks of Piræus to welcome him with his lyre, and Pallas Athene had not smiled at him personally from among the gold-stained columns of the Parthenon. He had not found any people looking like the ancients, had found no art, no literature, and no beauty.

Now when I hear this story again and again, I grow suspicious of its veracity, and my suspicions fly to the boatmen of the Greek harbors and the horse-boys of the interior who do not always exercise their monopoly in conformity with the traveler's views of economy. As a result they prejudice the impatient tourist from the very start and Greece has to suffer in the estimation of the world. The same thought came to me on hearing my friend's tirade, candid, and proud of it, in thus giving a Greek born a piece of his mind. Fortunately he was in my own room where I had immediate access to my reserves.

"For heaven's sake," I protested, "no art, no beauty, no literature, in Greece?"

"None except the ancient," my friend asserted furiously, "and even that is not understood there; they speak a corrupt idiom . . ."

"Now listen. Do you mean to say that during the numbered days you spent in Attica you did not see Sky everywhere and sunbeams on all sides?

Something about like honey from Hymettus?

Did you not see

The lilies grow of marble witherless and old Pentele shine, birthgiver of Olympus? Does not

The digging axe on beauty stumble still, and Cybele's womb bear gods instead of mortals? Does not fair Athens bleed with violet blood each time the afternoon's arrows strike her? Does not the sacred olive keep its shrines and fields? And in the midst of crowds that slowly move, like caterpillars on a white flower, does not the people of the relics live and reign, myriad-souled? Does not the spirit glitter in the dust? And did you not feel it battle in you with darkness—

(Continued on page 286)

CROCKER-WHEELER MOTORS

Niagara's Rival for Dependable Power

C-W Motors and the Printing Industry

The first complete electrical equipment of a large printing establishment with individual motors, was manufactured by the Crocker-Wheeler Company in 1894.

To-day the use of individual motors is the only up-to-date method employed for the operation of printing presses and allied machinery.

The gigantic Hoe Press which prints the Congressional Record is operated by a 30 H. P. Crocker-Wheeler Motor.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAMPITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

PEARL NECKLACES AND PEARLS FOR ADDITIONS TO NECKLACES

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

STARTLINGLY TRUE TO LIFE

SYLVIA & MICHAEL by Compton Mackenzie

Sylvia Scarlett, already known to Mr. Mackenzie's readers (and if you don't know her she is worth meeting!), turns up in Russia a vagabond cabaret singer, having left behind her the safety and success she had found in England. Through Russia, Rumania and Serbia, Sylvia makes her way, having one adventure after another and learning much about life as she faces it under the heightened stress of war. In the debacle of Serbia, she and Michael Fane are thrown together, and caught up and hurled into the thick of great events. In the end they find love and peace—and a Greek Island in the Ægean. An unusual romance, with its outstanding characters, its train of strange events and the magic of Mr. Mackenzie's style to heighten the reader's enjoyment. $1.75

THE CUP OF FURY

By Rupert Hughes

"The romance of the shipyards (our own Hog Island) is told with a wealth of detail by Mr. Hughes, who shows not only the wonderful work accomplished in a few months by tremendous energies judiciously applied, but mingles with the whirr of swiftly moving wheels of industry the whirr of hearts beating for love and victory. The story is a big one and is full of the spirit that impelled this great nation to forego the ways of peace to help check the demon that was menacing the world. Mr. Hughes has no reason to feel that the end of the war will lessen the interest of novel readers in 'The Cup of Fury'."—Philadelphia Record.

Illustrated. Post 8vo. $1.75*HARPER & BROTHERS

Established 1817

NEW YORK

(Continued from page 284)

as in the poet whom I am quoting to you now?

The relentless friend seemed impressed but was quick in dealing another blow:

"There you go again, quoting some of the old poets! They are dead and gone thousands of years ago. What I want to know is why the Greeks of to-day don't speak or write that way. Their unbearable jargon is so barbarous, so . . ."

I laughed radiantly; he was mine.

"But this poet is a modern poet," I interrupted.

"A Greek?"

"Yes, if you don't dispute his descent."

"How modern?"

"You might have visited him in Athens, where he lives now; but, it seems, you have missed the privilege of scolding him for writing such stuff in what you call an abominable jargon."

"Let me see that book." He snatched, rather unceremoniously, the manuscript from which I was reading, and read at random hurriedly and eagerly. His repeated comment during this procedure was:

"Well, I be d——d!"

Suddenly he rose enthusiastically: "Listen to this," he said and proceeded to read:

Fatherlands, air, and earth, and fire, and water!

Elements indestructible, beginning
And end of life! First joy and last of mine!
You I shall find again when I pass on To the grave's calm. The people of the dreams

Within me, air-like, unto air shall pass;
My reason, fire-like, unto lasting fire;
My passions' craze, unto billows' madness;

Even my dust-borne body, unto dust;
And I shall be again air, earth, fire, water;
And from the air of dreams, and from the flames

Of thought, and from the flesh that shall be dust,
And from the passions' sea, ever shall rise
A breath of sound like a soft lyre's complaint.

"This is a universal note," he ejaculated. "What is the man's name?"

"Kostas Palamas."

"I never heard of him before."

"That is not his fault."

"Why has he not been translated?"

"The important thing is that he lives and that he is writing things worth while in the living language of the Greeks of to-day. He is not alone of his kind either, though he is certainly the greatest. There are many who write literature worth your attention and whom you might be induced to compare with some of your old dead friends. These are Greeks, too, Greeks in flesh and Greeks to the core. Palamas was born in Patras, the very city where you landed and among the very people whom he understands and loves in spite of you. He was brought up almost opposite Patras, in Missolonghi. Byron—Marco Bozzaris; eh? Then he went to Athens, where he studied and, later on, became the secretary of the University for many years. He is now about sixty. Know him? Why should you? His name is not in Baedeker, nor are his books advertised in foreign or Greek magazines. For a long while even the Greeks did not know him; and when they came to know him they called him a 'hairy one' and a 'traitor' because he stuck to the people and to their living traditions and above all to the people's language, which you call corrupt and which he calls a long-neglected 'thrice-noble fairy, born of sunlight and crowned with stars.' Only when his fame reached beyond Greece and a French critic picked him out as the greatest poet of Europe 'o-day people began to pay attention to him."

"He must be the only one in Greece."

"No, not exactly; you can not have a Shakespeare and an Æschylus without a miracle play or a Thespis to precede them; and when they come they may be suns outshining the stars, but the stars are there. In Greece to-day there are literary and artistic schools rivalling each other and struggling for expression. It could not be otherwise; in a land where the mountains drip with purple blood and the sea is a mantle of violet silk winding about you wherever you go and the people persist in preferring dreams to realities and in conversing with wood-nymphs and water-nymphs, there is bound to be something of the old spirit of adoration for beauty. As Palamas puts it, in such a land one feels like Life's 'wedding guest, who travels far abroad to see the bride, thrice beautiful, and the bridegroom, a wizard;' and on his way to the wedding, he finds comfort

With sounds that like sweet longings, waken him;

Old sounds familiar, low whispering
Of women's beauties and of home-born shadows;

Then flowers pour their fragrances for him,
And blossoms with no scent have their own speech,

The speech of voiceless eyes that open wide;
And candidly he speaks his words in rhymes
That with uncommon measure echo forth
The flames that burn within the heart, the kisses

That the waves squander on the sandy beach,

And the sweet birds that sing on children's lips.

"Well, let us know something more about these wedding guests."

"That is just what I would say. Know them! Know them before you praise them, and above all know them before you condemn them. Don't get the idea of ruins and death just because you see poverty that is proud, and can not see beauty that is hidden, simply because you suffer from runitis. The few Greeks you meet on the docks and in the hotels are not those who make Greece. You have to look for them in their huts and villages, in the mountains and in the towns, but you will never see them unless you approach them without declaring war on them and unless you understand their minds and their language. Of course, one who knows them might write for the benefit of others, the Philistines. But even that is difficult. Remember how long it was before even Homer found his way into a foreign language and God knows how many thousand years will have to pass before we can say that we understand him to our satisfaction."

ARISTIDES E. PHOURIDES

ENGLISH PAGEANTRY

An Historical Outline

Vol I. $3.50

By ROBERT WITHINGTON, Ph.D.

Volume I deals with the elements of the subject; volume II will continue the study in England and the United States.

"... an important source of information for all who wish to engage in the practical use of pageantry either in England or America."—N. Y. Times.

7 Randall Hall,
Cambridge, Mass.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

280 Madison Ave.,
New York

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 14

New York, Saturday, August 16, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment

Editorial Articles:

The Struggle Against High Prices Are President and Senate Getting Together?	289
Andrew Carnegie	291
The Hungarian Tangle	292
Direct Action and the Public	292
The Middle West and the Soviet. By Philo M. Buck, Jr.	294
The Leopard's Spots. By Examiner	295
On Cultivating the Fundamentals. By A. G. Keller	297
Herman Melville. Part II. By Frank Jewett Mather, Jr.	298
Correspondence	301
Book Reviews:
A Modern Diogenes	301
French Criticism of the "Anglo-Saxons"	303
Fabulists	304
The Run of the Shelves	305
Drama:
"A Voice in the Dark" and Other Melodramas	306
Music:
Oscar Hammerstein	308

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

THE President has received, and deserves, unqualified praise for the words in which, in his address to Congress, he dismissed the thought of any sudden adoption of a radical change in our economic system. "We can not," he says, "hastily and overnight revolutionize all the processes of our economic life. We shall not attempt to do so." This is unmistakably directed at the proposals of the four Railroad Brotherhoods, embodied in the Plumb bill, and it disposes of that bill as an immediate issue in Congress. And it must be said, to the credit of the Brotherhoods, that they have consistently adhered to the denial, which they issued immediately after the presentation of their plan, of any intention to use threats or undue pressure in an attempt to force it through. Before the President made his communication to Congress, they had repeatedly declared that a strike, or the threat of a strike, was no part of their programme, and that if Congress did not choose to act in pursuance of their scheme they would appeal to the people at the polls. If they shall faithfully maintain this attitude, they will be entitled to a fair hearing for their proposal, and may count upon its claims being thoroughly threshed out between now and the national election.

WHAT the President said about strikes was equally meritorious, and was put in impressively persuasive form; but whether it will have the influence to which it is entitled is unfortunately doubtful. Many labor leaders undoubtedly understand that "strikes undertaken at this critical time are certain to make matters worse" for everybody, that "the worst, the most fatal thing, that can be done now is to stop or interrupt production or to interfere with the distribution of goods by the railroads and the shipping of the country." But the temptation to attain an immediate gain is often too great for the virtue of the reasonable leaders, while the extremists take little thought of anything but immediate success or the demonstration of power. The very distinction which the leaders of the fifteen organizations of railroad employees make between their efforts for higher wages or reduced cost of living on the one hand and the adoption of their nationalization scheme on the other, meritorious as it is in itself, points distinctly towards the use of the strike weapon on a great scale in the near future unless their needs are otherwise met. This situation calls for the utmost wisdom in its handling by Congress and by the United States Railroad Administration. Something may be accomplished in the shape of reduced prices of necessities by governmental measures, but surely not enough in a short time to make any notable impression upon living conditions. It is possible that a tendency to lower prices may manifest itself independently of governmental action; but this, too, there is little reason to look for in the immediate future. Accordingly, a prompt and thorough inquiry should be made into the wage question, so that the Government will be prepared to meet the employees upon a basis that will make resort to a strike unjustifiable, and array public opinion solidly against such a move.

THE questioning of Secretary Lansing by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations can easily be made the subject of ridicule. If it be assumed that the purpose of the questioners was to prove that the President had transcended his Constitutional powers, it can easily enough be shown that they are quite ignorant both of law and of the practices of diplomacy. But there is no reason to suppose that that was the object in view. Apart from the desire to get specific information on particular subjects, if the Republican Senators were aiming to make a point against the President, it was not the point of illegality or unconstitutionality. Everybody knows in a general way that the President was the whole thing in Paris. But it is one thing to know it in a general way and another thing to have the fact exhibited in a form that will strike the public imagination as conclusive. Mr. Wilson may have been not only legally justified, but warranted by considerations of wisdom and sagacity, in settling every crucial question according to his own unaided judgment; but it is a perfectly legitimate move in the game to establish the fact. If the Secretary of State had little or nothing to do with the Covenant or with controversial points in the treaty, it is all the more likely that nobody else in the Paris delegation had any influence in the decisions. That of course does not prove anything about the merit of them. But it does accentuate the fact that what the President is demanding of the Senate is an absolute and unquestioning acceptance of the result of his sole individual judgment. Mr. Lansing's appearance before the Senate Committee seems fully to have accomplished what was expected of it.

SENATOR WADSWORTH has introduced the Administration army bill. It marks a great advance in providing for a genuinely national force under easy conditions of universal service. At nineteen, all physically fit male citizens are to receive three months of intensive training, as part of regular units. For two years thereafter, the trained men are bound to report themselves periodically, and in case of war may be called to the colors. As it is estimated that each class would exceed 600,000, there would always be available a partially trained citizen army of 1,200,000, besides the regular army. That is to consist of twenty-one peace-strength divisions, which, with auxiliary services, would require about 510,000 men. The National Guard would be maintained, subject to federalization. On the side of organization and principle the bill is excellent. It involves a minimum of sacrifice, and should provide adequate security. Three months in camp would not merely greatly advantage the individual soldier, but would powerfully work for Americanization of our mixed population. Moreover, three months is about the limit of really intensive work.

The weakness of the bill is the figure set for the regular army. Before the war, it was hard to keep it recruited to 90,000, and it will prove impossible to raise a half million by voluntary enlistment. If any such number is needed, it is utter folly to let the regular army run down to 200,000, which, in view of shortened appropriations, is in immediate prospect. The number proposed in the Chamberlain-Kahn bill, 225,000, seems in every way more reasonable. That should man our stations, provide an instructional force, and as well the nucleus of a mobile army. Nothing more is needed, and nothing less should be considered. Both the Wadsworth bill for universal service and the Chamberlain-Kahn bill for universal training have already aroused short-sighted and provincial opposition from National Guard quarters. To underestimate the political weight of this dissent would be unwise. A considerable campaign of education will yet be necessary before this democracy can be persuaded to handle its military business in a democratic way.

THE balance of trade is highly "favorable" because of the fact that for nearly five years the value of our exports has vastly exceeded the value of our imports, and the difference has been payable—though not paid—in gold. This difference, during the fiscal years 1915 to 1918, amounted to about $10,000,000,000, and could not possibly have been paid in gold, as that amount of gold money does not exist in the world. We have received about $1,000,000,000 in gold and the rest in securities and promises. Of gold money we have now about $3,000,000,000—more than one-third of the world's supply. One result is that the American dollar stands higher in the world's markets than ever before, when compared with the money of other countries. When compared with itself it is cheaper than ever before, but that is another story. The dollar used to be worth 5.18 francs, 5.18 lire, 4.2 marks, 4.93 kroner, or 1.94 rubles; now it is equivalent to 7.73 francs, 9 lire, 40 kroner or 15 rubles. Even the British pound sterling, which was once worth $4.86, now bows before the dollar and offers itself for $4.33, more or less. Of course, if the sovereign, or any other gold coins, were to come over to America in person they would be worth as much as ever, for gold is gold; but as they send only scraps of paper their promises to deliver themselves at some future time are taken at a discount. This is all very fine and "favorable" for us, and extremely gratifying to our national pride, but the upshot of it is that we have parted with our goods and received only gold and promises in return, which do not put food into our stomachs, nor clothes on our backs, nor shoes on our feet, nor do they give us cheap apartments in which to dwell. Like Midas of old, everything that we touch turns to gold, and yet we find it hard to live. Fortunately, our "favorable" rates of exchange are unfavorable to the continuance of this one-sided trade, and when Europe is done borrowing she will import relatively less and export relatively more, while our situation will be the reverse of hers. She will be paying her debts and we shall be receiving payment in things that we can use. This will involve an "unfavorable" balance of trade—not necessarily a decrease in normal exports, but a marked increase in imports and a most desirable fall in the cost of living.

THE New York State income tax law made a shocking muddle of the case of the non-resident who happened to make his living, or a part of it, within the State. Some of its more glaring inequalities were interpreted away by the Controller, but it was still incumbent upon the non-resident to pay the tax of one per cent. on his whole income within the State, with none of the deductions—the same as those provided in the Federal law—which are allowed to residents. The non-resident was further discriminated against in being forbidden to deduct anything for business losses, and the whole arduous labor involved in the particular adjustment of general injustice was placed upon the employer. The decision of the Federal Court that this part of the law is unconstitutional expresses what has been obvious to the plainest citizen. One would think that the Albany legislators might have foreseen this outcome. But it is not certain whether they merely bungled or had some vague notion of raising up a generation of metoikoi in New York City, who should be suffered to do business there under penalties painful to themselves, but perhaps in the short run profitable to the State. If, however, the Constitutional guarantee of equal privileges and immunities means anything, it should regard small infractions with the same eye as big ones. The erection of barriers between States is the last thing to be desired. And if the present decision means, which it by no means certainly does, that non-residents will pay no tax at all this year, heedless legislators may be in the way of receiving a salutary lesson.

CLOSE upon the establishment of the American Legion Weekly comes the Stars and Stripes, mud of the trenches washed off and khaki exchanged for mufti, which proposes to carry on, with some or all of its old editorial staff, as the Home Sector. "The fun-loving, bunk-hating spirit"—if the reborn paper can keep that, as it promises, there will be others besides the old overseas men who will be ready to give it a welcome. It will be remembered that it was solemnly resolved in France to bury the Stars and Stripes with the dispersal of the A. E. F. Let it be hoped that in its new incarnation no one will be reminded why it was that Cervantes felt constrained to kill off his Don Quixote, and Addison his Sir Roger de Coverley. Along with all this, Collier's announces that it provides more information about the American Legion than any other publication except the official organ. There promises to be no lack of opportunity for the returned soldier to make others see him as he sees himself.

HOTEL rates are to go still higher. Nobody is surprised, and some, no doubt, find gratification in the thought that a guest so pays directly for the splendor amid which he lives, and not indirectly by way of an expensive poison which he, or his fellow-guests for him, consumed under a mistaken notion that it was what he wanted. Such people are quite capable of saying, "if you don't like the prices, stay at home." Ah, Marie Antoinette, but there are so many now who have no homes, and can find none, save the warm, but now prohibitively expensive, welcome of an inn. The remedy is perhaps not unattainable. A sober eye does not require for its gratification the barbaric pearl and gold that is supposed to adorn what are somewhat widely known as our luxurious caravansaries, wearied limbs will find repose in a bed that is not of a period, an appetite unjaded with stimulants will find satisfaction in very simple fare. We can not, of course, return to the simplicity of the Eighteenth Century and earlier; the real Puritans, alas, all unsuspecting, held traffic with the demon Rum. But the later "family hotel," on a teetotal basis, managed a harmless sort of existence even in the unregenerate days. Such should be the type and model of the new age. Let us simplify at the top, and there will be a general scaling down all along the line. Now that the beast has been destroyed, perhaps only in this way can entertainment for the man be provided upon terms which he can afford.

BEFORE Chemistry—and that is not so very long ago—was Alchemy. And before Applied Psychology, which is very recent indeed, was Phrenology. The old alchemical dream has never quite faded; there are still people who are hot on the scent of the secret which shall turn base metals into gold, and who are quite untouched by the shocking revelations of Geoffrey Chaucer and Ben Jonson. But alchemy is after all a fugitive in holes and corners; chemistry has established itself beyond the possibility of harm from the survivors of an earlier intellectual day. But the newer science of applied psychology stands in some danger from the activities of the "lunatic fringe," more especially from those who are eager to transmute its rather alluring promise into immediate gold through the agency of correspondence courses. So far as applied psychology can by simple tests anticipate and arrange the judgments of experience and common sense, it can do a good deal to help people to an understanding of the things they are most likely to succeed at, and, even more, of the things they are not—or not yet—fitted to do well. Such tests performed a genuine service in the selective draft; as a means of indicating promise and power they now stand at the entrance gate of some of the colleges; they give promise of useful application to business. And so long as they are used in a way that does not subtly intimidate and discourage, so long as reliance is not placed upon them to the exclusion of other opportunities for a man to demonstrate his quality, they will find an increasing place for themselves. But before this is achieved there must be a heavy mortality among "phrenological" exploiters of the idea.

The Struggle Against High Prices

THE President's address to Congress has started a vigorous endeavor to check, or reverse, the rising tendency of prices. Whatever it may seem possible to do by administrative measures will certainly be done with all the energy that Mr. Wilson and the officials of the executive departments can command; and there is no doubt that Congress will be animated by the same spirit. Apparently even partisan jealousy has, for the nonce, been shoved into the background. The thing comes so close home to the daily need of every man and woman, and is seen, moreover, to be so fraught with possibilities of national peril through its relation to revolutionary discontent, that the ordinary obstacles of petty politics seem, for the time being at least, to have been swept away.

This is not to say, however, that opinion is unanimous, or anything like unanimous, as to what is to be accomplished. Upon the soundness of many of the President's recommendations to Congress, and of his indications of executive policy, there is, indeed, fairly general agreement; the difference of opinion comes in chiefly in the estimate of their importance—of the extent to which the measures proposed are capable of bringing about large practical results in the shape of lowered prices. And it is to be observed that nowhere in the address does the President himself give any, even the most distant, indication of the quantitative value that he attaches to the programme which he lays out. A certain degree of comfort, a certain improvement in the tone of public feeling, will have been imparted by the note he has struck; people will feel that something is going to be done, that their case against the shrinking dollar is not given up by default. But it must be noted that no definite hope of any specified degree of relief is being held out to them. Whether this is to be regarded as a merit or not depends on one's confidence or skepticism as to the extent of the efficacy of the proposed measures.

Upon this point there is room for much difference of opinion; but the reasons for skepticism as regards more than a very moderate degree of relief are unfortunately very strong. Let us take, for example, the matter of monopolistic practices; and in particular, the most conspicuous example of concentrated control of prime necessities, the case of the packers. The Government is rightly setting in motion a thorough-going judicial test of their practices. The nation can not see with indifference the possession by a small group of men of power so enormous and ramifying in so many directions. If the packers have been guilty of violating existing laws, they must suffer the penalty; if, though keeping within the law, they have exercised a power which is baneful either in its direct economic effect upon the public or in its interference with the legitimate opportunities of other men, new measures should be enacted to curb that power. But all these things, be they ever so bad in themselves, may have little or nothing to do with the high cost of living. The comprehensive indictment of the "Big Five" made by the Federal Trade Commission presents an impressive picture of the strangle hold which these corporations have not only upon the meat supply of the United States, but upon that of many other food products in this country, and upon a large portion of the food supply of England, France, and Italy. Coming to the profits accruing from this stupendous business, the Trade Commission says:

The packers' profits in 1917 were more than four times as great as in the average year before the European war, although their sales in dollars and cents at even the inflated prices of last year had barely doubled. In the war years 1915, 1916, 1917, four of the five packers made net profits of $178,000,000.

Now $178,000,000 is a staggering figure,

to be sure. But what does it amount to as related to the cost of meat for, say, half the people of the United States? We must first divide by three, for it is the profits of three years, not of one year. This gives $60,000,000 a year; and the very picture that the Trade Commission draws of the vast ramifications of the monopoly, both into other food products and into foreign countries, requires a big deduction from this figure. Another big deduction must be made, so far as meat is concerned, on account of the great sale of by-products which forms a large part of the packers' business. But let us deduct only one-sixth in all, and we have $50,000,000 as the annual profit in the war years of these concerns, or one dollar per capita for half the people of the United States. Surely, it is not to these two cents a week of tribute paid to the packers that the American people owe much of the difficulty they have had in keeping up with the cost of living, nor would its entire extinction do much to relieve them of their troubles.

Again, consider the question of the accumulation of great stores of food-stuffs. The President is very explicit in his recommendation of legislation limiting the time during which goods may be kept in storage. It is difficult to see how in any large sense, and in any continually effective way, such limitation can operate as a remedy. In popular discussions of this question of storage the obvious fact is constantly forgotten that the man who keeps food-stuffs in storage for purposes of commercial profit can only get that profit when he sells them. A conspiracy in the nature of a corner, or storage on an enormous scale by absolute or almost absolute monopolists, could indeed run prices to fantastic heights, and result in vast profits through the sale of only a part in time of scarcity, in which case the selling of the remainder, even at a comparatively low figure, would be a matter of indifference to the manipulators. But in the present situation nothing of this nature is even charged.

It may or may not be that more food is being put in storage than a sound calculation of the prospects of supply and demand justifies; but it is upon the calculation of those prospects that the operation is based. It will not profit speculative holders to keep eggs or wheat or corn or cotton in storage for six months, or a year, or two years, and then sell them, unless the market prices at the end of six months or a year, or two years, is decidedly higher than the present market price. It is in the belief that this will be the case that the storage—if indeed there is such storage—is persisted in. If the calculation is correct, the effect of the storage will be not merely that accentuation of present scarcity which is so conspicuous in the public eye, but also a corresponding relief of scarcity at a time when that relief will be even more necessary than it would be to-day. Taking the matter by and large, does it seem probable that our lawmakers are more likely by a fixed regulation to bring about an adaptation of supply to demand than are those whose fortunes depend upon their ability to adjust their operations to the facts? If indeed the Government would go further and adopt measures which would act directly upon supply and demand—such as rationing at home or an embargo upon exports—the matter would assume an entirely different aspect. But nothing of this kind appears to be contemplated; and so far as an embargo is concerned, considerations of humanity imperatively forbid it. In the absence of it we can not see how any large or permanent influence in the direction of lowered prices can be exerted by restrictions upon storage for commercial purposes. Hoarding by individuals for personal use is a different matter; the practice of this upon a large scale might produce scarcity when there was nothing in the situation to justify it.

Probably the most hopeful of all the efforts that are now under way is that which relates to retail prices. There is every reason to believe that in normal times the retailers' profit in the staple commodities of everyday use is kept fairly close to the minimum of what is necessary for the purposes of convenient distribution. But at a time when chaotic changes, practically all of them upward, are taking place with great rapidity, the forces which make for normalizing of profits have not time or opportunity to work. The customer is prepared for almost any price that may be asked, and competition does not come into play in time to prevent unreasonable exactions. It is quite possible that with strong effort, whether by legal regulation, by effective publicity, by concentrated effort on the part of citizens and special committees, or by a combination of all these, important results may be achieved. A spirited beginning in this direction has already been made by Attorney-General Palmer in his "fair prices" campaign, which deserves the hearty coöperation of the public.

However all these things may be, it is essential that the general public should understand that the essential cause of high prices lies far deeper than any of the practices of profiteers or hoarders. The enormous expansion of the currency of all countries, including our own, together with that inflation of the circulating medium which is produced by the unprecedented expansion of credits, is of itself sufficient to account for a large part of the rise of prices. The vast diversion of productive energy in Europe, and in a large measure in our own country also, from the creation of useful commodities to the supplying of the demands of war is another factor of perhaps equal potency. The first of these factors will continue to operate with almost undiminished force for at least a considerable time to come. In the case of the second factor there will be, it is to be hoped, a steady and rapid improvement from now on; yet it will be a long time before the productivity, agricultural and industrial, of European countries and the facilities of transportation will be restored to the pre-war level. With normal money resources enormously swollen, and with supplies for the world's prime needs enormously shrunk, the level of prices must necessarily be abnormally high. It is to the recovery of Europe from her desperate condition, and the consequent easing up of demand as compared with supply, that we must look for substantial relief. And there is no reason to suppose that such relief will fail to come within a comparatively near future.

Some mischievous misapprehensions are bound up with the current talk about the "vicious circle" of rising prices. The railroad Brotherhoods say that "the vicious circle is infinite"; and even the President in his address to Congress speaks of "a vicious cycle to which there is no logical or natural end." The temptation to speak in this way is obvious; when we see so exasperating a process continuing so long, it is perhaps natural to throw up our hands and say that it will go on forever unless something extraordinary be done. But in point of fact, though it is quite possible that something can and should be done, yet even if nothing were done the process would not go on indefinitely. In the era of low prices, a quarter of a century ago, the same feeling existed as regards the constantly falling value of the dollar, and it was the assumption that things were sure to go from bad to worse that gave such vitality to Mr. Bryan's great free-silver campaign of 1896. It is true that higher wages call for higher prices, that higher prices in their turn call for higher wages, and so back to higher prices again. But somebody has got to pay the prices, if they are to stand; and a point is reached at last where the prices will not be paid because people haven't the wherewithal in the shape of money to pay them—unless, indeed, a senseless policy of inflation is pursued by the Government. The Brotherhoods say that capital "fixes" the prices at which commodities shall be sold; but nobody has the power to fix prices beyond the capacity of the community to pay them. It may be difficult to keep our heads level on such a point as this at a time when great suffering and hardship are being experienced by millions of people, but nevertheless it is of the utmost importance that we do so. If the evils from which we suffer were really of the character ascribed to them by those who look upon the rise of prices as brought about simply by a cycle of arbitrary increases to which there is no natural check, we should be driven, in the event that minor remedies prove of little effect, to desperate measures whose disastrous consequences no man can foretell. So far from its being "academic" to insist upon the fundamental truths of the relation between prices on the one hand and monetary inflation and productive efficiency on the other, there is no one thing which it is of greater practical importance to keep steadily before the public mind.

Are President and Senate Getting Together?

THE first indication of a break in the deadlock between President and Senate occurred when Senator Pittman of Nevada declared his unqualified approval of every one of the reservations which the seven Republican Senators who are trying to bring about a prompt settlement favor. What Mr. Pittman says is generally understood as representing the President's own attitude. The approval, it is true, was itself accompanied by a most important reservation; for the Senator insisted that the reservations proposed should be made in a separate resolution and not as part of the ratification of the treaty. It may further be pointed out that Mr. Wilson himself had in private conversation used language to almost the same effect, for he had expressed an unqualified belief that what is demanded in those reservations is already contained in the treaty as it stands. Accordingly, Senator Pittman's declaration does not on its face either satisfy the requirements of the conciliatory Republicans or go beyond the President's own informal statements made some time ago. Nevertheless, there is psychologically a great difference. For a step, though perhaps but a small one, has been taken in Administration quarters towards some kind of compromise as regards the actual stand of the Senate in relation to the treaty.

There is no reason why the Republican Senators who have been conscientiously favoring reservations should be content with this small concession. If the reservations are to be effective for their purpose, they must be made part of the ratification. The duty that thus lies upon the Senate is to make the substance and form of the reservations such as will not imperil the settlement, and this duty the seven Senators are scrupulously endeavoring to perform. In any such matter a certain degree of risk must be incurred, and it does not lie in the mouth of either side to charge the other with partisanship or pig-headedness if it insists that not all the risk must be borne by its side in the contention. It is perfectly evident that a body of thoroughly sincere and honest opinion, both in and out of the Senate, regards with profound misgivings features of the Covenant which hold out possibilities of unnecessary and mischievous involvements in the future. It is purposed to remove these possibilities, so far as such removal is practicable, without inviting any serious danger of disturbance of the Versailles settlement. The mere existence of a chance of such disturbance, a chance so small that reasonable men are justified in regarding it as negligible, can not serve as a club to suppress all doubts and objections. The advocates of unreserved ratification declare that the reservationists' fears as regards the future are shadowy and artificial; the moderate reservationists have fully as much right to assert that the uncompromising Administration men's fears as regards the immediate effect of interpretative reservations upon the status of the treaty are exaggerated or imaginary.

The Republican Senate leaders have quite enough to answer for in the blundering and chaotic way in which they have handled the situation. To charge them with a monopoly of partisanship or wrong-headedness is to go quite beyond the mark. The primary responsibility for the state of mind which has all along existed in regard to the question is with the President himself. To say that he had the Constitutional right to carry on the negotiations in his own way is to say what no one seriously disputes. He was under no legal necessity to take counsel either with the Senate or with his own associates in the Commission to Paris. He was under no legal obligation to keep the country informed as to what he proposed to do, or as to what he actually did do from time to time. But in deciding upon the course which he pursued in this regard he had to take its natural consequences. If the result was open to criticism, if the great scheme to which upon his own unaided judgment he proposed to bind the country raised far-reaching issues of permanent national policy upon which intelligent and patriotic men were divided in mind, it was for him to endeavor to win over after the fact the support which he did not feel it necessary to invoke in the course of the negotiations. He has thought fit to do nothing of the kind; apparently his calculation has been that the inherent forces of the situation would of themselves compel assent to his programme. The exasperation produced by this attitude is at the bottom of a great deal of the trouble which has been experienced. If, on the one hand, that exasperation has now in a great measure worn off, and on the other the President is prepared to some extent to revise his calculation, the country is to be congratulated. Let us hope that we are on the eve of a settlement in which both sides will act with the firm purpose of arriving at a prompt and reasonable conclusion.

Andrew Carnegie

IT is no small tribute to Andrew Carnegie that, in the comment aroused by the news of his death, his traits as a man fully divide interest with the magnitude of his colossal fortune, the way in which he acquired it, and the public purposes to which so large a part of it was devoted. Probably no man ever before accumulated such enormous wealth in a lifetime beginning in poverty; and the magnitude of it was hardly more remarkable than the unparalleled economic development of which it was partly effect and partly cause. The industrial era with which Carnegie's name will be associated began after he had reached manhood, and so great have been the changes of recent years that it may be said to have ended before his death. His gifts to the public have been on a scale unprecedented in past times, and rivalled in our own only by those of Mr. Rockefeller. Yet almost everybody's first thoughts on hearing of his death were directed no more to these things than to the picture of the shrewd and humorous Scotsman which has so long been familiar to the American public. A racy personality, self-assertion sometimes crude or naïve but never silly and almost always marked by pungency and sagacity, manifestly sincere devotion to the ideals of individualist democracy, unbounded confidence in the possibilities of human improvement—all this, accompanied by genuine humor and enjoyment of life, has made Andrew Carnegie a figure not only interesting but likable, even to those who find more to blame than to praise in his career as a whole.

In the case of Mr. Carnegie, as in that of Mr. Rockefeller, the two aspects of their vast accumulation—its getting and its spending—evoke conflicting feelings. Between Mr. Carnegie's methods of aggrandizement and Mr. Rockefeller's there were great differences; but the two were alike in the extreme exploitation of the opportunities that existing economic conditions laid open to them. Yet the worst things that can be said of the means by which the Standard Oil monopoly was created are wholly inapplicable to Mr. Carnegie's operations. Carnegie's dominance was built up by the energy and sagacity with which he seized upon every opening for the development of new processes and new methods in the steel industry, his extraordinary capacity for discovering and utilizing the talents of other men, especially young men to whom he opened the way to fortune, and, it is true, also by bold and unsparing strokes in his warfare against competitors; but the systematic and illicit suppression of competition which lay at the base of the Standard Oil monopoly did not enter into Carnegie's programme. As for the exploitation of labor, that is a different matter; Mr. Carnegie was not in advance of his time, and some of the hardships of labor most characteristic of the hardness of the capitalist régime at its acme were experienced by the Carnegie workmen.

In the giving of hundreds of millions for the benefit of their fellow men, both Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller are entitled to praise far above that which attaches to the mere parting with that amount of wealth, when what is left is so far beyond the possible desires of any individual. In both cases, there has been evident an intense interest in the ends to be achieved. In Mr. Rockefeller's case, indeed, there must be recognized a degree of conscientiousness as to the best possible utilization of his benefactions which is probably without precedent. He seems to be guided by an almost entirely impersonal desire to compass the maximum of human benefit with a given expenditure, irrespective of any personal predilection. Mr. Carnegie, more human than Mr. Rockefeller in other respects, was also more human in this. Not only did he quite frankly indulge a harmless but somewhat childish vanity in the persistent affixing of his name to almost all of his countless public gifts, but the direction of them was determined, in the main, by his personal inclinations. It was his own experience, as a poor boy, of the need of books that made the founding of libraries for so long a time the exclusive object of his benefactions; and in nearly all of his later gifts it was causes which he himself had at heart, and not purposes recommended to him by experts, that drew out his millions. But his interests were wide and varied; he loved intercourse with great and wise men, and was stimulated by it not only in his thoughts but in his acts. Whether anything like his career will again be possible in this country, may be doubted. But there was about it something inspiring which may be lacking in a better age. In any case, Americans who wish to do justice to the age that is now passing may look with justified pride on the public spirit of those of our millionaires—and their name is legion—who, whatever faults may be laid to their charge, have been to all the world exemplars of noble use of great wealth.

The Hungarian Tangle

BELA KUN has fled. A million dollars in various currency were taken from him and his ministerial colleagues as he crossed the Austrian border. A Rumanian army holds Budapest, and a Jugo-Slav force will be there before this goes to press. Members of the new Socialist Ministry are held as hostages, and their authority has been flouted by the Rumanian commander. The local representatives of Italy, England, and the United States are endeavoring to restrain the Balkan armies of occupation. The attitude of the French representatives is ambiguous. Within a day of the Rumanian occupation, and evidently in collusion with the conquerors, rebellious Hungarian gendarmes seized the remnant of the Peidl government, and Archduke Joseph proclaimed himself dictator, promising a coalition ministry. To be sure he has waived his hereditary rights and supported the Karolyi government, but he rules not in the interest of the Entente but of the Rumanians, and may reasonably be suspected of dynastic ambitions. The Peace Conference has a new and incalculable fact to deal with. The confusion is a fitting last act for the prolonged tragi-comedy played between Versailles and Buda.

Hungary was the first enemy state to put herself in order for negotiation and in line for clemency, and she has been the worst treated of all. When Count Karolyi proclaimed the republic, last October, the Allies had a friend to deal with and a national mind resigned to the inevitable reckoning. Provisional guarantees of the integrity of old Hungary were given, and the Hungarians, under blockade and hunger, settled down to wait for terms. None were forthcoming. Versailles was busy with future peace. Meanwhile, the armies of Rumania, Czechoslovakia and Jugoslavia pushed over the neutral zone and into Magyar territory. Repeated protests from Count Karolyi demonstrated that the Entente was either unable or unwilling to check its Balkan allies. The Magyars are a proud race, without the Austrian cynicism, and as they saw themselves subjected to piecemeal invasion and dismemberment, and realized that the pledges of the Entente were valueless, they fell into despair. Count Karolyi bore with unauthorized aggressions. When he was formally commanded to turn over to the Allied armies a completely Magyar zone between Hungary and Rumania, his position became untenable, and he yielded the power to the Socialists of his Ministry.

Thus, late in March, opened the dictatorship of Bela Kun, perhaps the shrewdest demagogue in the world today, which is saying much, for the breed abounds. By a wholesale policy of confiscation of wealth he caught the working people. Unquestionably Count Karolyi had faced the desperate expedient of seeking aid from Bolshevist Russia. This became Bela Kun's chief maxim. He has failed, largely because Russia had no surplus of force to lend her unexpected ally. Bela Kun, under the tutelage of Lenin, avoided the more shocking forms of terrorism. He was a bit easy on small landowners, and even on small industrial concerns. His aim was to present Bolshevism in fair and negotiable guise, to gain standing with the Entente, and incidentally to be an advance agent for Russian Bolshevism. He was to be communistic enough to satisfy the Reds and plausible enough to allure the numerous radicals at Versailles. Ultimately the Entente was to recognize the Bolshevist governments of Hungary and Russia.

Towards these ends Bela Kun's policy was very shrewdly framed. It met, however, two obstacles. The Magyars had never had any real zeal for confiscation. It soon became evident that while there was much seizing of property, there was little distribution. A highly individualistic people soon became tired of regimentation. And the Entente, whose permanent folly as regards Hungary Bela Kun was fully justified in predicating, actually had learned something. The conferees at Versailles had seen Hungary shift startlingly from their easiest to their thorniest problem. They declined to deal with Bela Kun except for his abdication. They encouraged the Balkan folk to nibble at the Hungarian boundaries, tightened the blockade, and gave a modicum of military support to the invading armies.

At the end of July, with the Rumanian guns in hearing, Bela Kun fled with his plunder, and a provisional government was set up with a Socialist Ministry headed by Julius Peidl. On August 3 this government addressed Versailles and was promised recognition. The situation had swung back to where it was in October. With the difference, however, that this time the Rumanian army was near. Although forbidden by the Conference to occupy Budapest, 30,000 troops paraded there in triumph, the Rumanian general took the day-old Socialist ministers as hostages, set up a military government, and issued an ultimatum for a burdensome separate peace. All this was pure revenge for the invasion of Rumania. Nothing more was called for by the situation than a police guard in cooperation with the civil authority. The Jugoslavs, who also have an uncompleted revenge, hope to follow the Rumanian example, and the Czechoslovaks are on the way.

Probably an adjustment is somewhere in sight, but there is no ground for rejoicing, except in the fall of the outpost of Bolshevism. And here exultation is tempered by the reflection that, with ordinary considerateness on the part of the Entente, Hungary never would have gone Bolshevist at all. The friendly Karolyi was betrayed, the friendly Peidl has been unnecessarily discredited and humiliated. To a demonstration of folly Versailles has added one of impotence. There could be no better proof of the madness of sacrificing the peace of the present to the peace of all the future than is afforded by the case of Hungary. The acid test for the old Entente and for the incipient Society of Nations is at hand. If Rumania and the new Slavic states can wage a separate war of plunder regardless of the Peace Treaty, why then Central Europe has been Balkanized, and the League is the hollowest of mockeries. It was bad enough not to foresee the result of trusting the work of Europe to Balkan armies. The situation can now be saved only by decisive action which, while reestablishing a people's government in Hungary, shall transfer its military control to France, England, and Italy.

Direct Action and the Public

To say that the public is a third party to every strike is to utter a commonplace to which nobody would give a second thought but for the fact that the country is full of strikes and threats of strikes. The most disturbing feature of the situation is not the temporary inconvenience, however great, but the fact that our industrial system is so highly developed and so specialized that even a temporary stoppage of certain functions, such as transportation, threatens a serious collapse. Syndicalists and other revolutionists are well aware of this and are preparing to strike at the vulnerable point when the time comes; but ordinary unionists also, who have only their own welfare in view, are frequently ready to do the same thing, and it is not clear what defense the general public can make against this mode of attack—a sort of jiu jitsu by which a determined minority can force the majority to grant whatever it may ask. Fortunately, the public is not altogether helpless, as the records of a number of serious strikes clearly show.

The well-known "general strike" in Sweden in the year 1909 is a case in point. It was a strike of "folded arms," without violence, but none the less formidable, for the strikers purposed to abandon all works, except the care of the sick and of domestic animals and the provision of light, water, and sanitation.

At one time as many as 285,000 out of 460,000 wage-earners were on strike. The railway workers and the agricultural laborers, however, stayed at their posts. The strike was especially severe in Stockholm, but there, as elsewhere, the public—that is to say, the middle and upper classes, with a portion of the wage-earners—saved the day by forming a volunteer brigade which carried on all absolutely necessary work until the strike broke down. They manned the tramways, drove automobiles and delivery wagons, supplied food and fuel, loaded and unloaded ships and cars, guarded the waterworks and electric stations, and, in general, kept the industrial machine running, though slowly, until the emergency was over.

A similar strike, though not so general, occurred in Wellington and the other chief seaports of New Zealand in October, 1913, when the waterside workers ceased work for a trivial cause at a time when large supplies of dairy produce were awaiting shipment and cold storage facilities were inadequate to keep them from spoiling. The seamen and coal miners came out in sympathy with the wharf laborers, and there would have been a general strike of transport workers but that the railway men refused to join the movement. Business in the chief cities was almost paralyzed, and for a time the outlook was serious, politically as well as industrially, for the strikers had strong syndicalist leanings, and the "Red Fed," which directed the movement, was closely connected with the I. W. W. of the United States.

The Government determined to maintain order, and the strike was broken by the farmers, who, determined to prevent their produce from being spoiled, formed the backbone of a volunteer brigade in two divisions—the one a body of wharf laborers, the other a body of special police who protected their colleagues from the vengeance of the strikers. With the help of professional people, clerks, and others, they loaded and unloaded the ships and did the work of seamen, but they did not attempt to operate the mines. The watersiders' strike was practically over in three weeks, but the miners held out somewhat longer. After this defeat the "Red Fed" turned its attention to political activity rather than direct action, but the world war broke out before their plans could be perfected.

Still another illustration of the successful defense of a community against a semi-revolutionary attack is found in the recent "general strike" in Winnipeg, which began on May 15 and was not called off until June 26. The cause of the trouble was the refusal of the Vulcan Iron Works, the Manitoba Bridge and Iron Works, and the Dominion Bridge Company to recognize the Metal Trades Council in a dispute about the wages of their employees. The metal workers appealed to all the wage-earners of the city, of whom more than 30,000 responded to the call—a very large number out of a population of about 200,000. Business was completely paralyzed. The city was without mail, telegraph, or telephone service; the street cars stopped, and no daily papers were published except the Labor News; practically all factories and wholesale establishments and most retail stores were closed; there was no gas for cooking, and bread and milk even were hard to get.

A Strike Committee or Council was formed, consisting of about 300 representatives of the unions, and the Rev. W. Ivens, the leading spirit of the strike, announced that two representatives of the City Council would be invited to sit with the Strike Committee at the Trades Hall, and that the new form of government would shortly be in power in all the cities of Canada. The Strike Committee was in effect a Soviet, and went so far as to issue cards permitting bakeries, restaurants, and theatres to remain open; but Mayor Charles F. Gray presently put a stop to this, declaring that he would recognize no such assumption of municipal authority.

Mayor Gray, with the help of General Ketchen, soon had the situation pretty well in hand, and determined that at all costs the city should be supplied with food and water, and that violence should be sternly suppressed. The Strike Committee also discouraged violence, but later on, when the strikers were losing ground, there were two serious outbreaks resulting in a number of casualties. Within a few days of the beginning of the strike a citizens' committee of 1,000 was formed to keep order and to carry on the essential activities of the city, and many thousands more were under arms or sworn in to hold themselves ready in case of emergency. After a while the police force of the city showed signs of disloyalty, and some 176 members were dismissed for refusing to sign an agreement not to take part in any sympathetic strike. Altogether, about 2,000 employees of the municipal, provincial, and federal governments were dismissed for participation in the strike, and the civic employees were severely blamed for going out, as they had but recently signed a contract for a year.

The Winnipeg Great War Veterans' Association at first decided to remain neutral, but later took sides against the strikers as the revolutionary character of the leaders became apparent. The dismissed police were replaced by returned soldiers and by the Northwest Mounted Police, but the direct aid of the military was not required, nor was the city put under martial law. At one time it looked as though the railway men of the three great systems were about to be called out, but later they decided not to strike, and even issued a declaration condemning the whole movement. Sympathetic strikes were declared in numerous other cities, from Vancouver, British Columbia, to Amherst, Nova Scotia, but they had no effect on the final outcome.

It was generally acknowledged that the metal workers had a fairly good case against their employers and that the sympathetic strike might have been successful if their leaders had not early shown the cloven hoof of Bolshevism and thus turned all the conservative elements of the city against them, including the returned soldiers and a considerable part of their own following. The strike was practically a failure early in June, although it dragged on until near the end of the month. On June 16 the employers, with the approval of Hon. G. D. Robertson, Minister of Labor, issued a statement making considerable concessions as to collective bargaining. On the following day nine of the strike leaders were arrested by authority of the Dominion Government, on charge of sedition. These events, however, were results of the strike, rather than causes of its failure. The strike leaders naturally were furious at the final outcome, and one of them made a very significant statement:

There will be no sympathetic strike in future. We will now resort to the ballot. Constitutional measures only for us in the future, but we will have sympathetic elections. We are a majority of the electorate and we will next fall fill the city offices, and every public body, with the friends of labor. Then we will run things.

If organized labor can control the elections, a general strike, or anything like it, is a blow—and possibly a fatal blow—against themselves. If, on the other hand, they are a minority, and, as is the case of the revolutionists, a minority of a minority, an attack on industrial organization or any vital part of it will only cause the public to summon all its powers of resistance to defeat, and, if necessary, to crush the conspiracy. But—and this is the crux of the whole situation—the powers that be, ordained by the will of the people, must not abdicate.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

ROOMAN GILDEA, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

The Middle West and the Soviet

I AM not at all sure that the Middle West knows just how to classify a soviet. I have heard persons speaking of those shocking Russians, Lenin, Trotsky, and Soviet; and though both newspapers and public speakers have been full of the doings of the Bolshevik there are some here who still wonder whether it is a foreign breakfast food or a new poisonous gas. To the question whether they believe in the soviet, the rank and file in these prairie States would promptly answer no. And in general their answer would be correct. They are Americans first—as their attitude in the war has proved beyond shadow of doubt. They fought to preserve the American tradition, and they will have none of these foreign nostrums and quack remedies.

But notwithstanding their downright Americanism and their general devotion to the American tradition, there are some signs in the Middle West that seem to indicate that many persons there are disaffected. The fact should not be glossed over that there are a considerable number of agitators, some quite unselfish, who preach a doctrine altogether dissimilar to that inculcated in the Constitution.

In many respects the programme of the Non-Partisan League in North Dakota, in Nebraska, and in many other prairie States smacks only too ostentatiously of a farmer's soviet. County-owned banks, county-owned newspapers, county-owned means of marketing grain—all this has an unpleasant connotation to those who fear inroads upon our American tradition. It might easily be gathered from a general summary like this that the Middle West—like the Middle West of the days of Populism—had gone stark radical, and was ready to plunge the country into the wildest excesses of political and social experimentation. But in passing it must be remembered that the Middle West to-day is rich—twenty and more years ago, in the heyday of Populism, it was poor, so poor, that Sockless Jerry was a joke only in the Golden East. In many a farmer's barn there is to-day beside the faithful day-laboring Ford a high priced touring car for more formal occasions. At a recent meeting in a south Nebraskan village of less than five hundred I saw drawn up along the curb among Cadillacs, Buicks, and Hudson Super Sixes, at least a dozen Packards of the latest design. The farmer of to-day invests in stocks and bonds. He is a poor man indeed who has not at least $25,000 in Liberty Bonds alone, and only his banker will be able to tell you how heavily he has invested in local and even distant enterprises. No, the Middle West to-day is rich and interested in more than local securities—it is not going to wave unadvisedly the red flag.

But it is still in place to say a word concerning the farmers' pseudo-soviet—the Non-Partisan League. It is not a thing of to-day—its origin was before the war and its leaders men who caught their inspiration before wheat was over two dollars a bushel. Had the war not come, like Populism, it might for a time have swept these States, for there was much talk then, as to-day, of profiteering and corners in wheat, and it was proposed as a remedy that the new party should establish some sort of direct control over the marketing of the farmer's produce by means of elevators and packing plants owned by State or county. It was distinctly a farmers' union to protect the farmer. But to-day it has lent itself, purely for political motives, to the general spirit of unrest, and allied itself with the I. W. W., the sentimental Bolshevik, and the soap-box socialist. Thwarted in its original object by war prices for foodstuffs, it has extended its arms to all who have a grievance; and thus in one large bed lie owners of property who hope by the help of the League to obtain more property, the wayfaring I. W. W. who disbelieves with all his heart in any property save in the name of the combined industry operating it, and the doctrinaire socialist who would make the State final arbiter in eugenics and birth control. It will be interesting in this Noah's ark of social and political ideas to read the editorials of the first State or county owned newspapers.

It is possible even to prophesy that with the possession of political power the League will become conservative. The history of radicalism in every field of thought is a story of succeeding waves of radicals, each of which after a term of storm and stress lapses into a spirit of greater and greater conservatism. It is hard to reconcile anarchy and responsibility. The various schools of medicine are a case well in point. The Homœopaths, as soon as they had become more or less scientific, were followed by the eclectics, and these in turn by the osteopaths, and these last by the chiropractors. The human mind is not so constituted that it will forever wave the red flag of revolt—the call for a settled order and tradition is too strong to be withstood forever. Even the wild delights of a dawn when it is bliss to be alive and to be young very heaven give place in time to a beauteous evening calm and free.

All over these prairie States there were before the war potentially significant farmers' alliances or farmers' unions with the avowed purpose of influencing legislation in favor of farmers. They were radical organizations with much of the programme of the League to smash the control of capital over the buying and marketing of grain and cattle. They all talked State-owned or farmer-owned elevators and packing houses and even railroads; and New York and Wall Street were their modern Carthage. But to-day, reading of the wider excesses of the new radicals, they are creeping back into the fold of the old parties. In Nebraska there is to be a Constitutional Convention this autumn. To be sure, the League has its emissaries abroad, but so also have the older schools of radicals, and these now have united with the traditional political parties and have called in to their aid many of a former stand-pat persuasion.

The Middle West loves to pose as radical, as it loves the circus, and with this love is the adventurous man's eagerness to try anything once, but it loves its property still more; and ingrained with this love of adventure is a hard-headed common sense. It went for Populism with the zeal of a new convert, many of its leaders being men with thoroughly honest purposes, but when they urged upon it violent excesses; many of them not dissimilar to those urged to-day, common sense came to the rescue. The same result would hold to-day; even if the radicals should assume power, their control would be only in name. There will be no attempt to set up a soviet in the Middle West, for the one thing this section loves more than political theories, or constitutional changes, or the voice of the sycophant demagogue, is the call of its own broad and fruitful acres. The love of land is too deeply ingrained here to permit any rival. The Middle West flirts with the ideas of Progressivism, Populism, and a thousand other theories, until it sees that their intentions are serious, then back it goes dutifully to its first love with apologetic fervor. Perhaps we can never cure the Middle West of this habit.

Nor is it paradoxical to say of this prairie country that in spite of its love of radical and sensational posing it is the most conservative section of the country to-day. As a result of a long continued series of courses in political science in its State universities it has, in spite of the lucubrations of some of its chosen Senators and representatives, a more fully developed political consciousness than either the East or the West. It may be true, and probably is, that the very reason it seems so willing to experiment in politics is because it really knows a good deal about politics. Obviously a great deal that has been taught has been wrong, and it has paid dearly for its poor teachers, but these lessons have made it conservative in the head, though at heart it may be radical.

There are several reasons why there should occur these sporadic outbursts of radical socialism in the Middle West in spite of its wealth and general sound sense. During the war the spirit of self-denial and sacrifice and work perhaps went farther on western farms than in eastern urban communities. It is literally true that these farmers who had the wheat and the flour—all they needed and more—skimped and experimented with substitutes on a scale that would put many of us who grumbled in the East and in the army to shame. They bought Liberty bonds and saving stamps with the same zest that before led them to buy each other's farms. Now that the war is over, a natural reaction is on in full blast, and they take the same liberties with the Government a child takes with his teacher when school is out. An irresponsible press report that the American Peace Delegates indulged in any orgy of "booze fighting" at the Hotel Crillon, is to many in this "silly season" an argument for Mr. Townley. And so there is a deal of vapid talk, and a little irresponsible voting. It is an interesting comment, however, that the returning soldier is having nothing to do with the business. In more or less silence he is going back to his farm, and thinking. What he will have to say later will be highly significant, but it will hardly win the applause of any group whose war record is not clean.

But now that the suppressing hand of the war has been lifted, high prices and an inflated currency have brought a renewal of the old gambling spirit of the West. Every one is trying to buy or sell on margins. Some farms change hands two or three times in a season, each time at a considerable advance in price—and this is particularly true of the newly broken semi-arid land near the foothills of the Rockies. Big fortunes have been made by speculators in the narrow compass of a few months, until much of the land in these prairie States has a purely fictitious value.

The natural result is a further stimulation of prices already too high and a feeling of uncertainty about the future. At these feasts of Middle West high finance sits always the skeleton reminder of the day of reckoning to come, of the day when the bills for this day's debauch must be paid in lower prices for land and produce. And, as in the days of Populism, people have fleeting thoughts of turning over the bills to the State to pay, to make it the receiver and legatee of their gambling debts and penances.

There is no severe labor problem in the Middle West—no so-called exploited class—no proletarian group dependent entirely upon shop foreman and time-clock. Yet there has been, even in farm and small factory labor, a feeling of insecurity in the face of high prices and high wages. Labor here has no serious complaint now, when even an unskilled brick maker can command almost the wages of a college professor. It is the feeling of uncertainty about the future that makes him irresolute before the pleadings of a socialist or I. W. W. who promises State guarantees for future labor and future prices.

In short, the Middle West, like the country at large, is wrestling with the enigma of the future. The reason why the farmer soviet is so much talked about is the same, with conditions merely anticipated, which made Populism discussed so shamelessly twenty years ago.

They discussed Populism then, they even voted Populism and sent Populists to Congress; but when it came to acting Populism—their sound common sense saved them. The same thing may happen to-day—it has happened in North Dakota—but it is not likely that it will happen on a large scale. They may make the Non-Partisan League a Middle West platform, but it will not be a stage; they may speak from it, but they will not act on it. There will be no soviet in the Middle West. The Middle West is not made that way.

PHILO M. BUCK, JR.

The Leopard's Spots

IT may be that the character of an individual can change overnight as the result of a revival meeting, but it is unlikely that the change extends to the roots and fibres of his being. When the converted sinner keeps on the straight and narrow path it is generally, if not always, the result of changed environment, of submission to the constant influence of good men. The character of such a huge group of sinners as constituted the German nation can not possibly change overnight. It can change only gradually and under the steadying influence of wise and high-minded leaders. Yet a great many good Americans felt, and still feel, that Germany, by the very fact of the November revolution, had substituted a saintly for a demoniacal character; that it emerged from autocracy full grown in democratic virtue. The better simile would be that of baptism. Perhaps Germany was "reborn," but birth connotes an extreme of immaturity and helplessness. The German character can be, let us hope will be, remade, but the building of the new nation must be even slower than the building of a new man. Germany to-day is an infant with the thoughts of a man, bad thoughts, many of them, that must be eradicated if the world is to live in safety. Its curse is that it has no great men to lead it into sanity. It is drifting, and, as it drifts, the old ideas, halted but not destroyed by the revolution, naturally reassert themselves. Characteristic currents flow out to make trouble for the future just as they did in the past.

It has been asserted to the point of weariness, but must never be lost sight of, that the great trouble is that Germany does not know it was beaten. Germany to-day knows that its plans were foiled, but the mass of the people, in their growing execration of the old leaders, blame them not for having made the plans, but for having failed to carry them through. Blind adoration of the Kaiser is dead; but will the world be much better off if this adoration of the Kaiser is merely replaced by equally blind adoration of the state? The cry is all too frequent in Germany: "The Hohenzollerns have failed us. Democratic Germany will be able to forge ahead into the dominant place that destiny has reserved for our nation." The rest of the world has got to live with Germany and has no right to restrain German progress. All that we must demand is that progress shall be achieved through legitimate means and that the rights of nations shall be respected. The mere overturn of an autocratic government does not and has not yet assured this result.

A few weeks ago a circular letter, purporting to be signed by Erzberger, was delivered to many prominent people throughout Germany. When the letter came into hostile hands Erzberger promptly denied the authorship, claiming that it had been written on purpose to discredit him. Whether or not this is true the letter undoubtedly expresses the ideas of a large part of Germany. The author claims that the war was merely one phase of Teutonic development, and that although Germany is at the moment out of favor, its position is really better than before the war because the Allies no longer hold firmly together. It has a word of advice as to the best means of increasing these misunderstandings and then turns to the favorite German topic of the "Drang nach Osten." Germany's road to the East must be kept open at all costs, especially by preventing Poland from becoming strong. A possibly spurious letter may be poor evidence, but in this case it is supported by facts.

Poland must not be strong because Germany must have free access to the great markets of Russia. Germany therefore pleaded with the Allies to leave her the mines of Silesia, on which so much of Poland's prosperity will depend. She claims that those regions were an integral part of the realm, that although a majority might be Polish-speaking they preferred to remain a part of Germany because of the inestimable benefits resulting from German rule. The Peace Conference made a wise concession in decreeing a plebiscite for large parts of the disputed territories. What Germany hoped then, and probably expected, was that German officials would continue to control until after the vote was taken. Then there would have been no doubt of the outcome, because only those would have voted whose votes could be depended on. But the Peace Conference decided that in the interim the territory should be governed by an inter-Allied Commission. German troops are already withdrawing from the districts and evidently realize that if their return depends on a popular vote they will never return, since they are carrying away with them the stock from the farms and even the furniture from the farm houses. The Germans have been reduced to propaganda, but since democracy has not removed the old officials there are plenty of trained propagandists. The Polish miners are told that Poland will re-introduce the ten-hour day—and this in spite of the fact that Poland has an eight-hour day. They are told that they will have no electric lights and paved streets under Polish rule—although why a change of overlordship should quench the lights and remove paving-stones from the streets is not specified. They are informed that the pension and insurance systems will lapse—and this in spite of the fact that Poland has been instructed to retain them and in any case has equally good systems of her own. It is the old style of propaganda, based on lies. On the border there are clashes daily between German and Polish troops, but since the signing of the Treaty the German hope of creating, through Polish nervousness, a reason for active military intervention is fading. The German officials who have so politely escorted Allied reporters through the territory have shown them what they wanted them to see. This is why some American papers have had accounts of the meetings in Silesia of those in favor of remaining a part of Germany and have failed to record the far greater spontaneous demonstrations, held under fear of savage reprisals by the authorities, in favor of union with Poland.

But to keep Silesia away from Poland is only one of the German plans and is less sinister because the game must, to a large extent, be played in the open. The Ukraine is still, in its western portions, disputed territory. It is largely Bolshevik and the Bolsheviks are fighting the Poles. They are supported by the Germans. The Ukrainian armies are officered by Germans, they have German guns and German ammunition. Their propaganda, their attempts to stir up trouble in adjoining districts, are peculiarily Teuton. More and more are the Ukrainians being bound to Germany, so that, whatever the outcome of the territorial questions, they will remain the debtors of Germany, their territory a friendly road into Russia.

Poland must also be hemmed in to the north, Polish ambitions—often unfair enough, it must be admitted—must be curbed in the Baltic states. The Allies in this region did not quickly realize the German purpose, so cleverly was it hidden. The new states, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, were desperately weak against the armies of Russian Bolsheviks. For a time, therefore, German troops were allowed to remain to assist in the defense. These troops became more and more arrogant, paid daily less regard to the local authorities. After the overturn of the government in Latvia by the Baltic barons, who are mostly German, assisted by German troops, the Allies at last understood that, so far as the independence of the new states was concerned, the Germans were a greater menace than the Russian Bolsheviks, and ordered the German evacuation of the territory. Long before this the local inhabitants had sensed their own danger. They knew that it could not always be chance that whenever the Russians attacked there were no German troops in the defense, that whenever the Russians retreated there were always German troops to occupy the land. It was not lost on them that in many instances when the Bolsheviks advanced the territory behind them was found to be occupied by Germans. It was evident enough that the defenders within the city were in complete accord with the attacking forces beyond the walls. Germany's road to the east along the Baltic littoral is closed, or nearly closed, for the moment, but it will not be permanently closed until Russia has been re-organized by a really democratic leader, be he Kolchak or some other yet to arise.

There is an eastward road farther south that leads through Hungary and Bulgaria. This road also Germany wants to keep open for her commercial armies of the future. But here again the newly democratic German does not see that victory may come as well by fair dealing in open competition as by intrigue. The exact relations between Germany and the Hungarian Bolsheviks have been and still are carefully hidden. The whole policy of Count Karolyi was based on friendship with the Allies. When they failed him—or when he believed they had failed him—he turned the government very near to the communists. Bela Kun and his tribe are anti-Ally. They depend on Lenin, secretly on Germany. One instance, too little noticed, is enough to prove this. Four months ago, the Red Army of Hungary was little better than a rabble. A few weeks ago it attacked the Czecho-Slovak army, made up largely of veteran troops, and drove them back a hundred miles and more. How was this possible? The answer is that Bela Kun, under instructions from the Germans, had introduced strict discipline. His army was officered by Germans who, in a few weeks, turned a rabble into an efficient fighting force. In making the Red Army efficient, Germany knew that it was prolonging a period of disorder, and this is everywhere the German aim. Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, Rumania, the Baltic Provinces, must be kept in such a state of unrest on the borders that they will have no opportunity for orderly self-development and the establishment of stable governments. The best method, under present circumstances, appears to Germany to be the encouragement everywhere of Bolshevism or that state of radical unrest which finally issues in Bolshevism.

This German manipulation of Bolshevism is perhaps the most serious danger facing the world at the present time. It extends not only to support of the Soviets in Russia and in Hungary. It includes as well the support of radicalism in every country, carried on mainly for the broad purpose of demoralizing Germany's rivals, sometimes for the narrow purpose of securing a specific advantage. For example, there have been serious dock strikes in Denmark, the strikers supported by German money. Quite recently a steamer, loaded and ready to sail for America, was held up for lack of coal. A little group of men offered to put the coal on board at a rate approximating $7 an hour. Rather than sustain the greater loss of delayed sailing the company paid. This sort of thing is to the interest of Germany specifically, in that it must have the effect of diverting trade from Copenhagen to Hamburg and Bremen. The tragedy is that German agents play on the passions of the ignorant, persuading them to strike, not for their own advantage, but to destroy their very means of permanent livelihood for the benefit of German interests.

It may fairly be said, of course, that German support of Bolshevism, although of imminent danger to the rest of the world, may mean the ultimate ruin of Germany's own plans. The German is playing a desperate game for high stakes. The highest stake of all is Russia. Germany has announced the resumption of trade with Soviet Russia. It must have been German ammunition that has driven the Kolchak forces eastward from the Urals—must have been, for the Bolsheviks are making little or no ammunition. The Bolsheviks attacking the Baltic provinces used German gas shells, in spite of the fact that the German troops were associated with the defenders. Whenever, in this region, the Germans retreated they purposely left their ammunition to fall into Bolshevist hands. German experts have been sent to Moscow to assist in the nefarious enterprise of manufacturing counterfeit money. The Germans are thus trafficking with the Bolsheviks both along the lines of open support—economic and military—and through assistance in practices which even the most ardent advocates of Bolshevist doctrine admit to be immoral except, perhaps, as temporary measures. With the almost universal collapse of belief in individual rights has appeared, also, a passive acceptance of the theory that any means are justifiable if they tend to a good end. But few people outside of Germany will contend that German domination of Russia through a continuance of Bolshevism, outwardly despised and at the same time manipulated by German agents, would be a worthy end.

The great hope is that Germany, in thus for selfish ends supporting the Soviet Governments of Russia and Hungary, will lose the very commercial mastery for which she aims. Few people, except the shallowest radicals, believe that Bolshevism as a system can survive. When its fall comes, will not the liberated peasants and artisans look about them and ask, "Who supported this odious thing which has so nearly wrecked our country?" Unless Germany has been extraordinarily successful in hiding what she has done the answer will be plain, and the freed peoples may well turn in anger and disgust from the guilty nation.

It is necessary for the world that Germany should again become strong and sound, but equally necessary that German regeneration should be moral as well as physical. Until Germany eschews deceit as she has eschewed the Kaiser, until new men with new ideas arise who have a finer sense of international and other-national rights, the Allies must not close their eyes to what is going on. This is necessary for their own safety, for the safety of the new children in the society of nations, for the sane upbuilding of Germany herself. Declarations of righteousness must be supplemented by scrupulously honorable deeds.

EXAMINER

On Cultivating the Fundamentals

NO service is done to education by anyone who tries to introduce new subjects at the expense of the fundamentals. The fundamentals are few, and they are easily recognizable. There is never any trouble in securing a consensus as to the indispensability of reading, writing, and spelling—the manipulation of the national tongue—and of an acquaintance with geography and with numbers and computation. Without such knowledge a person can hardly expect to get on at all in modern life; the experience of the race, over many generations, has made these subjects traditional. And now we are coming to see that both individual and national well-being call also for those studies, in earliest youth, whose pursuit leads to knowledge of the human body and of the laws of health. There is no tradition behind this fundamental, but a strong national persuasion is developing among the better educated classes, and hygienic living, if not adopted voluntarily, is likely to be imposed upon the stupid, indifferent, or recalcitrant. It is fair enough to call physical education a fundamental. But since its future seems bright enough, and since the tendency is to extend rather than to encroach upon and limit it, there is no occasion to defend its claims as, it is to be feared, there is occasion to stand up for the traditional subjects.

The assumption seems to be that any one can teach the "three R's"—that they are easy to deal with. It is not so. Like anything else worth while, they are difficult in themselves; and they are rendered the more redoubtable to the instructor because they come first. The teaching of a second modern language would lose a large proportion of its arduousness and have greatly augmented prospects of success if the student but knew his own mother-tongue thoroughly and accurately. There would be no need to study Latin in order to understand linguistic structure, if English grammar had been thoroughly taught. Many of the exasperations of college teachers of economics would disappear if the students could carry out simple arithmetical computations with exactitude. In short, we have here something basic; and the transmission of it is the harder because it is basic and thus involves the making of a beginning—the getting of a foothold. It is no function to be intrusted to greenness, frivolity, and inexperience.

This earliest teaching, besides, is that which holds the strategic point in the formation of mental habits. The material it encounters is highly plastic; there is, as yet, not so much to unlearn. If the home were a school for life, as it ought to be, instead of a chaos devoid of discipline, or a hothouse, as it so often is, there would be a still smoother tabula rasa ready for the stylus of those who are called upon to write first. In any case, however, these latter have an opportunity to cultivate the by-product of mental discipline such as none of their successors can ever have. But this by-product is, after all, pretty nearly the main thing in the educational process; it is a by-product only in the sense that it, like character, can not be sought directly, but arrives as a consequence of doing definite duties, voluntarily or under compulsion. It is better, perhaps, a sort of emanation or synthetic product—a quintessence that comes out of the faithful and repeated expressing of minor essences or essentials.

A mind is disciplined, not by reason of the quantity of related or unrelated matter that has been displayed before it, or crammed into it, but when it has learned to confront the difficult with intrepidity, relying upon methods of attack which it knows it can use with dexterity and precision because it has been using them right along, and which are in the available kit of tools just as the carpenter's saw and chisel lie in his chest sharp and ready for the grip of his hand. Mental discipline is a matter of the quality of instruction, and the quality of the mental application demanded by the instructor, rather than of the quantity of subjects presented. Hence a few proper subjects, in qualified hands, are enough to make a start with.

It is well that the fundamentals are few; and it is highly desirable that they shall have the whole field to themselves until, at the hand of competent instruction, they are thoroughly learned and assimilated. For they are difficult enough to afford a wholesome resistance to assault, calling for a strain and tension conducive to the strengthening of intellectual sinews; and the methods by which they can be reduced are the stock methods of all intellectual siege-operations. If any one has these fundamentals early, thoroughly, and exhaustively ground into his very being, there are not many intellectual gyrations that he can be called upon to perform for which he will not have the adequate mental musculature and stamina. He will have plenty of time later on, and also the capacity, to pick up a collection of the graces for himself.

Therefore there is the strongest objection to crowding upon and interfering in any way with the thorough learning of the fundamentals; and if any one who holds the foregoing views undertakes to advocate new studies in the schools to meet the spirit and opportunities of the time, it is understood that he is offering a challenge to the less fundamental parts of the curriculum alone.

If the earliest school years are as determinative as they have been asserted to be—if the proverb, "As the sapling is bent, so is the tree inclined," is applicable in this connection—then a plea for better education must begin with a call for better primary instruction. It is perhaps bootless to recall the fact that many members of former generations got a substantial start in the old district schools, under the ministrations of some crotchety dominie who, perhaps, did not go very far, but was thorough as far as he went, and a disciplinarian always; who made keeping school his life-work, was proud of it, and enjoyed the respect of a community that was proud of him. With the concentration of population and its attendant social adjustments the day of such characters has passed; but it sometimes appears that their after-types are discharging their functions with no such steadiness of purpose and success. Perhaps these after-types know so much more that they are above their jobs. Perhaps for this reason, and because so many of them are young women, with destiny as wife and mother summoning them, they look upon their teaching as a temporary stage in their life-careers rather than as an important service to society, and an end in itself. With all deference to thousands of good women throughout the land, there ought to be more men in the elementary schools, especially in schools for boys. Boys are not by nature docile; they need the strong hand; and then, too, they are inclined to hold anything that seems to be typically "woman's work" in slighter esteem. There is a prestige and also a wholesomeness to be gained for elementary education by getting more men teachers into it; as things are, it is too one-sidedly unmasculine.

But it is almost laughably utopian to expect men to go into the teaching of letters and numbers. A college professor often feels that his students hardly regarded his instruction in trigonometry or history as real man's work; they may, later on in life, but that does not help his standing and efficiency while they are under him. The dominie "has it on him," as the saying goes, in this respect; for there no longer exists that reverence for learning per se that people used to have. And this altered attitude, which reserves its applause for the verb "to do" rather than the verb "to be," and is too impatient to see that first the blade and then the ear must precede the full corn in the ear, has its inevitable reflection in both the material and the immaterial rewards of the profession. If the best college seniors scarcely contemplate college teaching as a career, how can any one expect strong and ambitious men to go into primary teaching? How, indeed, can you expect any one, man or woman, to take up that occupation except as a stop-gap, or to continue in it except with discontent and a numbing sense of frustration and failure?

There are inalterable social laws that set the conditions of social recognition and recompense for all the various vocations. It would appear that they do this, in many cases, independently or in defiance of the findings of reason. Theoretically everyone believes in sound education; nevertheless, in practice, that prime desideratum can not be attained in full measure because the rewards of service in this line are far below the grade necessary to attract the most highly competent into it. It is not desirable that the rewards shall stand comparison with those in, say, business; for the best teaching must always have in it the elements of disinterested enthusiasm and of self-sacrifice. But no one who is not a fanatic can contemplate a life, for himself and his, in which the proportion of sordid care is prospectively so great.

It is impossible to offer any solution of this, the ultimate crux of the educational problem. If popular sentiment for education were strong enough—if people prized it as highly as they think they do—the solution would doubtless appear. But when everyone freely admits that general education is a good thing, and lets it go at that, there seems to be no point d'appui at all. There is no heat generated, not even that of controversy. It is probable that there is need of some startling revelation to transform a theoretical but indifferently held persuasion into something more alive and efficient. Perhaps the war has done something to awaken sensibilities in this direction, as in so many others. In any case, the happenings of the past few years have somewhat altered the mood of the teachers, who seem inclined to less patience and resignation in their lot than heretofore. If the profession, having become impoverished, should now be deserted by the remaining desirables, perhaps it will have struck rock-bottom at length, and may start to rise.

The time now to come will call for education as never before. We have pretty well exhausted the natural advantages which we have had for the asking, and we have got to know more, as a nation, in order to hold our own in the closer competitions that are coming. All education, but especially the fundamentals, must be better done if we are to adjust and reconstruct under the imminence of altered life-conditions. But education demands schools; and schools are not mere piles of inorganic matter, however elaborately fashioned. A school is an atmosphere, generated by a teacher—a mere log, if the compelling personality sits at one end of it. The present pressing problem of education is the personnel of the faculties, and especially of those that attend to the elementary fundamentals.

A. G. KELLER

Herman Melville

II

IN 1849, about two years before "Moby Dick," appeared that strangest of allegories, "Mardi, and a Voyage Thither." The two works are companion pieces: "Mardi" is a survey of the universe in the guise of an imaginary voyage of discovery, "Moby Dick" is a real voyage skilfully used to illustrate the cosmos; "Mardi" is a celestial adventure, "Moby Dick" an infernal. "Mardi" is highly general—the quest of a mysterious damsel, Zillah, a sort of Beatrice, a type of divine wisdom; "Moby Dick" is specific, the insanely vengeful pursuit of the dreaded white whale. The people of "Mardi" are all abstractions, those of "Moby Dick" among the most vivid known to fiction. "Mardi" was far the most ambitious effort of Melville's, and it failed. Personally I like to read in it; for its idealism tinged with a sane Rabelaisianism, for its wit and rare pictorial quality, for the strange songs of Yoomy, which, undetachable, are both quaintly effective in their context, and often foreshadow oddly our modern free verse. It is often plethoric and over-written, it drops out of the Polynesian form in which it is conceived, and becomes too overt preaching and satire. It justifies the Bacchic philosopher Babbalanja's aphorism—"Genius is full of trash"; but it is also full of wisdom and fine thinking. It represents an intellectual effort that would supply a small library, and I suppose it is fated to remain unread. Perhaps its trouble is its inconclusiveness. Again Babbalanja is enlightening:

Ah! my lord, think not that in aught I've said this night, I would assert any wisdom of my own. I but fight against the armed and crested lies of Mardi, that like a host, assail me. I am stuck full of darts; but tearing them from out me, gasping, I discharge them whence they came.

The very seriousness of "Mardi" tells against it. One feels something, a breaking heart under the literary horse-play. Thus it can not hold its own either with such neatly fashioned ideal republics as Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward," nor with the Horatian elegance of Samuel Butler's "Erewhon," nor of course with the grim impassivity of "Gulliver's Travels." The occasional delver in "Mardi," however, will pluck out of it all sorts of surprises from foreshadowings of the superman to an anticipation of Samuel Butler's vitalism.

"Moby Dick" has the tremendous advantage of its concreteness. Captain Ahab's mad quest of the white whale imposes itself as real, and progressively enlists and appalls the imagination. Out of the mere stray episodes and minor characters of "Moby Dick" a literary reputation might be made. The retired

Nantucket captains, Bildad and Peleg, might have stepped out of Smollett. Father Mapple's sermon on the Book of Jonah is in itself a masterpiece, and I know few sea tales which can hold their own with the blood feud of Mate Radney and sailor Steelkilt. The style still has the freshness and delicate power of "Typee," but is subtler. Take the very modern quality of a passage which a Loti might envy:

It was while gliding through these latter waters that one serene and moonlight night, when all the waves rolled by like scrolls of silver; and by their soft, suffusing seethings, made what seemed a silvery silence, not a solitude; on such a silent night a silvery jet was seen far in advance of the white bubbles at the bow. Lit up by the moon, it looked celestial; seemed some plumed and glittering god uprising from the sea.

There is also a harsher note befitting the theme. The tang of it is in the passage with which this essay opened. The tragic and almost incredible motive of the quest of the demon whale gains credibility from the solid basis of fact, as mad captain Ahab himself is based, so to speak, on his ivory leg. The insane adventure itself grows real through the actuality of its participants: Was there ever such a trio as the savage harpooners? Their very names, Feddalah, Tashetego, Queequeg, are a guarantee of good faith. A reader instinctively hurrahs at the deeds of such mates as Starbuck and Stubbs while with them he cowers under the fateful eye of Captain Ahab. Throughout the book are shudders, sympathies, and laughs.

But "Moby Dick" is more than what it undisputedly is, the greatest whaling novel. It is an extraordinary work in morals and general comment. In the discursive tradition of Fielding and the anatomist of melancholy, Melville finds a suggestion or a symbol in each event and fearlessly pursues the line of association. As he and Queequeg plait a mat on the same warp, the differing woofs and resulting surfaces become a symbol for man's free will asserting itself against the background of fate. Such reflections are in a grave, slow-moving style in which Burton has counted for much and Carlyle for something. It is the interplay of fact and application that makes the unique character of the book. As for the Christian fathers the visible world was merely a similitude or foreshadowing of the eternal world, so for Melville the voyage of the Pequod betokens our moral life in the largest sense. An example may best show the qualities and defects of the method. "Ishmael" (Herman Melville) is at the wheel at night gazing at the witches' kitchen of "trying out" the blubber. The glare sends him into a momentary doze and a strange thing happens:

Starting from a brief standing sleep, I was horribly conscious of something fatally wrong. The jaw-bone tiller smote my side, which leaned against it; in my ears was the low hum of sails just beginning to shake in the wind. I thought my eyes were open: I was half conscious of putting my fingers to my lids and mechanically stretching them still farther apart. But, spite of all this, I could see no compass before me to steer by; though it seemed but a minute since I had been watching the card, by the steady binnacle lamp illuminating it. Nothing seemed before me but a jet gloom, now and then made ghastly by flashes of redness. Uppermost was the impression, that whatever swift, rushing thing I stood on was not so much bound to any haven ahead as rushing from all havens astern. A stark, bewildered feeling, as of death, came over me. Convulsively my hand grasped the tiller, but with the crazy conceit that the tiller was, somehow, in some enchanted way, inverted. My God! what is the matter with me, thought I. Lo! in my brief sleep I had turned myself about, and was fronting the ship's stern with my back to her prow and the compass . . .

Look not too long in the face of the fire, O man! Never dream with thy hand on the tiller! Turn not thy back to the compass; accept the first hint of the hitching tiller, believe not the artificial fire when its redness makes all things look ghastly. Tomorrow, in the natural sun, the skies will be bright; those who glared like devils in the forking flames will show in far other, at least gentler relief; the glorious, golden, glad sun, the only true lamp—all others but liars.

Upon the reader's slant towards this sort of parable will very much depend his estimate of "Moby Dick." Are we dealing with trimmings or essentials?—that is the critical question. Cut out the preachments, and you will have a great novel, some readers say. Yes, but not a great Melville novel. The preachments are of the essence. The effect of the book rests on the blend of fact, fancy, and profound reflection, upon a brilliant intermingling of sheer artistry and moralizing at large. It is Kipling before the letter crossed with Sir Thomas Browne, it comprises all the powers and tastes of Herman Melville, is his greatest and most necessary work. So while no one is obliged to like "Moby Dick"—there are those who would hold against Dante his moralizing and against Rabelais his broad humor—let such as do love this rich and towering fabrique adore it whole-heartedly—from stem to stern, athwart ships and from maintruck to keelson.

In a sense "Moby Dick" exhausted Melville's vein. At thirty-two he had put into a single volume all that he had been in action, all that he was to be in thought. The rest is aftermath, yet it, too, is considerable. The year after "Moby Dick," 1852, appeared "Pierre, or the Ambiguities." Legend assigns the author's swift obscuration to the dispraise "Pierre" aroused. It is too simple an explanation, as we shall see. The book is repellent and overwrought, yet powerful. The theme is the endeavor of a long-parted brother and sister, a mere lad and lass, to cut loose and lead their own lives, as nominal husband and wife. The ambiguity of their situation leads to misery, madness, and ruin. Convention triumphs over a boy's genius and chivalry, as over a girl's unmeasured tenderness. The struggle is painful, without winning much sympathy. The moral that one must somewhat bend to things as they are is almost commonplace. The demonstration is powerful, but without much sequence; reflection and satire burgeon over the mishaps of the luckless brother and sister, as if the red, red rose and the briar should finally conceal the twin tombs of the ballad lovers. Yet as a literary curiosity "Pierre" is worth reading, and it is at least a curious coincidence that it completely anticipates in wire-drawn fashion what was soon to be the leading motive of "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel." The parallel is commended to would-be doctors of philosophy.

In 1863 Herman Melville sold "Arrowhead" to his brother Allan and soon went to New York and obscurity. A disastrous driving accident in 1864 and the resultant shock for months sapped the nerve of the former whaleman, and when he emerged it was to a new and smaller life. Family cares now pressed upon him, and in 1865 he took a position as customs' appraiser, humble duties which he exercised at the old Gansevoort Market for upwards of twenty years. He lived, a cheerful and courteous recluse, satisfied with his books and his home. Literary New York forgot him and social New York never knew him. Shortly before his death the magnanimous poet-critic, Edmund Clarence Stedman, managed a complimentary dinner for him, and with difficulty got him to attend it. It was about the only public recognition he ever received. I had the pleasure of seeing the home in which he died, an apartment in the now vanished "Florence," at 18th Street and Fourth Avenue. It was the mellowest home I have ever seen in Manhattan. There was a fine portrait of the Gansevoort grandsire, by Sully after Stuart; Washington Alston would have highly approved the prints after Claude and Salvator, and Charles Lamb would have reveled in the lustrous brown folios of the old English worthies. The simple old furniture was worthy of the rest. I liked to think that Herman Melville's last anchorage was in so sweet a port.

Perhaps Melville had written himself out, lasted just as long as his incomparable sea material, and no longer. For a smaller man the explanation would be adequate, as it is the simplest. I rather think poor health and brooding must chiefly account for the collapse. Among the numerous aphorisms in "Pierre" we read, "When a man is really in a profound mood, then all merely verbal or written profundities are unspeakably repulsive, and seem downright childish to him." And again, "Yoke the body to the soul, and put both to the plough, and the one or the other must assuredly drop in the furrow." "Pierre" is one long parable of living too intensely morbidly, and individually. It probably reflects a personal struggle of the author for a mental equipoise which he attained at the cost of surrender of old activities and ambitions. Meanwhile he had greatly isolated himself. By telling the truth about the Polynesian missionaries he had sorely ruffled the devout, and had increased the offense by skeptical asides in his novels. From the New England writers, most of whom too clearly revealed "the striped origin of their German and Neo-Platonic origins," he stood off. He came to a New York in the literary doldrums. Solitude easily became a habit which stuck.

For recreation he still occasionally turned to verse, but nothing except "Battle Pieces," 1866, was even intended for the public. Of the war poems only "Sheridan at Cedar Creek" is remembered—

Shoe the steed with silver
That bare him to the fray is deservedly in the anthologies. There are single lines and stanzas in the volume that are thrilling. The poems to the Swamp Angel, the great gun that reduced Charleston, is fine, as a stanza proves, in sustained irony and symbol:

There is a coal-bleak Angel
With a thick Afric lip
And he dwells (like the hunted and harried)
In a swamp where the green frogs dip
But his face is against a City
Which is over a bay of the sea,
And he breathes with a breath that is blastment,
And dooms by a far decree.

There are again striking anticipations of the terse and sententious method that Kipling was to make famous. Kipling himself might have thought this prophetic stave to the Monitor's victory:

Hail to victory without the gaud
Of glory; zeal that needs no fans
Of banners; plain mechanic power
Plied cogently in War now placed—
Where War belongs
Among the trades and artisans.

Melville had rather the soul of a poet than great poetical capacity, or facility, but there is power and probity in his feelings that atone for halting verse and occasional makeshift rhyme. He is too original a figure in American poetry ever to be quite forgotten.

After "Battle Pieces" the rest with Melville if not silence is whisper. He sunk resignedly into his habits. In a literary way he was not idle. I have seen in manuscript an historical novel, half a dozen short stories, a volume of lyrics and some long narrative poems, but have had no opportunity to read this unpublished material. For a time Melville had the genial and accomplished Richard Henry Stoddard as an associate in the customs office. Towards the end he was in correspondence with the English writer of sea novels, W. Clark Russell. But in general Melville's situation was that which he treats in the privately printed poem, "John Marr," printed in 1888—a disillusioned mariner living by great memories and by family affection, drawing ever more aloof from the surrounding world.

In his early fifties Melville made the Mediterranean trip, leaving certain memories of it in his two privately printed volumes of verse and more comprehensively in the reflective poem, "Clarel, a Pilgrimage in the Holy Land." Of those who have actually perused the four books and two volumes of "Clarel" I am presumably the only survivor. Yet there are in "Clarel" vividness, humor, irony, and mind-stuff sufficient to stock the entire imagist school; only the blend was never quite right and the fashion of the poem has passed. Melville brings a group of flippant and serious skeptics, theologians, men of action, poets, and traders into Palestine and notes their reaction to the legend, scenery, and shrines of the Holy Land. There are charming lyrics, sharp and well-seen descriptions. The problem of faith and doubt is turned over in every sense, the bearing of both on public and private morals is constantly adumbrated often with prophetic intuition.

Arts are tools;
But tools, they say are to the strong;
Is Satan weak? weak is the Wrong?
No blessed augury overrules;
Your arts advance in faith's decay;
You are but drilling the new Hun
Whose growl even now can some dismay;
Vindictive in his heart of hearts,
He schools him in your mines and marts—
A skilled destroyer.

This should show the vigor of the thinking in "Clarel," and prepare the way for its eminently Victorian conclusion. Melville admits all the doubts, but quand même let the individual hold his modicum of faith in humanity and a God, and his hope in immortality.

If Luther's day expand to Darwin's year,
Shall that exclude the hope—foreclose the fear?

* * * * *
Yea, ape and angel, strife and old debate,
The harps of heaven and dreary gangs of hell;

Science the feud can only aggravate—
No umpire she betwixt the chimes and knell;
The running battle of the star and clod
Shall run forever—if there be no God.

* * * * *
Then keep thy heart, though yet but ill resigned—

Clarel, thy heart, the issues there but mind;
That like the crocus budding through the snow—

That like a swimmer rising from the deep—

That like a burning secret which doth go Even from the bosom that would hoard and keep;
Emerge thou mayst from the last whelming sea
And prove that death but routs life into victory.

With its patent longueurs and lapses "Clarel" is about all America has to show for the poetical stirring of the deeper theological waters which marked the age of Matthew Arnold, Clough, Tennyson, and Browning. And we need not be ashamed of our representation.

In the deepening twilight of his later years Melville printed for private circulation two little pamphlets of verse, "John Marr and Other Sailors," 1888, and "Timoleon," 1891. Here and there are flashes of the old genius which the Melvilleite will cherish, many fine lines and no quite fine poems. The little brochures were fittingly dedicated to W. Clark Russell and to Elihu Vedder, artists who respectively accord with the objective and the mystical side of Melville's vein.

I have left myself little scope for discussing the problem of Melville's decline. He seemed written out at thirty-two, when most authors are just beginning to strike their gait. Yet it should not be forgotten that not even the most neglected works of his are negligible for a reader who values rich idiosyncrasy. "Pierre" is perhaps the only positively ill-done book, and it is stuffed with memorable aphorisms. Amid the somewhat dreary wastes of "The Confidence Man" are numerous tidbits of irony and wit. "Israel Potter" contains the best account of a seafight in American fiction. But it is undeniable that after "Moby Dick" Melville never conceived a good book—"White Jacket" was a hang-over; his inventive processes became uncertain and fluctuating, the moralist in him eclipsed the man of letters. The extraordinary artistry, the ineffable magic of words so frequent in his beginnings becomes intermittent and rare. The new sententiousness and oracular eloquence never quite fulfill themselves. What he lacked was possibly only health and nerve, but perhaps even more, companionship of a friendly, critical, and understanding sort. In London, where he must have been hounded out of his corner, I can imagine Melville carrying the reflective vein to literary completion. As sensitive a friend as the poet Stoddard has written: "Whether any of Melville's readers understood the drift of Melville's mind, or whether he understood it himself, has often puzzled me." Yet there seems no mystery in the ambition to make great fulness of life contribute to fuller understanding of life's deeper enigmas. Robert Browning would readily have seen what Melville was driving at.

If Melville relatively failed in the synthesis he sought, he left the evidence of its possibility in "Moby Dick." In sheer capacity to feel most American writers look pale beside him. Out of his loins grows the recent "strong school." They have nothing in common with him but his emphasis. At his best he commanded a witchery of words beyond any American save only Edgar Allan Poe. He combined in an extraordinary degree impressionistic delicacy and precision with emotional and mental vigor, and withal robust humor; he was both drastic and refined, straightforward and deeply mystical, precious, and delightfully homely. He felt keenly the task of harmonizing so many opposites, and perhaps has left the sufficient key both to his ambitions and disappointments in one of the poems of "Timoleon." With it we take leave of the most personally alluring of American men of letters:

ART

In placid hours well-pleased we dream
Of many a brave unbodied scheme.
But form to lend, pulsed life create,
What unlike things must meet and mate;
A flame to melt—a wind to freeze;
Sad patience—joyous energies;
Humility—yet pride and scorn;
Instinct and study;—love and hate:
Audacity—reverence. These must mate,
And fuse with Jacob's mystic heart,
To wrestle with the angel—art.

FRANK JEWETT MATHER, JR.

Correspondence

How Women Vote

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The prophecies of J. Rogers in his letter of July 12 have a strangely familiar sound. For many years the public has been hearing from suffragists of the marvelous things which would happen when women vote; but in cities where women do vote proof of these claims is startlingly absent.

Mr. (?) Rogers claims that the vote will give to women "a new sense of municipal responsibility" and will insure "the passing of the bartender." Would he be interested to know that at the February primaries in Chicago, when it was to be decided whether the city's notorious Mayor was again to be the Republican candidate, and whether a worthy Democrat was to oppose him, that out of the 660,000 women eligible to vote, more than half a million stayed away from the polls, showing no sense whatever of municipal responsibility? And that of the 135,000 who did vote by far the largest number cast their ballots for Mayor Thompson, who received more than six times as many women's votes as the reform candidate who ran against him? It is under woman suffrage that Chicago has earned the verdict of our returned soldiers of being "the most despised city in the United States." In regard to "the passing of the bartender" Mr. (?) Rogers may be interested to know that two out of three of the women who voted in Chicago voted in favor of saloons, and that California under woman suffrage has twice defeated Prohibition.

At a suffrage meeting in Boston a suffrage speaker when confronted with disconcerting facts exclaimed indignantly, "Facts? What do I care about facts? Facts have nothing to do with this question!" Unfortunately this attitude seems typical of the psychology of adherents of "The Cause."

MARGARET C. ROBINSON

"The Clearing," Jaffrey, N. H., July 16

The Cost of Living

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the usual American home 44 per cent. of the nutritive value of the food consumed is in the form of bread and milk. Each year the average American consumes bread made from five bushels of wheat, and this gives him 38 per cent. of his total food supply. The same five bushels of wheat in the process of milling yield nearly enough bran (80 pounds) to supplement the rough fodder of cows in the production of approximately 100 quarts of milk for the annual use of the individual. This fulfills about 6 per cent. of his nutritive needs. The modification of the cost of at least 44 per cent. of the nation's food lies therefore with the Government in the controlled price of wheat.

Applicants for a reduced cost of food are apt to overlook one determining factor. It is obvious that cheap food can not be produced where farm labor is high. The high pay of union labor not only attracts men from the farms, but it adds highly to the cost of the farmer's clothes and boots, his barns and his machinery. At the present day one almost never hears of the fall in the price of any service or commodity.

It is obvious that the Government has the power to reduce the cost of 44 per cent. of the food value taken by the American people in the form of bread and of milk, but this would be a short-lived relief unless labor agreed to a reduction in wages. Such a suggestion never comes from labor circles, and yet it follows as a necessary corollary if there is to be any permanent reduction in the cost of living. For cheaper food depends on cheaper labor.

On account of the inability of many to grasp this situation it is improbable that there can be any permanent relief from war prices. The demand for more money and less work lies in a universal human instinct. Whether such a combination of ideals is for the general welfare of mankind appears, however, to be philosophically questionable.

The profiteers are not individuals alone. We may well ask ourselves whether as a nation we are not profiteering. For we are selling to an impoverished and suffering world indispensable food and clothing in the form of wheat and cotton at prices based primarily upon inflated wages.

GRAHAM LUSK

New York, August 1

Book Reviews

A Modern Diogenes

THE VESTED INTERESTS AND THE STATE OF THE INDUSTRIAL ARTS. ("The Modern Point of View and the New Order.") By Thorstein Veblen. New York: B. W. Huebsch.

PROFESSOR VEBLEN is not a socialist, perhaps, nor yet a social reformer of any familiar type, but rather a sort of Diogenes going about with lantern in hand looking for an honest man and finding none. His lantern is a powerful flashlight which he turns on all the badness in the body economic, and he has a sharp stick with which he touches all the sore spots; whereat the enemies of capitalism rejoice, and its friends begin to wonder whether there is any part of it that can bear examination. However, as he finds only the same old troubles, there may be less satisfaction on the one side and less anxiety on the other as to the final outcome.

This little book is a reprint of a series of articles lately published in The Dial, and in it the author gives the essential teachings of his earliest books—"The Theory of the Leisure Class" and "The Theory of Business Enterprise"—together with an argument from economic history designed to show that industrial society is about to get rid of the ideas of the 18th century, which it has long since outgrown; and, incidentally, to shake off the vested interests which, like the Old Man of the Sea, have so long been riding on its back. Then, too, the author extends the application of his theories to world politics, defending the thesis that the same vested interests, reinforced by the divine right of nations, are chiefly responsible for the world war. From this point of view national self-determination is a doctrine as out of date as the "natural right" to individual self-direction in domestic affairs; for a nation is an organization for collective offense and defense, essentially based on hate and fear of other nations. Most people would say that a nation is something more than this, even as a man is something more than a fighting animal; but Professor Veblen delights in half truths and paradoxes, which are certainly thought-provoking even when least convincing.

The theory of business enterprise which the "certified accountants of economic theory" usually teach is that business men—farmers, manufacturers, merchants, and the rest—are producers first of all, engaged in the work of supplying the world with goods and services; although secondarily and incidentally, while serving others, they usually make a living for themselves. Were it not so, society would be muzzling the ox that treadeth out the corn. Veblen, on the contrary, turns the proposition around, saying that men engage in business first of all to make money for themselves, and secondarily, if at all, to produce something for other people. Obviously, the two statements are expressions of the same process, the difference being chiefly one of emphasis. Still, they seem to give different results, for the economists, laying stress on service, glorify business; while Veblen, seeing that business men are seeking filthy lucre, finds them guilty of avarice and all the other deadly sins.

The indictment is serious, and the prosecuting attorney makes a strong case against the defendants. Business men, thinking chiefly of price, are not greatly interested in production; in fact, they usually seek to limit production in order to increase the price, and it is notorious that few factories ever run up to their full capacity. The factories of the country could produce twice as much—yes, four times as much—as they do if the business managers would give more attention to output and less to piratical corporation finance, and the meretricious devices of salesmanship and advertising. And yet, Professor Veblen would surely admit that most manufacturers do like to have a large output, as that involves low overhead costs per unit of output, and is the only source from which large manufacturing profits can come. Also, he would probably admit that the total output of the mills and factories could not be doubled or quadrupled without a corresponding increase in the supply of raw materials, though where those raw materials are to come from is not quite clear. He would admit, too, that some advertising and salesmanship would be necessary under any system, although he would insist, with all students of the question, that some is wasteful and some decidedly meretricious.

But Professor Veblen's chief attack is launched against the highway robbery so frequently practised under the guise of corporation finance, and here he is on stronger ground, although, as usual, he overstates the case. For example, there is nothing heinous about the capitalization of such intangibles as goodwill, even though accountants may not recommend it, for such capitalization in itself gives no control over the price of the article sold. Whether a popular newspaper company is capitalized at $100,000 or $1,000,000 makes no difference in fixing the price of the paper, for it is the goodwill itself and not the capitalization of it that counts. However, with a public service corporation whose rates are subject to control, the case is different. But wage earners and consumers as such are not much interested in corporation finance, although as small investors they may be deeply concerned, for it is a case of dog eat dog, and the old rule of caveat emptor gives neither protection nor consolation to those who are taken in by the denizens of the ground floor. Probably the chief evils connected with corporation finance will be removed by the gradual education of the small investor, by the growth of higher standards of business ethics, and by legislation, and the residue of incurable badness will be no more than would necessarily attach to any form of human activity.

But denunciation of the evils of capitalism, as Veblen is well aware, will never overthrow it unless it contains within itself the seeds of its own destruction. On the contrary, just criticism may serve to strengthen it, if it can learn to profit thereby. What menaces capitalism at the present time is the fact that it is out of joint with itself, because its articles of faith, which were valid enough in the 18th century, are out of harmony with the material conditions of the 20th century.

What industrial property there was in the 18th century was for the most part the property of master craftsmen, who were investors, employers, and workmen all in one, much like the typical American farmer of the present day. They performed three functions, each of which was indispensable to the conduct of their business, but they received only one income, which they did not clearly differentiate into interest, profits, and wages, as economists do to-day. Quite naturally, then, they had strong faith in personal liberty and all that it involved on the economic side, including the right of self-direction, free bargaining, and the unrestricted ownership of property. These "imponderables" proper to the time were expressed and stabilized in the writings of such publicists as Locke, Montesquieu, the Encyclopædists, the Physiocrats and Adam Smith, as well as in such public documents as the Declaration of Independence, the American Constitution, and the French Declaration of the Rights of Man.

These ideas might have continued indefinitely to command the faith of man but for the changes that have taken place in the industrial world, especially the creation of a vast material equipment, a machine so tremendous that it has submerged not only the individual laborers, who are small parts of a great whole, but the "gentlemen-capitalists" as well, who are seldom or never seen about a given plant, and who, in so far as anyone can see, perform no necessary function at all. Because of the conditions of their material environment, the "variegated mass of common men" who do the work of the world are rapidly losing their faith in the old imponderables—self-help, personal initiative, free bargaining, and the unrestricted right to property—while the "kept classes," the gentlemen-capitalists, the owners of vested interests, vainly hold to the outworn faith of the 18th century. But this faith will not save them, for it is not the faith of the common men. Thus a discrepancy has arisen between the accepted principles of law and custom, which properly belong to a past age, and the mechanistic development of the new era; and since the mechanical side of industry is quite unbending, the imponderable side of make-believe must either bend or break.

This argument is evidently a variation of the familiar Marxian interpretation of history, without any mention of bourgeoisie, concentration of capital, exploitation, class struggle, or social revolution; but all are there in veiled form and all point to the disruption of the economic system and the domination of the proletariat. It would not be hard to show certain flaws in the argument, even assuming the questionable premises. For example, the fact that the shares in the common product of industry are now clearly differentiated into interest, profits, and wages, does not justify the assumption that the owners and investors perform no function and are entitled to no return, even if they are, for the most part, out of sight. The policyholders of insurance companies are never seen by the farmers to whom they have lent money. Yet they have rights that should be considered. And if, as in the case of these insurance companies, which are among the most important of investors, the ownership of property could be widely diffused, might not the common men still remain true to the faith of the 18th century, which, in fact, is almost as old as humanity itself? Certainly, Professor Veblen, who has pondered deeply on the subject, has not yet suggested any new system of make-believe to take its place. As a mere observer of the industrial procession, he is not obliged to do this, but it would be interesting to know what the creed of the new era is to be.

French Criticism of the "Anglo-Saxons"

MYSTIQUES ET REALISTES ANGLO-SAXONS.
By Régis Michaud. Paris: Armand
Colin.

FROM a short trip abroad it is easy to bring home knickknacks and curios and even, if one is swiftly impressionable, something of foreign manners and fashions. But as the intercourse of nations increases the curios become less curious and the difference in fashions and manners diminishes. Presently a traveler who wishes credit for a foreign sojourn will have to stay long enough to acquire some knowledge of the genius and character of the country with which he professes acquaintance. Then the period of international understanding will begin to succeed the period of international caricature; and one will hesitate to assert that one knows the French people well after a week in the restaurants of Paris, or the English after an altercation with a London 'bus driver.

A young French man of letters visiting New York a year or two ago told the writer of this review that up to date he had been disappointed by his adventures among us. He had come expressly to study the point of view of our younger generation. The people that he had met were too sophisticated to exhibit distinctive markings. Intellectually the young New Yorker was hardly distinguishable from he would not say the young Parisian, but the young European. He should have to go west, he said, to find what he was seeking. It was obvious that he, like most foreigners on a first tour of the land, was in quest of what we used to call "local color." He had come to establish a preconception. The Younger Generation of his dreams was to be pungently native, adorably naïve, insolent with great expectations. His mind was sensitized to detect if not the direct influence of the prairies and the redskins upon western literature at least some bold exuberance of the brave new world. His ears were keyed to catch the famous barbaric yawp. Somewhere between New York and Chicago he found, of course, just what he wanted. He met philosophic novelists innocent of grammar and with a vision of life as primitive as Adam's, poets with the singing voice of a village auctioneer, literary editors handling the vernacular with a touch like Jack Dempsey's and stamping o'er the heads of the elder generation of American writers like the wild ass of Omar Khayyám. According to the custom of romantic travelers he went home with these selected impressions to give his countrymen a vivid and interesting misconception of the spirit of American letters.

It is the frequency of such reports that makes one value a work of international interpretation conceived in the spirit of Régis Michaud, who does not mistake the noisy for the significant, nor the queer for the characteristic. Considered as a liaison officer of the newly forming Anglo-French-American entente, he has already performed highly useful services which one hopes he may be encouraged to continue. On the one hand he has lectured here on French literature at Princeton, Smith, and the University of California, and has given us a French explanation of such national figures as Clémenceau and Maurice Barrès. On the other hand he has published in France a translation of Emerson's journals—a work as yet inadequately noticed in this country—and is preparing an elaborate study of Emerson and American Transcendentalism. It would be difficult to suggest a more valuable work of literary intermediation than thus leading French readers to the pure and undefiled headwaters of intellectual life in America. In the book now before us, the publication of which was delayed by the author's three years of war, Professor Michaud proves the breadth of his curiosity and understanding by admirably intelligent and skilful expositions of Emerson in relation to Montaigne, Pater, Whitman, Henry James, Mark Twain, Jack London, Upton Sinclair, Mrs. Wharton, and Bernard Shaw. Now a Frenchman who has studied American characteristics in Emerson and Upton Sinclair, in Henry James and Mark Twain, in Jack London and Mrs. Wharton will not have a conception of current fashions as clean-cut and decisive as if he had confined himself, say, to the Imagists or the Chicago School of Poetry; but in compensation he will know infinitely more about the national character and genius.

The "message" of Professor Michaud's book, if one can be found in a work generally so objective and dispassionate, is doubtless directed primarily to French readers. And behind his effort of mere comprehension and interpretation one is perhaps justified in discerning a significant emphasis upon traits of American literature and life which a generation that sat at the feet of Renan and Anatole France would regard as foreign, and which a generation that fought under Joffre and Foch would regard as desirable. He recognizes at any rate in Emerson that "Puritan mysticism," that glow of idealistic exaltation, which distinguishes his skepticism from that of Montaigne and transforms the latter's nonchalant and almost Epicurean endurance of the world into the spirit of courage and practical enterprise, issuing in Emerson's disciple Whitman in a well-nigh orgiastic optimism, tremendously bracing when "the world with devils filled," as Luther sang, "threatens to undo us." In Mark Twain, whom he rightly calls the Homer of the American epos and a good soldier of truth and justice, he signalizes the burly independence and self-confidence begotten by an immense popularity, springing in turn from an unsurpassed representation of indigenous manners and democratic sentiments. In Jack London's tales of the wild he finds the romance of American energy, the deep racial urge to adventure. "These Anglo-Saxons," he declares, "must have blows, hazards, life in the open, privations, battle with the elements. They know that in order to conquer the formidable and anonymous powers which sport with our existence one must give blow for blow, and appropriate their strength. Life, as Emerson was fond of declaring, is rough. The heroes of Jack London love her as she is and meet her with an equal roughness. It is the ideal of the race, and that counts for much at times."

Whatever check the French reader requires on this somewhat Rooseveltian conception of our racial destiny Professor Michaud supplies in his subtle appreciations of Walter Pater, Henry James, and Mrs. Wharton. As one glowing still with the relics of an old flame he describes Pater's exquisite researches for an æsthetic escape, his fusion and confusion of art with religion, the seductive morbidity in his reduction of life to reverie. With frequent glints of sympathy he analyzes the beaux méandres of the Jacobean novel and the æsthetic "globe trotters," saturated with emotion, art, and poetry, who people that royaume des beaux esprits—"Chère et regrettée Cosmopolis!" In Mrs. Wharton he recognizes a fine conscientious talent of the first order, original and personal; and he savors her tales of society written for the fashionable magazines and the Fifth Avenue folk, yet still "biblical and puritanic," indicating, as he says, that the soul of the American people has changed less than the manners. It is characteristic, no doubt, of us grave and purposeful "Anglo-Saxons" to put forth now and then such flowers as these, a scrupulous artist or two, an æsthete who prefers burning with a hard gem-like flame before an Italian painting to following the wolf-dogs across the Alaskan ice. But the countrymen of Renan, Flaubert, and Baudelaire do not need to go abroad to study the art of fiction or the confusion, delicious to the dilettante, of the good with the beautiful.

From a critic who perceives and explains so clearly both the fine and the robust American virtues—particularly all the athletic qualities of body and soul comprised in Mr. Roosevelt's "valor of righteousness"—it should not be intolerably painful even to Americans, thinnest skinned of the Caucasian peoples, to hear that they have their amusing peculiarities, which, as reflected in this French mirror, might almost be called defects. It is a defect of their self-respect, observable in the pages of Mark Twain, and since his time rather on the increase than on the wane, that they tend, as Professor Michaud suggests, to erect irreverence into a system and to be unceremonious and rude on principle; and a comic aspect of their independence is illustrated by our national humorist's "application of the Monroe Doctrine to the fine arts." It is a defect in their culture, as exhibited in the novels of James, that when intensely pursued, it tends to the production of delicately perfumed expatriates, and fragile creatures like Milly Theale in "The Wings of a Dove," a pensive picture in a beautiful frame, "who dies of being only that." In French eyes, it is at least a curiosity in their social institutions that marriage is arranged by "a flirtation according to rule in which the woman offers herself without knowing whether she will be taken." Perhaps the comment which cuts deepest into the soft spot of the "typical American" is this on the heroes and heroines of Mrs. Wharton: "All, men and women alike, seem to apply to life and the pursuit of happiness the recipes of the mechanistic psychology of William James and the pragmatists. Psychology is reduced for them to a science of external behavior. Presence of mind takes the place in them of reflection. No prevision. . . . There is lacking in their souls that background of memories, traditions, habits, and those moral reserves on which every well-directed life is nourished. They do not live; they improvise." If this is true, the austere moral discipline of our ancestors, which has so potently molded the American character, must be losing its grip; the inherited Puritan conscience, long discernible even in the uneducated and the "self-made man," must be growing dangerously vestigial and unintelligent.

Fabulists

FAR-AWAY STORIES. By William J. Locke. New York: John Lane Company.
RAMSEY MILHOLLAND. By Booth Tarkington. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

AT the end of "Far-Away Stories" Mr. Locke provides, by request, a note on Septimus and Marcus Ordeyne and other well-known characters of his, in war-time. They are shadows, he says: "But shadows are not cast by nothingness . . . These shadows of things unseen are real. In fable lies essential truth." In true fable—yes. The really important question about Messrs. Locke and Tarkington and romances of their sort is whether they are true fabulists or clever fabricators. Do they believe in fairies? Is faith in the simple human virtues their real clue? Do they deal in types rather than characters because they can't manage anything better, or because type rather than character is proper to romantic fable? We may give the generous answer. These men believe in themselves and in their job. Whether they altogether understand what it is they believe in and what their job is, may be another matter. In fable lies essential truth, but truth in a singularly elementary and emotional form. Let the fabulist beware how he confounds it with the richer if sterner truth which is the hard-won guerdon of creative realism.

The fables in Mr. Locke's book are gleaned from the past of many years, all but one having been "written in calm days far-away from the present convulsion of the world." This makes their uniformity of temper and method the more striking. They are not markedly original in plot: what good fable is? To accept and slightly adapt some fairly familiar "situation," with the aid of tolerably familiar types, is the right game. Here are the pair of maiden-ladies, sisters, whose delicate and absurd self-sufficiency is broken into by the advent of a beautiful youth (cast up by the sea) for whom they suffer love and jealousy and so have their brief moment of life before he passes on, as youth and fortune decree. Here is a wicked old paterfamilias who at last awakes to his faults, reforms, and becomes a generous parent and a doting grand-daddy. Here is an unhappy little princess whose adventuress-mother is about to sell her to an infamous Jew-financier when the penniless young Englishman carries her off to safety and a cottage. And here are four tales of blind people whose disability merely gives them color and saliency as figures of romance. The substance of "An Old-World Episode" has been embodied in more than one short story of recent years, but never more skilfully than here. It is the tale of the two mates, the one blind, the other horribly disfigured, whose happiness is menaced by the operation that is to restore the blind one's vision. Mr. Locke's handling well illustrates his instinct for the acceptable way out. Your naturalist would show the wife helplessly loathing the horror to which she is legally bound. Your creative realist or high romancer would show her triumphing over the physical revulsion in the name of a spiritual union. Neither would be a tolerable "ending" for the reader of romance. His standards are those of the popular theatre; one has only to refer to these standards to see how impossible any solution must be which permits the physical revelation. Our fabulist finds a "pleasant" way out by letting the wife recover her sight for an instant, so that she may see her child, and having her then deliberately destroy it that she may not see her husband. We quite frankly admit that she has only to see him to abhor an attitude that doubtless represents the survival of the ancient and elementary identification between the physically ugly and the spiritually foul.

"Ramsey Milholland" is Mr. Tarkington's fable of young America facing the war. Ramsey is that lad of the midlands (geographic and social) whom this writer has so often painted; a close kinsman to William Baxter of pleasant memory. He is the same uncouth, self-conscious, mumbling, sound-hearted stripling whose comic amours and vague quests we have so often followed, with Mr. Tarkington, in the past. From his lips fall those half-articulate sounds which we more or less ruefully identify with the speech of American boyhood. But it may not be quite snobbish to remark that it is the speech of a certain stratum which does not altogether represent American boyhood at its average best. In confining Ramsey Milholland as a college junior to the same sort of disjointed illiterate prattle that served him back of his teens, the story-teller somewhat overstrains our credulity. However, one of Ramsey's chief traits is that he uses as little speech as possible of any kind. All the strength in him is of a kind that can not be heard or seen—must at best make itself dimly felt as an emanation. He is almost a fool at his studies, almost a clown in social contacts, almost a negative quantity in matters of belief and principle. And yet there is a kind of solid power beneath, which can be called on at need, and makes itself recognized by people who can not define it.

Offset against this awkward half-submerged personality is the clever and articulate Dora, a natural leader of classes, deliverer of orations, winner of prizes and praises from all quarters. Not content with confounding him by contrast throughout his schooldays, she must carry on the process at the university, where fate more than once opposes them. But the law of opposites is working, and a small thing brings them together. Meanwhile great forces gradually hem them in. The war which in their Freshman year had seemed so remote begins to sound nearer: "The long strain was on the country; underneath all its outward seeming of things going on as usual there shook a deep vibration, like the air trembling to vast organ pipes in diapasons too profound to reach the ear as sound: one felt, not heard, thunder in the ground under one's feet." It grows louder: to Dora as the sound of a horror approaching, the unspeakable, inexcusable horror of war; to Ramsey as a dimly apprehended summons, to be neither prated of nor disobeyed. He loves her, but not to argue with; and when she discovers that her faithful hearer is by no means her comrade, they quarrel. The boy goes his way to war, and the girl is roused to see that it is a rightful war which must be fought that wars may cease. "And she beheld the revelation sent to her. This ordinary life of Ramsey's was but the outward glinting of a high and splendid spirit, as high and splendid as earth can show. And yet it was only the life of an everyday American boy. The streets of the town were full, now, of boys like Ramsey." Yes, Ramsey and Dora are types, their story is a commonplace one, but shot through with the simple feeling, or if you will sentiment, for goodness and unselfishness and faith that gives virtue to every honest fable.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Run of the Shelves

"EDUKATION and Social Movements" is the far-flung title under which A. E. Dobbs (Longmans) promises to develop this thesis: "There is truth in the paradoxical statement of a modern writer, that progress in English education has owed less to the zeal of its advocates than to changes in the structure of social life which have often no apparent connection with educational movements." His purpose is to show the "points of connection between educational and social history" from 1700 to 1850. As we read the first paragraph we find that the style is dignified, even stately. By the time we have finished the third paragraph we forget the style and wonder what is wrong with the matter. Have we been inattentive? We apply our mind more intently, determined to follow the author's thought, and are mortified at not finding any thought. Surely we must be dull; for here are sentences that would do credit to Lecky, deft coherence, imposing footnotes—all is just as it should be among the best histories. Again we apply ourselves, and force our way through the first long chapter. It's no use. The book remains to our most receptive mood and our most determined attack a chaos of historical make-believe. All the proper motions are imitated with gravity and grace; all the outward seeming is of astute power; but inwardly there is only emptiness. We are moved about through the deep realms of citation from Vinogradoff and Marshall and Seebohm, but we get nowhere. In the later chapters, to be sure, we come here and there upon consecutive pages that convey meaning. There are even passages of droll quotations, and at one point imagination is kindled by the statement that "a circle of Methodists read Paine's 'Age of Reason.'" But we have learned nothing.

It is pleasant to turn to the homely "cut it out" and "shy on" with which Evelyn Dewey tells us of education in her "New Schools for Old" (Dutton). Here is the story of how a Mrs. Harvey brought salvation to the farming community of Porter in Missouri. She was interested in making a pedagogical experiment with the run-down, one-room school and with the quarrelsome, backward village. Her zeal, guided by a tact that amounts to genius, remade the school and worked outward from this through the whole community. Within six years Porter was metamorphosed—socially, religiously, agriculturally, esthetically. How much the picture is overdrawn we can not tell. We can not believe that "any teacher should be able to follow her," or that the success of one zealous genius can be a model by which 200,000 wage-earning teachers in one-room schools can regenerate rural education. But we are glad to know of what one earnest spirit accomplished.

A bookseller's pamphlet brings us the following extract from Anatole France's last book, "Le Petit Pierre":

"Oh, sweet and great Racine! best and dearest of poets! . . . Beside you Corneille is hardly more than a skillful rhetorician and I do not know that Molière himself is so true as you, Supreme Master, in whom all is truth and beauty! . . . You alone have put real women on the stage. What are the women of Sophocles and Shakespeare in comparison with those you inspired? Dolls! . . . Yours alone love and yearn; the others talk."

The Review has not verified the passage, which M. France doubtless assigns to the mouth of his "petit Pierre"; but there is little reason to suppose that the translation is not substantially accurate and that the avowal is not personal to M. France. We are not called upon to be solemn with the French critic over a passage in which he is probably not serious with himself. He is entitled to his whim, and his fondling of the glossy and serpentine Racine in the open market will neither lift the dramatist nor lower the critic materially in the minds of a discriminating public. M. France and his paragon have points of similarity; a sexual fervor enclosed by a temperamental coolness is a distinctive property of both. Moreover, Racine has his value, and the unobtrusiveness of his merits endears them to critics who love a recessed and curtained excellence. He is, like Euripides, an author whom one discovers or re-discovers, to whom we bow the knee at fifty in atonement for having shrugged our shoulders at twenty-five.

As for the disparagement of Sophocles and Shakespeare, it may be received with a smile in which M. France, with his accustomed suavity, would doubtless join us. When the nurse said to Juliet, "Romeo's a dishclout to him," the good woman intended no disrespect to Romeo; she merely felt that the praise of Paris was opportune. The doll Antigone and the doll Juliet will content the aspirations of the unexact Greeks and Britons. If we took M. France at his word, we should have to compare his immolation of Sophocles and Shakespeare to the infatuation of Herod: Salome dances prettily before him, and he gives her the head of John the Baptist in a charger.

In the second series of war letters written by the tender and manly Lieutenant Coningsby Dawson to his family, "Living Bayonets" (John Lane Company), there are two little passages which should be put side by side:

"Above the clatter I heard a sound which was almost alarming: the clear brave note of a thrush, piping, piping, piping. He didn't seem to care a rap how often the guns blew their noses or how often the Hun shrapnel clashed like cymbals overhead; he had his song to sing in the sunshine, and was determined to sing it, no matter how the song might go unheard."

"In the wood I found a hawk wounded by shrapnel and pressing close behind a fallen trunk."

The indifference of the bird-world, self-centred and joyous amid the cataclysms which shake and rive the human universe—that is one side of the picture; the other is the penetration even of that security by the arrival in the careless feathered world of the ricochet of the human catastrophe. The two thoughts draw significance from contiguity.

In the "Survey of the Ancient World" (Ginn) Professor Breasted covers the period from the Stone Age to the time of Charlemagne. This is a tremendous amount of history—some four thousand years—for a secondary-school student to assimilate in detail, a student who must also somehow find time to learn something about Roosevelt as well as of Themistocles, the Marne as well as Marathon. Professor Breasted, therefore, in subordinating the details of political history to matters of ancient art, science, industry, and religion, puts the whole subject more nearly within the grasp of the secondary-school student. The student really feels the importance of the Hebrew religion, Greek thought, and Roman laws. The title suggests a brief account, but it is brief only in politics and even there enough is given to enable the reader to see vividly the play of social forces between nations.

Drama

"A Voice in the Dark" and Other Melodramas

MELODRAMA in New York gravitates towards the detective play. The latest example is Mr. Ralph E. Dyar's "Voice in the Dark," audible for the first time in this city on July 28 at the Republic Theatre. It would be folly, no doubt, to take Mr. Dyar's play too seriously, but I do not commit that folly when I say that it is better—better by a clear margin—than the three detective plays from tried hands which have racked both the brains and the nerves of the New York public in the present summer. Those plays are Mr. Davis's "At 9:45," at the Playhouse; Mr. Broadhurst's "Crimson Alibi," at his own theatre; and Messrs. Shipman and Marcin's "Woman in Room 13," which Mr. Dyar's bright experiment is displacing at the Republic.

I doubt, myself, if drama be the fit vehicle for any detective story of which the threads are numerous and the woof complex. That description applies to all four of the above plays, in three of which the aim is to cast suspicion upon several persons for the taking-off of a miscreant whose existence is almost a ground for the repeal of the sixth commandment. Now a detective play is a demonstration, a logical chain-work; and if the logic is to be not only sufficient but efficient, it is clear that every link in the chain must be first valid, and, secondly, visible and conspicuous. A novel can take its time; a novel can revisit its point; but the touch of an acted play on many of its particulars is so swift and so slight that it rarely succeeds where its success means the lodgment of many small but indispensable details in the mind and memory of the spectator. Some link is always missing before, if not behind, the footlights. Moreover, the natural way to make sure that a chain holds together is to straighten it out; if it lies in laps and coils, its continuity is almost indemonstrable to the eye. But it is just these coils and laps, these inversions and perversions of the natural time-order, that are the pride and delight of the contemporary detective play.

I feel this difficulty more or less in all four of the specified melodramas. Something has always to be taken on faith; and I have the same disgust in granting faith in any point to a detective play that I should have in accepting the promissory note of a man who had lured me to deal with him by the announcement that he always paid in cash. The criticism relates to complex woofs of which the constituents are many and small.

Detective plays are perfectly legitimate when their lines are broad and simple enough to make the verification of their cogency feasible and enjoyable.

There is another vice in the prevalent handling of melodrama. The thing we are all bound to remember and all prone to forget is that the persons to whom grim and strange things happen are people like ourselves. If we once come to look upon these horrors as their native and congenial element, we shall sympathize as scantily with their perturbations as with the eyelessness of the fishes in the Mammoth Cave. People should be shown at the start or elsewhere in natural, easy, placid circumstances, as in Bernstein's "Thief" or Veiller's "13th Chair;" the normal should serve as border and prologue, that it may serve as contrast and metre, to the abnormal. Now the current plays begin with horrors: "At 9:45" begins with shrieks after the pistol shot; the "Crimson Alibi" rises on the act of murder; a "Voice in the Dark" begins at the coroner's with the body on the stage (though Mr. Dyar has made amends for this precipitation in the second act). When a dramatist ties people into a hard knot, the danger is that the people themselves will change into strings, and the audience will go home wondering how plays so sanguinary can be so bloodless. Mr. Broadhurst's "Crimson Alibi" (dramatized from Mr. O. R. Cohen's novel) finally obviates this difficulty by a second-rate but serviceable remedy. He is quite outplotted and outknotted by the authors of "At 9:45" and the "Woman in Room 13," but his play is the most enjoyable of the three, because the frank and rank sentimentality, however worthless and trivial in itself, humanizes the unfeeling plot. After too much hardtack, one has relintings toward mush.

The main lines of Mr. Dyar's technique will surprise no one who is conversant with "On Trial." There is play within play, the secondary play being the immediate and visible presentment of the narrative and retrospective elements in the primary drama. Mr. Dyar, however, is original in the dip of the emphasis, not towards the victim or his actual or presumptive assailants, but towards the witnesses, and in the violent but striking hypothesis that one of these witnesses is a blind old man, the other a deaf old woman. Both tell their stories in a lawyer's office, and the dramatization of their testimony is original in the use of pantomime to denote the woman's deafness and of darkness to suggest the blindness of the man. There are two lapses in the treatment to which the extreme difficulties of the problem invite us to be merciful. The pantomime is valid on the theory that the dramatization of a deaf old woman's memories should not include sounds which she, being a deaf old woman, could not hear. But how can Mr. Dyar justify the inclusion in this pantomime of sights which this old woman failed to see because her eyes and mind were concentrated on a book? The mistake with the blind man is a little different. If the darkness typifies the blindness, it is plain that both should be total or both partial; Mr. Dyar, however, makes the darkness partial and the blindness complete.

I take pains to define these lapses, less because they are momentous than because they have interest of the novelty. Few of our so-called adepts have force enough to invent a blunder. Mr. Dyar's force is unmistakable in the admirable treatment in most respects of the second scene of Act I, in which the old woman's testimony is dramatized. The simple but stirring transition from library to glade, the dramatic vigor and occult interest of the pantomime, the profound, the really valuable, suggestiveness of the proximity of horrors and serenities in the strange order of this checkered world—all this is forcibly and finely done. I should add that the bold stroke of repeating the pantomime in Act II with the addition of voice had the success which its valor merited.

So much for Mr. Dyar's own play. I wish that play had contented him. But Broadway had to be reckoned with. Mr. Dyar was impelled from within or from without to annex to his fairly original play a second drama, a drama wholly conventional, which might serve as lifeboat if the ship should founder. In its exhibit of modernities this second play is unimpeachable. Everything is there, the fiendish victim whose death enrolls his slayer among philanthropists, the corpse on the stage, the suspicions which glance everywhere with dire impartiality, the blackguard or blackmailer with visitations of magnanimity, the guiltless claimant of guilt in whom lying rises to sublimity—all is there even to the leprous roadhouse. Most of this is smart and shallow. Mr. Dyar is businesslike even in his aberrations, and one may congratulate the tradesman in commiserating the artist. From one or two things even the tradesman should have shrunk. The puerility of the locomotive in Act III almost confutes the supposition that Mr. Dyar was its engineer. In another point his resistance to pressure should have been immovable. In the first scene of the first act the speech of the old woman, which has hitherto shown a bullet-like directness, begins all at once to move in loops and spirals, to be, in the Latin sense, voluble; it is hoped that these corkscrews may extract a laugh.

The play is remarkable for the precision and lightness of its gait. The vs.

Quantity
Quality

Since its inception, over 30 years ago, the Crocker-Wheeler Company have made quantity production subordinate to quality production. Quality has always been the one and dominating purpose of this organization.

Thus, Crocker-Wheeler motors enjoy a reputation that is not attainable by motor manufacturers to whom large output is the guiding principle.

Manufacturers who insist on the highest inbuilt quality in the motors they buy are "100% sold" on C-W Motors.

W. B. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

CHINA AND GLASSWARE A COMPREHENSIVE STOCK

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

IMPORTANT NEW NOVELS

SYLVIA AND MICHAEL

By Compton
Mackenzie

SYLVIA SCARLETT, already known to Mr. Mackenzie's readers (and if you don't know her she is worth meeting!) turns up in Russia a vagabond cabaret singer, having left behind her the safety and success she had found in England. Through Russia, Rumania and Serbia, Sylvia makes her way, having one adventure after another. In the debacle of Serbia, she and Michael Fane are thrown together, and caught up and hurled into the thick of great events. In the end they find love and peace—and a Greek Island in the Aegean. $1.75.

THE CITY OF COMRADES

By Basil
King

"A ROMANCE of unflinching sympathy and charm attaining a higher degree of artistic perfection than anything hitherto written by the author."—New York Tribune.

"In his latest novel Mr. King has reached a point in proficiency as a craftsman that will assure him a high place among American makers of worthy fiction. He has written a powerful and searching novel that will mean much for the world and open its eyes to many truths that cannot well be ignored."—The Philadelphia Record. Illustrated $1.75.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Established 1817

NEW YORK

events have a good carriage; they avoid that combination of shuffle and spring which marks the latest phase of the detective play. The performance was competent, without rising to distinction; an unhurried alacrity was a noticeable merit. The honor of the largest contribution to its success fell to Miss Florine Arnold in the part of the old woman. I see no reason why the play should not enjoy a prosperous run, or why other runners in a brightening series should not follow in its trail.

O. W. FIRKINS

Music

Oscar Hammerstein

THERE are certain figures we never associate with mortality, and Oscar Hammerstein was one of these. We knew that he had already passed his three score years and ten, but what did that signify? With him age was but a word divorced from rhyme or reason. He was both far younger and far older than most of those half his age.

Oscar Hammerstein was an idealist, and that his ideal was inextricably entwined with his ego only increased its all-absorbing intensity. Caring nothing for money, physical ease or any of the ordinary satisfactions of life, save only that of tobacco, he could the more completely dedicate himself to the mission which he believed was his. German by birth, Jewish by race, he was both extraordinarily a cosmopolitan and peculiarly an American. He was a cosmopolitan in that he would have been equally at home in Paris or Rome as he was in New York. He was an American in the expansive optimism of his spirit and his methods. In whatever country his lot had been placed his genius would have found its outlet, but its peculiar form could have come into being only in America and probably only in New York. His sympathy with French opera, his dealings with Italian artists, his understanding of the American public proved again and again the catholicity of his spirit. It was only in England, a country which cares infinitely more for the sacredness of tradition than for the impact of a revolutionary ego, that he failed of a sympathetic understanding. The failure of his London Opera House was immediate and colossal. London can be conquered by audacity, but it must be an audacity tempered with tact and of tact Oscar Hammerstein was conspicuously ignorant. But New York was a different matter, and in New York he found an admirable field for the exploitation of his personality.

Despite its long operatic history New York had never been an operatic city, and it was to conquer this operatic inertia that Oscar Hammerstein dedicated the last fifteen years of his life. That he did not wholly succeed is self-evident. New York to-day has still only one first-class opera house, and there seems little likelihood of its having more. Yet Mr. Hammerstein's influence on that opera house was potent. The Metropolitan Opera Company owes him a debt of gratitude for raising it out of the rut of self-satisfaction, and perhaps something worse, into which it had fallen in the Corried régime. Mr. Hammerstein stimulated its performances, and at the conclusion of his four years of opera at the Manhattan added to it an opera-loving public which he himself had created.

Oscar Hammerstein believed in advertising, believed in the light but not in the bushel, loved color, loved exaggeration, loved the appeal to the public. Whether he also loved that public—whether he even believed in that public—we shall never know. Perhaps after all he was really a Coriolanus disguised under a hat and a cigar. He alternately praised the public for its appreciation or belabored it for its artistic obtuseness, and as to which belief was really his we shall forever be ignorant. Oscar Hammerstein was not of those who wear their hearts upon their sleeves.

But in two things he believed with all his might—in grand opera and in

Oscar Hammerstein. Whether or not his belief in the former was well placed may be debated, but his belief in the latter was surely justified. He failed in every operatic enterprise he undertook, that is, he failed according to the definition of the world. The Manhattan, the Philadelphia, the London, the Lexington opera enterprises passed out of his hands and are no more. Yet who can say that Oscar Hammerstein died a failure? There is a world which is builded neither of hands nor of bank accounts. Accomplishment is not a matter of length of time, but of final result, and purged of all its bluff and bluster and brag, the Hammerstein influence is potent to-day, and potent for good. He gave to us modern French opera as modern French opera should be given; he gave to us Maurice Renaud and Mary Garden and John McCormack and Luisa Tetrazzini and Mariette Mazarin and a host of lesser artists, but best of all he created a public and an interest in opera where a public and an interest had not been before, and by his competition vitalized the Metropolitan Opera Company and radically changed its basic policy. The Metropolitan Opera Company is not today the private enterprise of any manager, but has become a semi-public institution which is none the less such in that it is supported by private capital. And this change we owe largely to Oscar Hammerstein.

GRENVILLE VERNON

Convenient binders for filing copies of

The Review

will be supplied at $1.00

By

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau St.,
New York

The New School for Social Research will open October first for the study of current economic and governmental problems. The work will be conducted by a group of well known writers and teachers among whom are

Graham Wallas of London, Thorstein Veblen, James Harvey Robinson, Wesley Clair Mitchell, John Dewey, Dean Roscoe Pound, Thomas S. Adams, Harold J. Laski, Moissaye Olgin, Charles A. Beard and Members of the Bureau of Municipal Research, Robert Bruère and Members of the Bureau of Industrial Research.

Courses will include lectures on Economic Factors in Civilization, The Development of the United States into a World Power, The Historic Background of the Great War, Modern Industrialism, Social Inheritance, Recent Tendencies in Political Thought, Problems of American Government, Habit and History, etc.

There will be late afternoon and evening lectures and conferences to permit the attendance of those engaged in regular professions. No academic degrees will be required but the standard of postgraduate work will be maintained. There will be general lectures and discussion for larger groups and small conferences for those equipped for special research.

Registration will begin September twenty-second.

Announcement will be sent upon application to the school at

465-9 WEST TWENTY-THIRD STREET, NEW YORK

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 15

New York, Saturday, August 23, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	309
Editorial Articles:
Inflation and Prices	311
The Crisis in Siberia	312
The German Constitution	313
The Actors' Strike and Others	314
R. A. Blakelock	314
College Salaries and College Quality	315
Science and Our Social Problem. By Vernon Kellogg	316
The Tragedy of Liberalism in Siberia. By Jerome Landfield	317
Correspondence	318
The Victorian Centenary. By Frederick Tupper	320
Book Reviews:
Spiritualism and Science	323
British Labor	324
More or Less Truth	325
"Orchestrating" Society	326
The Run of The Shelves	327
The Orange Convention in Canada	328

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

AS we go to press, public interest in the treaty question is centred upon the meeting between the President and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The next day or two may bring about such a clearing of the air as has long been prayerfully looked for, we are sure, by a large proportion of the American people. Upon the abstract merits of the League Covenant—not to speak of the many disputable features of the treaty settlement apart from the Covenant—there is room for great and honest differences of opinion; and the room has been abundantly occupied. But we believe that at least a very large, and probably a preponderant, body of opinion among thoughtful men recognizes that neither the merits of the Covenant nor its defects are of such character as to justify on the one hand unyielding insistence upon unreserved acceptance, or on the other hand such action as would put the whole settlement in danger. The need of the world, in its present state of unparalleled disturbance, for relief from the strain and uncertainty under which it has labored ever since the armistice is a consideration that must override every preference that does not rest upon unmistakably vital necessity. Let us hope that the meeting at the White House will bear fruit in the shape of a determination on both sides to meet upon a middle ground and bring the long agony to a close.

THERE is one side of the situation in Siberia which is overlooked by our liberals, and that is the internal struggle for liberalism and democracy. The tragedy of this situation lies in the fact that while many of them, misled as to the facts, are attacking Admiral Kolchak as a reactionary, he is the very man who is putting up a brave fight against reaction. It is his misfortune in his Herculean task of organizing civil government out of chaos, and at the same time carrying on war with ill-trained and badly equipped troops, that he is obliged to depend upon second-rate and inexperienced helpers. And it is of course true that among the supporters of his Government are many men, especially of the officer class, who are reactionaries and have no use for democratic ideas.

Admiral Kolchak, in his honest endeavor to fulfill his pledges, has felt that he could count on Allied and American moral and material support. He has met with serious reverses in the field and he has a population wearied of long-continued war. The reactionaries taunt him with the failure of the democratic governments to come to the assistance of Russia, and advocate throwing over the liberal programme and securing the assistance of Japan. They would even enter into relations with the Germans. The crisis of the past fortnight has been less military than political. Kolchak has for the time being triumphed over the reactionaries, but if he does not receive American support it is doubtful if he can continue long to stand off the forces which plausibly point out a solution of Russia's tragic difficulties at the cost of democratic institutions.

MARRIAGES between American soldiers and German girls, which bring tears of benediction to the eyes of the internationally minded, are evoking criticism in Germany. The pure Teutonic strain, it appears, is in danger of contamination from the riff-raff of the world—"round"-heads, all of them; and a truly patriotic German mother can successfully give birth only to "narrow"-headed children. Really, however, it makes very little difference to Germany or to the world whether the Teuton of the future is a broad-head or a narrow-head; her best endeavors ought to go to cutting down the birth-rate of square-heads. Brachycephalism or dolichocephalism, it is of no importance; what the world will be interested in for a long time to come is a hopeful decline in German megaloccephalism. The reports of recent travelers, like Lieutenant Franck and Lieutenant Dawson, are not reassuring.

INFORMATION has come unofficially to the Senate that President Cabrera, for thirty years dictator of Guatemala, and from all accounts a pretty just and wise dictator, has been notified by our State Department that he must not be a candidate in the coming elections—in other words, that he must step down and out to make way for a régime that more nearly fits the formula which the United States, with unhappily mounting frequency, undertakes to prescribe for its neighbors in a small way of business to the South. On the face of things Cabrera has far from a bad record. If somewhat too much in the manner of Diaz, he has at any rate kept the peace in Guatemala and brought to it the prosperity that is born of comparative freedom from revolution. He and his little country did their bit, and a good bit, in defending the world against Germany. Cabrera is no longer young and, grievous fault, presumably wealthy—the sort of job he has held is too risky not to command good pay. No doubt we can make him see the desirability of retirement if we resolutely set about it. But in the thin, cold moral atmosphere into which we invite him to enter and perish, fire still burns, and national fingers, scorched already at this dangerous game, are still sensitive. It is much to be hoped that the present report is unfounded, or that action, if contemplated, will be pressed no further until we get some formula less remote from facts than any we as yet seem to be possessed of.

QUESTIONNAIRES sent out by a committee of forty-eight, with a view to getting material for the formulation of a platform for a new "liberal" party, brought out a strikingly unanimous response. Almost without exception, the persons appealed to expressed their support of the programme of the American Labor party and of the Non-Partisan League, voted for the initiative, referendum, and recall, an executive budget and a responsible cabinet, the removal of absolute control of foreign relations from the hands of the President, some limitation of the power of the courts to pronounce laws unconstitutional, proportional representation, the abolition of secret diplomacy, "the restoration of free speech," and equal legal and economic rights for women. The only points at which something this side of unanimity was noticeable was in the question on the Plumb plan, which got only 40 per cent. of the vote, 42 per cent., however, preferring some form of government ownership, while a remnant of 18 per cent. voted for private ownership; compulsory military training, which was voted down by only 85 per cent.; and supertaxes on profits, which were endorsed by only 83 per cent. It is obvious that all these matters do not stand on the same plane. Some represent ideal aspirations or mere commonplaces rather than real measures; others are questions of such grave importance that the judgment of a man who is cocksure about them may well be considered of doubtful value. But it is painfully plain that, to the hand-picked list who were favored with the questionnaire, any proposal which possessed the merit of never having been tried was irresistibly attractive. It will be interesting to see if a similar unanimity greets the programme of the new party—for the formation of which, by the way, a mere 80 per cent. voted—when, and if, it is submitted to the country.

SATISFACTION with the prompt termination of the Interborough strike should not divert attention from the gravity of the problem of which that strike must be regarded as only an exemplary warning. Mere adjurations to the sense of duty, or the civic loyalty, of would-be strikers are very far from sufficient to guarantee our exemption from repetitions, and much more serious repetitions, of the menace which has for the moment, and in this particular matter, been disposed of. There is no telling at what time, unless really effective measures are taken to prevent it, the life and the business of this great metropolis may be thrown into utter confusion, and the business of the country suffer infinite injury. Nothing but positive legislation can protect the public against the anarchy which constantly lurks in the present relations between the public service corporations and their employees. A law compelling the postponement of any threatened strike or lock-out until the case is passed upon by a duly authorized body is an absolutely essential requirement of public safety. The rigorous enforcement of such a law by adequate penalties would, with the present awakened condition of public sentiment, command the energetic support of the community. Popular sympathy always tends to go with the workmen when they strike for an improvement in wages or working conditions; but this last strike—not to speak of others of similar character—has been so unreasonable, and the danger by which all of us are threatened in every such situation has become so manifest, that the public is ready to draw the line. We believe that no move would meet with more general approval and applause than a call by Governor Smith for a special session of the Legislature for the sole purpose of enacting a law to cope with this ever-present danger. The time has come for a real test of the strength of public sentiment upon the question. We are confident that if the Legislature were assembled for this purpose, it would be made to feel unmistakably that the demand of the public is for a real, a courageous, and an effective treatment of the problem.

THE charge made by Mayor Hylan that the Interborough strike was brought about by collusion between the company and the striking Brotherhood is of a kind which one usually rejects on the ground of inherent improbability. In this instance the source from which the charge comes is such that the impulse to reject it would in ordinary circumstances be so strengthened as quite to settle the matter. But the circumstances are not ordinary. The Interborough is in a position of intolerable financial difficulty, and might quite conceivably welcome almost any chance to force to a conclusion its demand for higher fares as the only means of operating without loss. The superficial facts concerning the strike tend to bear out the idea that the company was not so anxious either to prevent it or to fight it as is usually the case with traction corporations. Whether or not there is any real likelihood of Hylan's charge having any foundation, it is greatly to be desired that the truth about it be established beyond cavil.

While the strike was promptly settled, thanks to the vigorous and sagacious interposition of Commissioner Nixon and Governor Smith, it must be noted that the situation involved more than the usual degree of peril for the community on account of the peculiar relation to it of two out of the three parties dealing with it. The men, of course, were out for big wages and nothing else—that is quite the regular thing. But neither the company nor the city administration was single-minded in the matter. The company's interest in the question of increased fares—whether this affected its conduct or not—was more intense than its interest in the wage question; and Mayor Hylan is everlastingly on the watch for a chance to break the company, and thus bring about a realization of his pet scheme of municipal ownership and operation. That in the face of this weakening of the forces naturally to be counted on in such a crisis some kind of settlement was so promptly arrived at, must be ascribed to the efficiency and intelligence of the mediatory efforts of Mr. Nixon and Governor Smith, together with the tremendous force which public indignation over the outrage to which it was being subjected put behind those efforts.

THE delegates of the National Federation of State Farm Bureaus said some very sensible things about the high cost of living in their long interview with the President. Extravagance in consumption and carelessness in purchasing unquestionably have a great deal to do with the difficulty which we are all experiencing. In connection with this it is to be noted, however, that when these gentlemen tell us that theatres and places of amusement, resorts, and watering places are crowded, and that in spite of the price of shoe-shines being doubled or trebled, people have to stand in line for their turn, although they could easily shine their own shoes at home for less than one cent, they bear testimony to the fact that while a very large part of the community is suffering intensely from the prevailing high prices, another very large part—and that including a large proportion of the laboring classes—have been having their incomes increased much more than their ordinary expenses have been increased by the high prices. That is one of the things which are going to be changed in the impending adjustment, and the loss to the exceptionally well-paid classes will prove the gain of the others.

AS regards the exactions of the "middleman," it can hardly be said that the illustration which the farmers' committee put to the fore in their talk with the President is very impressive, although in many quarters it seems to have been so regarded. If the materials that went to the making of a dinner for five, of which these gentlemen partook at a Washington hotel, fetched only 82 cents to the producing farmers, while the hotel's charge for the meal was $11, the discrepancy shows nothing really substantial concerning the trouble with the high cost of living. The charge may have been entirely unreasonable; but the point is that there is no "natural" relation between cost of material and the price which a given type of hotel finds it necessary or expedient to charge. If, as some people say, it is self-evidently monstrous that those who had to do with the matter after the stage of original production absorbed ten times the amount got by the producers, why would it not also be monstrous if they absorbed five times as much? The things that go to determining the prices charged in a hotel of a given character belong in a distinct domain, and in that domain are subject to every possible variety. That same eleven-dollar meal could be got for four or five dollars in plenty of places in the very heart of the business section of New York City, and on the other hand there are places where much more than eleven dollars would be charged for it. The same kind of startling arithmetical discrepancy occurs, and always has occurred, in a great many matters in which it is quite clear that the discrepancy is only apparent, not real. It costs more to send a letter from one part of New York to another than it does to send it from Chicago to New York. The publisher of a newspaper has to give as much to the newsboy who sells it on the street corner as he does for the whole enormously complicated process of its manufacture. The druggist has to make several hundred per cent. profit on the sale of many drugs in order to obtain an ordinary living from his business. In the case of every particular "middleman," the circumstances of his special business or function have to be considered before any conclusion can be drawn as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the percentage of gross profit which he makes in the handling of his goods.

THE American Convention of the Episcopal Church to be held at Detroit next October will have an interesting time of it if it takes up for consideration all the recommendations contained in the report of the Commission on the Revision and Enrichment of the Book of Common Prayer. These recommendations combine with an approach to the practice of the Roman Catholic Church a tendency to recognize some of the facts and prejudices of contemporary life. Presumably these latter, which are concerned chiefly with the phraseology of the marriage service, will meet with less opposition than will be called forth by such matters as instinction, prayers for the dead, the reservation of the sacrament for the communion of the sick, and the office of healing by prayer, accompanied with the use of holy oils or the imposition of hands. Not a few of these practices are already in existence; the question will turn on giving them official recognition, and no doubt the discussions will develop a great variety of values attaching to the "dissidence of dissent." Very few, presumably, will object to dropping the word "obey" from the responses of the woman. Patient Griselda is no longer the ideal wife. Nor do Isaac and Rebecca wholly fulfill the modern view of perfection in matrimony. They will not be greatly missed. Against the gallant and generous offer to the man to endow his bride with all his worldly goods there seems to be very little weighty objection, though there have been weddings at which it has started something of a smile. The argument that the law sufficiently protects dower rights affords no very strong reason for dropping all reference to them from the service. The law is capable of taking care of the whole thing, for the matter of that.

A PAUSE in the conversation gave Professor McAndrew Cantlie a chance to discourse on the short-time and long-time effects of the indemnity. "If the Germans pay it—and how can they do otherwise?—they will spend the next forty years in the wilderness. Not that they are the chosen people to my way of thinking—far from that—but they will have the discipline of the wilderness just the same. They will have hard work, long hours, low wages, small profits, high taxes, plain food, poor clothes, overcrowded dwellings, and much distress. Many will die. Indeed, the generation that made the war will leave their bones in the wilderness. Justice will be satisfied and a new generation will arise that have not known Egypt but have been trained in a hard school. By Saint Andrew, if they can endure it, it will make men and freemen of them—like the Romans, the Jews, the Armenians, the Yankees, the Scots. We Scots are a great people, and we owe it to our poverty—our barren moors, our rough crags, our niggardly soil, our dour climate, our oatmeal, our Shorter Catechism. True, we are of good stock, but the Germans are akin to us and the pressure of necessity may make them incredibly capable. Time will show. Meanwhile, we conquerors are going to take it easy, with ca'canny, the six-hour day, and all that. Very enjoyable, no doubt, but I fear it will make us soft in body and mind—I fear it."

Inflation and Prices

IN the very important letter of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, nothing has attracted more attention than this sentence:

The increased volume of Federal Reserve notes in circulation during the last three years, in so far as it is not the result of direct exchanges for gold and gold certificates which have been withdrawn from circulation, is the effect of advancing wages and prices, and not their cause.

What Governor Harding here says is, in a sense, indisputable; but it is a mistake to regard the statement as going to the bottom of the question. It does not even go to the bottom of the question of the part played by the Federal Reserve notes themselves; still less does it justify inferences which have been drawn from it—inferences certainly not intended by Mr. Harding—as to the influence of an increase in the volume of the currency as a whole, and of the expansion of bank credits, upon the level of prices.

So far as regards the stock of currency in the country, nowhere does there appear in Mr. Harding's careful and comprehensive discussion any intimation that the great influx of gold which marked the period between the beginning of the great war and our entry into it was not instrumental in causing a great rise in the general level of prices. And as to bank credits, we have something more than the absence of denial to go upon. The credit expansion which has taken place as an accompaniment of our war finance was, Mr. Harding declares, inevitable, but will be corrected as the securities issued by the United States Government for war purposes are gradually absorbed by investors. This expansion is measured by "the difference between the total of the war expenditures of the Government on the one hand, and on the other the total amount raised by the Government through taxation and by the sale of its obligations so far as paid for out of savings." And to remedy "the present situation" not only must we "produce and distribute the largest possible volume of commodities" and "exercise reasonable economies" in consumption, but also the Government's "obligations, so far as they are carried by the banks, must be absorbed." It is most important that the public should understand that this clear acknowledgment of expansion of bank credits as a cause of high prices is contained in Mr. Harding's statement; for no single thing is capable of doing more harm in the present critical time than the idea that the level of prices is brought about simply by the exactions of those demanding high compensation—whether capitalists or laborers—and is subject to no limitation in the basic facts of money and banking.

Let us go back now to the special question of the relation between the issue of Federal Reserve notes and the level of prices. Mr. Harding says that the high prices are the cause and not the effect of the increased volume of such notes issued against commercial paper. Undoubtedly the prevailing high prices cause a greater volume of such paper to be offered for discount at the banks, and to be by them deposited in the Federal Reserve banks in exchange for Federal Reserve notes secured by that paper. But these notes in their turn enlarge the volume of the currency, and thus help to sustain the high prices; the check which the limits of the circulating medium tend to apply to the rise in the scale of prices is, to that extent, nullified. In the sentence immediately preceding the one which has attracted so much attention, and which was quoted above, Governor Harding says:

Thus there can not at any time be more Federal Reserve notes in circulation than the needs of the country at the present state of prices require, and as the need abates the volume of notes outstanding will be correspondingly reduced through redemption. [The italics throughout are ours.]

"At the present state of prices," undoubtedly; but one of the factors determining the present state of prices is the volume of the currency, and one of the factors determining the volume of the currency is the volume of the Federal Reserve notes. Governor Harding refers to the fact that, in addition to the deposit of commercial paper, a 40 per cent. gold reserve is required to be held against the notes. Suppose that instead of 40 per cent. only 20 per cent. had been required, and suppose—as we well may—that this would not have interfered with the fulfillment of any actual demand for the redemption of the notes in gold. Is there not every reason to believe that this would have resulted in a still greater enlargement of the country's currency? Every dollar of Federal Reserve notes would still have been issued in response to the needs of the country at the existing price-level, and in that sense would have been "the effect of advancing wages and prices"; but, though not displacing the gold standard, it would also have played its part as a cause of high prices, through the support it gave to them in the shape of increase of the circulating medium.

Our country, alone among the great commercial nations of the western world, remains strictly on a gold basis; all forms of the dollar are on a par with gold, there being no doubt in any one's mind of the practical exchangeableness for gold dollars of any of the various forms of the dollar in use. Some part of the obscurity in which the question of the relation between "inflation" and prices is involved in many minds must be ascribed to the ambiguity of the word. If inflation of currency is defined as such a condition of it as makes it worth less in gold than its nominal amount, our currency is not inflated. But while the application of the word is doubtful, the fact with which we have to deal is clear enough. In the United States, precisely because it is the only great financial and commercial country that now squarely upholds the gold standard, anything that affects the volume of the medium of payments—whether in the shape of currency or of bank credits—has a potent influence upon prices. When the gold standard was actually maintained throughout the great world of commerce, a change in the banking or currency policy of any one country which brought about an enlargement of its media of payment other than gold had a comparatively small effect, because it would drive out gold and would (except for a brief interval) raise the price-level in the particular country only as it raised the world-level of prices; in the present situation, on the other hand, the United States is practically a closed domain so far as regards its circulating medium, and therefore anything in its banking or currency policy which tends to expand or to contract its circulating medium has an effect upon prices far more marked than it would have in normal times.

Another source of misunderstanding concerning the relation of the money supply to the level of prices is to be found in a sheer logical oversight. Nobody pretends that the volume of the currency is the sole determinant of prices; nor even the volume of the currency together with its rapidity of circulation and the extent to which banking and credit arrangements take the place of tangible currency in the transaction of business. These things constitute only one side of the equation; the other side is furnished by the volume of business. When there is an increase in the effective monetary supply—i.e., the volume and circulating efficiency of the currency, together with the resources of the credit system—and at the same time an increase in the volume of business—i.e., the volume of production, transportation, and exchange as measured in kind and not in money—two opposing tendencies are brought into play: the increase in the monetary supply tending to raise prices, the increase in the things to be handled with the money tending to raise them. The quantity theory of money takes both these elements into account, the second just as much as the first; but opponents of that theory often think they have overthrown it when what they have actually done is simply to overlook the second element. Thus it has been pointed out, by way of showing the falseness of the quantity theory, that in the period from 1873 to 1896, which marked the great decline in prices from the highest to the lowest level of that century, the amount of money per capita in circulation in the United States actually increased by about 18 per cent. But it was precisely in this period that there took place an unprecedented development of production and exchange, the introduction of labor-saving machinery on an enormous scale, and the transformation of the United States from a comparatively primitive, and in the main agricultural, country to a great modern industrial and financial nation. Before one can draw from the figures mentioned any inference as to the soundness of the quantity theory, one would have to determine whether the increased quantity and changed character of the nation's productive activities—not forgetting the immense development of modern agriculture and transportation—was not far more than a match for the increase in per capita circulation and the enlargement and improvement of the credit and banking system.

What has happened in these last years is the concurrence of a vast increase in the effective monetary supply with a vast diminution in the production of useful commodities, the world over. Instead of two factors of opposing tendency, both factors have worked in the same direction, and their combined effect has been an unprecedented rise of prices. To check, or reverse, the rising tide, we must no doubt rely in the main, for a considerable period at least, on the increase of the world's productivity. If that beneficent process, which, speaking broadly, had been steadily going forward for many decades, shall be renewed, it will tend, as it has always tended, to pull prices down. But it would be most unfortunate if we should become blind to the fact that the unwholesomely expanded condition of the effective monetary supply—currency plus credits—is also a most potent element in the situation, and, though it may not lend itself to immediately remedial action, demands the scrupulous attention of those responsible for our banking and currency policy.

The Crisis in Siberia

UNLESS the news given out by the State Department is unduly pessimistic, the Omsk Government is facing a crisis which brings it to the verge of collapse and threatens to render unavailing Admiral Kolchak's valiant efforts to stem the red flood of Bolshevism pouring in from European Russia. If the collapse occurs the human toll will be frightful, as is sufficiently indicated by the hundreds of thousands of pitiful refugees who are now making their way eastward out of the districts already evacuated. In addition to this vast welter of physical suffering, there must be taken into account the moral degradation of that portion of the Russian population which up to the present has been most wholesome and sane, and has promised best for the rehabilitation of Russia. Perhaps the greatest problem which the world faces to-day as the result of nearly two years of Bolshevik rule in Russia, is the menace of a hundred million people degraded and demoralized, a source of infection to other nations. Even if organized government is speedily restored, years must elapse before anything like moral order can be regained, and this period will be prolonged by the untoward events in Siberia.

Allied and American policy in Siberia defies analysis, and it is impossible from available data to apportion the blame for its inexcusable failures. There should have been no hesitation from the first in drawing the line between the German-inspired Bolshevik movement, with its warfare on civilization, and the efforts of the Russian people to throw off this alien tyranny and restore the national Russian State. A year ago a golden opportunity was providentially offered to lend aid to the loyal Russians, who were still our allies, and the Czechoslovaks. Such aid would have enabled them to hold the line of the Volga and detain German forces and matériel, so that they could not be employed against us on the Western front. But we seemed utterly to misunderstand the nature of the struggle, and assistance was withheld, although there were hundreds of thousands of Russian rifles and other material available in this country that could have been drawn upon without prejudice to our needs in France. Upon the failure of the incompetent Avksentiev administration, Admiral Kolchak accepted the onerous task of carrying on the fight. Again a splendid opportunity was offered for coöperation with a régime that represented liberalism and order. We owe to England and France our gratitude for the assistance rendered by them, although it was of necessity pitifully weak. Our own detachment of 9,000 men, stationed at Vladivostok and bound by orders which limited their activities and enforced a false attitude of "neutrality," was a hindrance instead of a help.

Meanwhile there was let loose in America a flood of vicious propaganda falsely attributing to Admiral Kolehak reactionary and Tsarist designs and making utterly unfounded accusations against his administration. How far this plot to undermine the efforts of the Russian people to restore their country succeeded in influencing our own Government can only be surmised, but its effect in confusing public opinion has been serious.

On the heels of the report of Kolchak's reverses and imminent peril comes another significant item of news. It is reported that the United States Government has authorized the shipment to Siberia, for the use of the anti-Bolshevik forces operating under Admiral Kolchak, a large quantity of guns and ammunition. It is understood that 200,000 rifles have already been delivered to the Russian representatives and that these weapons, with large quantities of ammunition, are now being shipped to Vladivostok. The implication is that our Government has changed its policy and has at last recognized the nature of the struggle and our own vital interest in it. That which should have been done a year ago is now being tardily undertaken. The delay will cost hundreds of thousands of lives, but the supplies may come in time to prevent the threatened collapse.

The actual military situation of Kolchak's army may not be so bad as the reports given out would seem to indicate. Fighting in Siberia takes place not on a continuous front, but along railway lines, of which there are but two west of Omsk. The Bolshevik forces in their recent advances have over-extended their lines of communication, and they are at the same time seriously threatened by Denikin's victories in the south. The Siberian population, although sadly exhausted by the unequal struggle, are a unit in supporting the Omsk Government in its struggle against the return of the hated Bolshevik rule. Private advices indicate that the Bolshevik advance has been held up and the Siberian army is making a brave stand. It is to be hoped that the Allies and America will now make up in energy for the previous lamentable delay, and save the situation before it is too late.

The German Constitution

THE new German Constitution, which came into force last week, seems a robust and healthy one worthy of a free and self-reliant people. Little else could be expected from a new democracy that claims to have cured itself of the sores of an obsolete despotism. But even the healthiest constitution is liable to a breakdown unless the body obey the dictates of its inherent laws. Its worth must be tested by the use that is made of it: not on its wording but on its working does its value depend. "All citizens of Germany shall enjoy complete freedom of belief and conscience," so the Constitution lays down; but what power is vested in the letter of that declaration if the people's spirit remains infected with the poison of anti-semitism? "All schools must make an effort to educate their students in the spirit of the German people and in the spirit of reconciliation with the peoples of the world," is another of these fundamental lessons in social conduct. But this twofold injunction will remain mere verbiage if the spirit of the German people be itself irreconcilable with that spirit of reconciliation it recommends, as we are told it is by such as have visited Germany since the armistice. Little is changed there, they say, except that the Kaiser is gone. Comrade Noske is an autocrat in Socialist disguise, ruling by the grace of the Junkers, who supply him with the military power for the maintenance of order. And this new Constitution may, in practice, prove to be what minority socialists take it for: a democratic travesty of the old régime, to be thrown off when time and opportunity serve.

One may have full confidence in the legislators themselves, giving them credit for single-mindedness and sincerity of purpose, and yet suspect the work of their brains, which, being the product of this ambiguous and puzzling time, is bound to share its ambiguity. That Germany, at this precarious juncture, has a government at all is due to an unnatural alliance of Roman Catholics and majority Socialists. Hence the Constitution inevitably shows the earmarks of compromise. The Socialist ideal of one German State in which the individual States of the old Empire would be merged has had to yield to the opposition of the Centre, which, by its agitation for a Rhine Republic, has shown itself to favor opposite tendencies. The old frontiers within the realm remain intact. The unity of the "Reich" is not, in the first instance, realized by legislation, but is to be effected by economic means such as the socialization of national resources and the centralized control of production and distribution. The individual States retain legislative rights in all matters which are not exclusively governed by Imperial legislation. The problem of repopulation is naturally one of those which must be regulated by "Reichsgesetz"; immigration, protection of motherhood, and hygiene, which bear on the same question, are also exclusively subject to superstate legislation.

The individual States, however, are not deprived of all influence on the making of these Imperial laws: no bill of that nature can be introduced in the Reichstag without the consent of the Reichsrat, or Imperial Council, which will be composed of representatives of the individual States. In this revival of the old Bundesrat the number of votes that each State is entitled to will depend on the number of millions of inhabitants within its borders. To obviate the dangerous predominance of Prussia, the root of all evil in the past, the Constitution provides that no State can have more than two-fifths of the total number of votes in the Council. The power of the Reichstag, in which the will of the sovereign people is vested, is restricted by the Reichsrat in yet another respect: the nation's representatives can not raise the amount of the budget without reaching an agreement with the Council; in other words, the control of the national finances by the representatives of the German people is held in check by other representatives elected by the same voters in their several capacities of Prussians, Bavarians, Saxons, Hessians, etc.

Even the possibility of war between the "Reich" and one of its States is faced by the Constitution. "The President," it says, "can employ armed forces for quelling disturbances, and may send them against States which do not fulfill their duties." Thus the Empire is given the right of punitive war against a recalcitrant or criminal member of the German community of States. This restriction of the right of war to the function of an interstate police is the ideal towards which the project of a League of Nations was primarily directed; how far the actual League constructed at Versailles falls short of it, all the world is fully aware.

The Actors' Strike and Others

THE sensational and humorous features of the actors' strike should blind no one to its significance. We have a strike mostly of high-paid artists. The really oppressed persons of the theatre, the chorus and supernumeraries, joined later out of sympathy. The walk-out was less for specific grievances than on the old issue of recognition of the union. The actors are merely doing on a conspicuous scale what other wage-earning intellectuals had begun to do. The News Writers of Boston are unionized, and without a strike have secured higher pay. Certain college faculties have allied themselves with the American Federation of Labor. When pay falls to the hardship level, considerations of gentility dwindle to the vanishing point, and justly so. Artist and artisan, reporter and ironworker, professor and coal miner, are not so different in the face of short rations. Even the Authors' League has come near to being transmogrified into a union.

We have fairly in sight unions of professional people, for the same reason that we have unions of workmen. So far the new kind of union acts just like the old, is indeed gladly guided by managers from the workingman. Thus the Actors' Equity Association really picked a quarrel with the managers in order to make a test of strength. It called the strike when performances were going on, causing as much trouble as possible to everybody. It showed it was strong enough to make its members obey unreasonable orders. It planned to frighten the managers into immediate submission.

As yet the event remains uncertain. Actors have flocked into the union, but some of great weight, like Mr. Sothorn and Mr. Warfield, have resigned. Meanwhile the managers have sued a brilliant list of union actors for damages caused by the strike.

Despite the famous decision in the case of the Danbury Hatters, labor unions have generally contrived to avoid financial responsibility. It is plain that if we are to have unions of professional people, such unions will have rich members who under present law can be made answerable for illegal damage caused by the union. We shall doubtless have a howl for legislative relief, but it is difficult to see how in justice a labor union may indulge in destructive practices that are forbidden to a commercial corporation. The mulcted hatters of Danbury gained sympathy, as poor men, which will not attach to the wealthy members of the actors' union. But the principle is in either case the same—there is a point at which a union is not allowed to push its special quarrel to the general hurt. Such considerations ought especially to restrain the new unions of intellectuals. As a matter of fact the actors too readily lent themselves to the stereotyped tactics of the walking delegates.

There is a fallacy in the view that all any union needs to do is to hit hard enough and it will be feared thereafter. A union is not judged wholly by its force but by the judgment it shows in the use thereof. For a generation the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was the most influential union in America. It rarely had to call a strike, it would have scorned to call the engineers off trains en route or to have left perishable freight at sidings. As the railroad unions have adopted the method of threat and political agitation they have sacrificed public sympathy. So the actors by taking the view that a strike is only a brute demonstration of force have done much to alienate support. In a democracy power must be respected or it will be suspected. The unions may gain particular points by indulging an industrial Prussianism, but they will not thrive in the long run unless they make a reasonable use of their power. Striking is not war, it is merely an acute stage of negotiation. It is to be feared that the managers of labor unions are mixing up the notion of collective bargaining with that of class warfare—the English industrial strike with the French political strike. If intellectual workers are to be unionized, as seems likely, they would do well to study their own interests and develop their own technic of controversy and negotiation. The way of a tragedian with his manager is not necessarily that of a boilermaker with his boss.

R. A. Blakelock

RALPH ALBERT BLAKELOCK died in the Adirondack home of friends on August 9. He was one of the most original figures in American painting and surely the most pathetic. Born in New York City, October 15, 1847, his early life was without incident except for a trip to the Rockies, which left permanent memories of the glamour of Indian life. A few very early canvases show the sturdy and somewhat clayey naturalism of the Düsseldorf landscapists. He had probably, with his generation, admired the Achenbachs and their American emulators. But he was completely self-trained, and soon developed a fantastic mood all his own.

A characteristic Blakelock is a twilight thing conceived in mellow browns and russets, accented with deep yellows and a dash of scarlet, and relieved by a patch of blue. The theme is generally a fret of dark trees against the sky; perhaps there are Indian lodges, or faintly indicated squaws and braves dancing, resting, or drifting in canoes. Everything depends on elementary picturesqueness of silhouette and on tone. The surface is worked and kneaded into a vibrating, lustrous veil apparently illuminated from within. Superficially the method is like the more sober phase of Monticelli. Blakelock was keenly sensitive to music, and the elusive quality of the more modern harmonies is in his pictures. In the main contours is a certain obviousness or even harshness which is made beautiful by the enveloping tone. One might say that the overtones count for more than the dominant. There is little reference to nature, but the mood is poetic and consistent in the orchestration of the arbitrarily chosen hues.

These delightful fantasies from the first left the public cold. They fitted into no admitted category. In poverty Blakelock resolutely pursued his vein. When it was clearly impossible to sell his occasional canvases, he painted for the auctioneers hundreds of little compositions, often on cigar-box covers. These were knocked down for twenty dollars or so in the cheap auction sales of thirty years ago, the artist realizing a few dollars a picture after frames and expenses were paid. Naturally his fame does not depend on this class of work, though it includes much that is charming. In direst need and haste the element of taste and poetry was never lacking in the man. But he will be remembered for his few great compositions like the nobly spectacular "Moonlight," now in the Toledo Museum, and for such masterpieces of an operatic mood as the "Indian Dance" in the Metropolitan Museum.

In his early fifties the losing struggle with poverty and neglect at length broke the sensitive spirit. For eighteen years he was to live in the insane asylum, indulging beneficent delusions of unlimited wealth. The sensation aroused by his breakdown, which was pitiful in its circumstances, brought him a fame which his mere art had been unable to procure. His pictures actually brought good prices, and in the remarkable auction sales which from 1903 began to establish new values for American pictures, Blakelock reasonably held his own with Homer Martin and with Inness. He became a legend, was the subject of an excellent memoir by his friend Elliott Daingerfield, had the honor of being counterfeited by skillful forgers. It is to-day almost as difficult to get a real Blakelock in the casual market in New York as it is to buy a real scarab on the streets of Cairo.

The growing legend of Blakelock was enhanced still further through the piety of admirers, who in 1916 removed him from the asylum. Under kindly guardianship he revisited New York, saw his pictures in museums, was able to detect the spurious imitations, realized in a measure the fame that had befallen him. It was like a resurrection, and it profoundly impressed the world. That it was a sadly incomplete resurrection the pictures which Blakelock now painted plainly showed. His friends had won for him two years of liberty and some taste of fame. He went back to the asylum and only reemerged to die amid the forests he loved to dream of in life. He was seventy-two years old.

Unquestionably Blakelock was cruelly neglected in his prime. He never could have been popular simply for his painting—it was too individual for that—but any community really sensitive to imaginative painting would have seen to it that he had a living. He fell on a time when there was little independence of judgment as regards American art. The dealers, who very largely controlled the collecting of the seventies, handled preferably the sure and profitable commodity provided by Salon exhibitors. Blakelock himself received an honorable mention in the Paris exhibition of 1900, but he was already mad, as he was when the National Academy in 1913 elected him to its membership. He suffered in fullest degree all the penalties that a professedly individualistic age visited on almost every sort of artistic originality. One marvels at such proscription when one recalls how gentle and ingratiating Blakelock's modest self-assertion was.

His is a muted kind of painting. We possibly as much overestimate it now because of the glamour of his personal legend as we underestimated when his signature in its arrowhead frame meant nothing. His vein is at times a little cloying and thin. He had neither the full-flavored romance of Monticelli nor the pondered and massive inventiveness of Albert Ryder. Alongside of these quite kindred artists, the limitations of his genius may readily be measured. Under more favorable conditions he would have done much more and better—the great decorative canvas "Moonlight" is the evidence that he but seldom fully realized himself as a designer. But even in its incompleteness, his art has its authentic vein of a shy poetry which should keep it alive longer than the unhappy legend of its creator.

College Salaries and College Quality

IN connection with the Harvard campaign for endowment there was uttered a warning that those who fear Bolshevism can not afford to underpay the men who teach their sons. The context leads one to infer that the remark was not altogether a joke. It is not. The sturdiest faith of even a conservative spirit, in the expediency of the order of things, can not survive years of petty harassment under that order. If there is anything that a mental worker requires it is peace of mind. In general, the professor does not make excessive demands for material rewards; he has "taken the vow of poverty" in a certain very real sense. It does not worry him that he has no steam yacht or limousine of luxury; he is quite content to go to some rustic region of a summer, and still further wear out clothes once discarded for reason of tenuity. But there are heart-sinkings when he sees, as the reward of his economies and doings-without, the gradual mounting of debt—of obligations for whose discharge he can see no means of providing. His salary has virtually been cut in half since 1900, and he was not doing too well even then. A pervading feeling of fear and depression lames his powers, and at length, when the hopefulness and resilience of youth is past, renders him critical and resentful. Add to this a certain concern lest all may not be well with his chances for a Carnegie pension, upon which he has hitherto reckoned, and you have a state of mind and temper that army authorities call low morale. And if the professor is getting into this state, what of the instructor? The latter has youth on his side; but he is, in a number of cases, as shown by a collection of young college teachers' budgets, either putting off marriage, putting off a family, or living with wife, or wife and family, in restricted quarters—"in a room with alcove"—and meanwhile, unless he has some savings, running into several hundred dollars of debt every year.

A man in this condition of mind distrusts the social system under which he suffers, and is on the road to a conviction that it can not be the worse for a change. Any one of us who has been careful and economical feels that he ought to have something to show for it. If care and economy do not get results in the world, it must be the fault of the system—not ours. The conclusion is that the system must be changed. Your professor, at any rate, is not getting on under it. He is being cramped and humiliated on all sides, is conscious that he is becoming quasi-miserly through over-attention to pennies—in fact, is himself living a petty and sordid life, and, what is much worse, sees those he most cares for, and for whom he is responsible, involved in the same destiny. He willingly took on the vow of poverty for himself, perhaps, but not for them. He would go into plumbing if he knew enough. He is in the clutch of an out-and-out exasperating experience, one that is destructive both of his dignity and his self-respect.

Whether, under this harrow, he reveals bolshevoid tendencies or not, a man in such a mood ought not to be teaching our sons. He is bound to be wearied and distraught, if not bitter and cynical. It takes enthusiasm and fervor to fire the heart of youth. There is call for the clear and equable mind, sufficiently at rest as respects its own concerns to be able to spare that force upon which his charges ought to have the right to draw. As things now go, the best men will keep out of teaching, and presently the inferior ones, less robust and resistant of nonsense, may actually fall, as some have already fallen, into the status of suggestible malcontents. The heads of most professors are not yet weak enough for Bolshevism; but certain journals that dish up brain-softening compounds, full of insinuation and suggestion, are far too popular among them. To such influences they are becoming ever more "open-minded." This is dangerous. If the cure of Russian Bolshevism is more food, the prophylaxis of professorial Bolshevism is more salary.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION

140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Science and Our Social Problem

WE are moving rapidly into an almost panicky condition concerning the high cost of living and the whole social problem connected with it. We are crying out rather hysterically for a better, or as we more usually call it, fairer distribution of means to buy food, clothing, fuel, and the other things necessary to keep alive, and preferably comfortably alive. When we look to the encouraging statistics of last year's production of food crops, raw materials for clothing and shoes, of coal and oil, and to our hopeful official guesses of what this year's total production will be; when we read statements concerning great food stocks existent in the hands of packers and War Department and of tremendous exportations to Europe by food handlers and by Government, and then when we try to buy what we want to eat and wear, we detect something very rotten in Denmark, and set up a loud and prolonged howl.

This howl has been heard in Washington. And Washington, that is, Government, is hurriedly trying to do something. The President is having conferences; Senators and Congressmen are introducing bills; departments and commissions are starting investigations. But all these activities are chiefly aimed at immediate palliations of one kind or another. Above all they concern themselves with possibilities of an immediately better distribution of existent means to buy things and of existent things bought, and with immediately applied restrictions of one sort or another on profiteering and on overmuch middleman handling between producer and consumer. All these are highly desirable things to accomplish, and all undoubtedly capable of some degree of accomplishment, but all take into too little account one of the fundamental causes of the difficulty, perhaps indeed the cause without whose remedy no very serious palliation of our trouble can be expected at all, and with whose remedy—and it is a matter eminently capable of radical remedy—will go naturally a palliation of several of the other difficulties now being so anxiously considered.

It seems like uttering a paradox to say, in the face of our grain and meat and wool and leather statistics and our figures of food-stocks and exportations, that the fundamental remedy for our social problem is a higher productive capacity and more actual production. Of course, any added supplies from higher production must not be left to the uncontrolled tender mercies of profiteering criminals, nor started on a career of middleman handling and taxing that may involve a half dozen superfluous purely trading operations, nor, finally, offered for purchase to a public mostly devoid of means to buy anything. Some of these things must be attended to by Presidential conferences, Congressional bills, and departmental investigation and action, in a word by Government and State interference. But some of them will get themselves straightened out naturally by the prime remedy for the whole difficulty.

Professor Arthur Lovejoy, who is a philosopher by profession and a man of much close observation, keen ratiocination, and common sense by natural endowment, has most effectively revealed in the Review (July 5) the fallacy in the assumption, commonly made by men now interesting themselves in finding some swift solution of our social problem, that there exists a social surplus and hence that the whole remedy is one of better distribution. It is not. The fundamental remedy, not the whole remedy but the basically necessary one to which others need to be added, but without which there will be no real remedy at all, is better, higher, more productivity. And this increase of productivity from the use of the same given number of acres, same number of hours of labor, or even the desirable fewer hours, from the same amount of rainfall and sunlight, and in the face of whatever other naturally fixed conditions there may be, can be effected, and effected only by acquiring more scientific knowledge and using more of what is already known. If Harvard succeeds in raising eleven million dollars for the increase of the salaries of its professors, so that these gentlemen and their families can keep comfortably alive, it will be a pleasant thing to note and will be given much attention as an effective contribution towards solving a very special social problem. But the really important thing that may come out of this Harvard modification of the difficulties of a few hundred men will be a permanent contribution to the material and social problem of the whole country, made by only one of them perhaps, thus aided to continue his work of scientific research without the present drawbacks of hunger, nakedness, and worry; his discovery alone may add eleven million dollars' worth a year to our present possible production. That will be a Harvard contribution to the solution of the country's social problem to be truly proud of. But it will, indeed, perhaps depend on the earlier temporarily palliating contribution of the better salary.

This added productivity that may be possible because of the Harvard scientific man's discovery, or that will certainly be attained, if we stimulate effort in scientific research among scientific investigators throughout the country, will not, as many will at first claim, perhaps, simply add so much more potential well-being to that which is already apparent but tantalizingly out of reach of realization by most of us. It will rather tend strongly to put its new self and all that which already exists into our hands, because it will lower prices; it will change the relation of value between the available amount of commodities and the available amount of money.

The chief reason why our production, unusually good as it was last year and unusually good as it will probably be this year, does not suffice to effect the needed lowering of prices now, is because it has to face an unprecedented demand, a demand created by a happening which we all hope, and most of us are trying to insure, will never occur again. It is the demand created by a protracted war of which an astounding destruction and a seriously lessened production of food, fuel, and the materials needed for clothing and shoes were conspicuous incidents. The elevation of prices because of this great demand is materially added to by the notable increase that has taken place during the war and post-war period of the wages of all labor involved in production. These increased wages will not decrease, or will decrease but little. And the demand from Europe for food and materials from America will last for several years. We might, perhaps, if our producers would permit it, and we could close our eyes and ears to the terrible need in Europe, restrict our exportations by a series of rigorous embargoes. We might let all Europe go hungry, as we let Germany, during the war as a war necessity, go hungry. But Europe, too hungry, might make more trouble for us than will a persistence of high prices here until we can get our remedy of more production at work. And, anyway, we "have a heart." We do not want anybody in Europe to starve.

The relation of scientific discovery and the application of scientific knowledge to increased productivity and increased well-being hardly needs to be labored. We are all sufficiently educated to understand it. But we are inclined to pay too little attention to the conditions under which we can expect science to do its part towards helping us out. To get from to-morrow on, by the help of science, an annual addition of eleven million or eleven hundred million dollars' worth of added production out of the same acres, materials, and labor that we now have, we may need to be willing to put up at first eleven million dollars of which the income or even the whole shall be used to make the necessary scientific activity possible. It is necessary to prime the pump.

Curiously enough, England, whom we have never accused of appreciating and sustaining scientific work more than we do, has better learned the lesson of the war in this regard than we have. Perhaps she needed more to learn it. At any rate, England, seeing that Germany was able to make the formidable war effort she did make largely because of her aid from science, and seeing that the final overcoming of this effort by the Allies and America was also largely due to a successful appeal to science, has already taken steps to keep science promptly available to her in all future time by a material encouragement of scientific research. She has established a Department of Scientific and Industrial Research, with a beginning fund of five million dollars to enable it to stimulate and support scientific investigation for the benefit of the Empire. In addition, the Dominions, notably Canada and Australia, have independently appropriated funds for similar work on problems peculiar to their own conditions. Japan has also established a National Laboratory for Scientific and Industrial Research with a fund of two and a half million dollars for use during the next ten years. Italy, despite, or perhaps because of, political and social difficulties, is also establishing a National Research Council. France is less forward in efforts along this line, although the matter is under active discussion.

All these efforts to promote the recognized fundamental basis of national material strength and well-being are outgrowths of the war's revelations. The British, Japanese, and Italian foundations date from 1916 and 1917. And from the war period also dates our own establishment of a National Research Council—without, however, any Governmental endowment or any Governmental support at all since the end of the war. The Council was established to mobilize, as it were, the scientific men and knowledge of the country to aid in achieving victory. And it really did aid. The Departments of the War and Navy will gladly testify to that. Now that the victory is won the Council has reorganized itself on a peace-footing, and intends to try to make itself useful in connection with any of those problems of peace time to the solution of which science can directly contribute. It has found some support from private sources, sufficient to maintain it as an organization, with an administrative staff and central office, and to maintain it in a position to appeal to the scientific men of the country to renew their efforts in research and to suggest and encourage coöperation among them in attacks on problems too many-sided for individual handling. On the other hand, America does give Governmental support, and for the most part very generously, to a number of well-developed scientific bureaus in various Government departments. But these bureaus are all pretty heavily burdened with routine duties and the popularization of scientific knowledge. They can and do devote some time and energy to scientific investigation, but they can by no means give themselves exclusively to productive research. And it is this that we need now above all else.

Our problem of higher productivity, greater actual production, and increased well-being of the citizenry, in a word our social problem, for the social problem is chiefly only a summation of these various material problems, demands for help in its solution the immediate renewed and persistent efforts of science. And we must see to it that these efforts are forthcoming. They can yield wondrous results. They must, if we are to survive.

VERNON KELLOGG

The Tragedy of Liberalism in Siberia

FOR some weeks things have been going very badly for the Omsk Government. After a disturbing silence the State Department has made public reports that show the imminent danger which threatens that bulwark against Bolshevism. Perhaps by the time these lines are printed the Kolchak organization will have collapsed, or will be making a final stand in Eastern Siberia. Such a collapse would be a tragedy not only for the Russian people but for the Allies and America as well.

A year ago last June, the resistance of the Czechoslovaks to the treacherous plot of the German-directed Soviet Government to annihilate them made possible the freeing of Siberia from Bolshevik rule. Immediately there sprang up local governments which attempted to reorganize community life and bring order out of chaos. Gradually these governments were merged into larger organizations, with their chief centres at Omsk, Ekaterinburg, and Samara. The Government at Omsk was more distinctly Siberian and at the beginning showed less interest in European Russia. The Government at Samara was decidedly Socialistic, and, under the leadership of such theorists as Avksentiev, was in some ways not much better than Bolshevik, and embodied all the weaknesses of Kerensky's deplorable régime. But a conference at Ufa, in which all the available members of the old Constituent Assembly participated, together with representatives of other national units and local organizations, laid the foundation for a new Russian Government. The form of administration was a Directory of five members, at the head of which was Avksentiev.

With the collapse of resistance on the Volga, this Government was moved to Omsk, and in order to secure harmony and coöperation there was elaborated a Cabinet in addition to the Directory. After functioning for a short time and showing utter inefficiency, both in administration and in the formation of an army, this Government was overthrown on November 18. Of Avksentiev's treachery and the other causes of this revolution, I have written in earlier numbers of the Review. As a result of this coup d'état, Admiral Kolchak was asked to undertake the supreme command and save the Government in its terrible crisis. Having had no share whatever in the coup d'état, and being a loyal, patriotic, liberal, and self-sacrificing man, he accepted the heavy task.

The difficulties facing him were stupendous. A whole new governmental organization had to be constructed after seven months of Bolshevik rule. An army had to be created to meet the forces of Bolshevism in the west, and for this munitions and money were lacking, and the brunt of the fight had to fall at once on raw levies. In the east his lines of communication were threatened by independent bands who did not recognize his authority and who were supported by the Japanese. To assist him in these gigantic tasks, Admiral Kolchak was obliged to depend upon second-rate and inexperienced men. Many of the Russian leaders had been killed or were in hiding. Others had fled to the south of Russia, or had sought refuge abroad. Of those of the intellectual classes who were in Siberia, many were poisoned with Socialism, and those who had had experience in administrative service under the old régime and who could have given valuable assistance were excluded because their employment would bring with it the suspicion of reaction.

The simplest materials for organizing were lacking. As an illustration of this, one of the men who took part in the establishment of the Ministry of Commerce and Industry told me that no maps of Russia were available, but he managed to get from the local agency of the International Harvester Company some little maps that they had published as advertisements. Newspapers and official announcements were printed on brown paper. Transportation was in a frightful state and a large amount of the available rolling-stock of the railroad was occupied by refugees, who could not be turned out to freeze in the snows of the Siberian winter. Speculators sprang up on every side and sent prices skyward with their extortionate demands.

During the first month of its existence, Kolchak's Government was threatened by two plots, one monarchist and the other Bolshevik. In the confusion following the suppression of the latter, certain reactionaries took from the prison some radical Socialists who had been members of the old Constituent Assembly and lynched them. Although Kolchak at once secured the arrest, conviction, and execution of the guilty persons—more than can be said of some of our own Governors—lying propagandists in our parlor-Bolshevik journals are charging Kolchak himself with the murder.

Observers on the spot did not believe that Kolchak's Government could last out the winter in the face of the fearful obstacles that confronted it. But it had the support of all the people of western Siberia, with the exception of a few bands of criminal Bolsheviks that had taken refuge in the woods and made occasional bandit raids on unprotected communities. Bolshevik atrocities in eastern Russia sufficiently explain why the Siberians mobilized 450,000 strong, freely and without demur, to prevent a recurrence of soviet government. It is not difficult to understand why the peasants of two provinces, Tobolsk and Tomsk, this spring voluntarily paid their taxes a year in advance to aid the Government.

But America would not understand. Just at the time when help and sympathy were most needed, both were withheld. Our Government seemed to believe that the Kolchak Government represented a monarchist plot aimed at the newly won liberties of the Russian people. There were not lacking cunning agitators to spread this insidious slander. Men like Raymond Robins circulated such misrepresentations with persuasive oratory and clever writing. Note the steps in the tragic drama. Roland Morris was American Ambassador at Tokio. He undoubtedly had his views of Russia, about which he was entirely ignorant, colored by Raymond Robins, the friend and apologist of Lenin and Trotsky. President Wilson sent him to Vladivostok to report on the Russian situation, than which no place in all Russia was less suited for such an investigation. Is it strange that our Government failed to judge the situation correctly, especially since no effort was made to evaluate the evidence of scores of available witnesses in the light of the knowledge of serious students of Russia?

As a result our military expedition to Vladivostok, sent "to guard the rear of the Czechoslovaks," was confined to the environs of that city and our military zone became a haven and vantage ground for bands of Bolshevik outlaws, towards whom we observed a benevolent neutrality, enabling them to commit depredations on the surrounding country with impunity. The Russians, who had been led by our fulsome promises to expect aid in their struggle against the common enemy, came to believe that our only object in sending troops was to guard the stores at Vladivostok in which we had a financial interest. Our War Trade Board, by instituting everywhere inquiries as to the needs of the population, raised hopes of assistance, hopes that were dashed to the ground. Interested parties managed to permeate the Y. M. C. A. organization with so many Russian-Jewish Bolshevik agitators that it had to be withdrawn from the front.

The Omsk Government, although possessing a gold reserve of over $300,000,000, had no small currency and no paper or equipment for printing any. In New York was an abundant supply that had been engraved for the Provisional Government. It was shipped as far as Vladivostok on its way to the Omsk Government, but here we stepped in and prevented its delivery. This currency shortage has been one of the most serious handicaps of the Omsk Government and has contributed heavily to its present plight.

The feeling against America among the Siberians runs very high. They say that our promises are but empty words. They regard us as the friends of the Bolsheviks and know that several times we were very near to recognizing the Soviet Government. They feel this the more keenly because for a year the raw levies of Kolchak and the volunteers of Denikin, lacking all the necessities of warfare, have borne the brunt of a terribly unequal struggle in our behalf.

The Bolsheviks have an army of at least 300,000 under strict discipline, splendidly equipped and munitioned from the reserves of the great war or purchased from the Germans. These troops were trained by German officers and frequently led by them. In Eastern Europe there have been set up a multitude of little republics, shaky and insecure. The Allies hoped that these would be able to stand alone, and withdrew military assistance. What will happen when the militaristic autocracy of Moscow shall be free to turn its forces upon them? It will do so the moment its armies are not fully occupied by Kolchak and Denikin. The fact is that Soviet Russia, aggressive and imperialistic, is building up the one remaining great military machine in Europe, at a time when the Allies are disbanding their armies and reacting against the spirit that could call them back into being. Bear in mind the close relations between Bolsheviks and Germans. Note that the theoretical programme of the Bolsheviks has gone by the board, and that their leaders are now ready to adapt themselves to any system that gives promise of permitting them to retain their loot. Picture the next few years in Europe if Germany, recovering economically by exploiting Russia's natural riches, has in addition ready to hand a trained army capable of being expanded to any size. Then ask if the struggle of Kolchak and Denikin is any of our affair! Then insist that the Russians "be allowed to settle it themselves"!

The Omsk Government is undoubtedly in a desperate situation. For that we must bear our full share of the disgraceful responsibility. But it may not be as bad as pictured in the gloomy reports. Our Government has evidently seen the light, if tardily, and is now sending large quantities of arms and munitions to Siberia. The Bolshevik forces are probably over-extended in their Ural advance and are having difficulty with their communications. Word comes that Kolchak's tired forces are making a successful stand not far from Ekaterinburg. If they can hold out until supplies arrive, all may yet be well, and we may have the opportunity to atone for our grievous errors of the past. In the south, Denikin is driving the Reds before him and is reclaiming the whole Black Sea coast. The Bolsheviks themselves are by no means happy. They have an army and an abundance of arms and munitions, but transportation has broken down, food is terribly scarce, and workmen and peasants are kept in subjection only by force and terror. Winter is coming on to increase their difficulties. Therefore let us not lose hope in the face of present adversity, but have faith that right will triumph. Rather let our efforts be redoubled in aid of our friends and allies to the end that the tortures of Russia may be the more speedily ended and the era of her resurrection begin.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Correspondence

Repentance First

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

There appeared in the press last week references to the unchanged German spirit, as expressed at the meeting held by Germans (it would be an insult to add Americans) at Liederkrantz Hall in New York on July 24. As such a state of mind as this meeting proclaimed still exists among Germans in America, it is surely desirable that vigorous steps should be taken through State or Federal power to investigate, and abolish if necessary, the Liederkrantz and other similar German societies.

Good can not come out of organizations which are unconsciously or of set purpose organs of propaganda; for this reason such societies of foreign origin are to-day a national danger in our large cities, or wherever they exist among us. As harmful as the German are the Sinn Fein and other Irish societies, all of which import into our conglomerate American life elements of divergent emotion and violence, which are easily played upon in political life and which in their various reactions are wholly anti-American.

The average American, owing to his or her almost complete ignorance of foreign affairs and European history, is very gullible; but let any one who is now inclined to sympathize with Germany's present pains, and to forget what German doctrine and lust of power brought of agony, sacrifice, and horror to the world read Brand Whitlock's "Belgium." There the intolerable days and hideous facts are recorded. In those two volumes the horror mounts and grows: Schrecklichkeit in all its savage fury is set down in German affiche and document—if more than Mr. Whitlock's own statements were needed—till one's soul sickens with the appalling story. The only ray of light through those volumes is the impression of the unconquerable Belgian spirit and the record of the humane, the wise, the great work of mercy, accomplished through unceasing difficulties—which often threatened to wreck the work—by Mr. Whitlock, Mr. Hoover, and every member of the C. R. B.

The world can never afford to palter with the truth. Those who still condone the deeds of Germany are not fit for citizenship in a land, where—and it is a proud boast—we can produce such men as Brand Whitlock, as Mr. Hoover, and his aides and helpers.

If through that "American good nature" which we sometimes so mistakenly praise we tolerate to-day the whitewashing of the crimes against the laws of nations committed by Germany, we should recognize that it is a lazy moral and intellectual sense which makes us do so, not a virtue.

It is not enough for a nation to have one Prince Lichnowski. Not until thousands of Germans at home and abroad say to the world, "forgive us our crimes," should German frightfulness be put out of men's minds. We know the verdict at the bar of history: Germany's cynical official documents have settled that; the witness is unneeded.

As one thinks of the women, the children, the old men done to death by Germany's ruthless, bloody hand, the same that did "the multitudinous seas incarnadine," the solemn and magnificent words of one who was appealing against savagery rise to one's lips: "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered"—"saints" we make no claim they all were.

That Germans should now make appeal for favors and sympathy—pity them we may—is revolting, and their frequent denial of crimes which their own documents are proof of brings inevitably to mind the line from Faust, strangely applicable to Germany herself: "Ich bin der Geist der stets verneint."

Let me end with a word which needs repeating, from the Times: "It is sharing of her guilt to declare her [Germany's] punishment undeserved and to denounce those who in absolute justice are inflicting it."

SARA NORTON

Ashfield, Mass., August 11

Cause and Effect?

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Taken in connection with the fact that revolution in Russia came not long after the suppression of strong drink there, the race riots now reported in this country may perhaps throw an unexpected light on one aspect of national prohibition. In this world there must always be suffering, and suffering must always lead to discontent. The sedative or anæsthetic most practicable throughout European history has been alcoholic stimulant. That evils have resulted from abuse of it everybody knows. That deprivation of it may result in maddeningly incessant consciousness of suffering and therefore in socially destructive discontent hardly anybody seems to have imagined. Prohibition undoubtedly decreases petty crime and individual violence; there is some reason to suspect, however, that it tends to increase insanity. Bolshevism and race riots, though evidently due in large measure to other causes, point that way.

B. W.

July 31

The Rôle of Joseph Caillaux

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

"J'ai écrasé l'impôt sur le revenu en ayant l'air de le défendre." These cynical words from a letter attributed to Joseph Caillaux were printed in heavy type in Le Figaro by Gaston Calmette, the editor, on March 14, 1914. On March 16 Mme. Caillaux went to the office of the Figaro and shot and killed Gaston Calmette. She was tried and acquitted. Then came the war and M. Caillaux was mobilized. In November he left France for South America. For years he had been suspected of strong German sympathies superinduced by certain financial interests. This suspicion was notable at the time of the Senate investigation of the Accord Franco-Allemand of November, 1911. The Senate committee paid much attention late in 1911 and early in 1912 to the embarrassing pourparlers officieux said to have been carried on by M. Caillaux, premier at that time. These pourparlers, it was alleged, were carried on without the knowledge of the President of the Republic, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, or the French Ambassador at Berlin. As a result of information in the possession of M. Clémenceau at that time a ministerial crisis was created and M. de Selves, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, handed his resignation to the President of the Republic, and M. Caillaux was a few days later obliged to retire from office. M. Caillaux at that time was considered as one of those great financiers whose interest in public affairs is based almost exclusively on their financial affiliations; whose political attitude is conditioned by their business relations, and whose position on questions of national or international policy is largely determined by their own personal financial connections rather than on their country's welfare, security, and honor. In short, he was considered as favoring a close political and financial understanding with Germany. He was Germany's friend.

The war had not been going three months when there appeared in the German press an indication of what hope the Imperial Government placed in Joseph Caillaux and his power to dominate French policy eventually. The Journal des Débats on November 11, 1914, under the caption L'Allemagne Déconcertée, printed the following extract from the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna. (It is to be observed that the correspondent wrote ostensibly from Bordeaux.) "M. Caillaux has many partisans among the republicans," the extract read. "He is one of the few men in politics in France who are not worn out. The others for the most part are impossible because of their past, which loads them down with a share of responsibility for the war—a responsibility with which M. Caillaux could not be reproached, for he has always spoken in favor of good relations with Germany. . . . When the French begin to sober up, M. Caillaux will play in his own country an important rôle and, it is to be hoped, a happy one."

According to Charles Maurras, this same passage was to have appeared in his paper, the royalist organ, L'Action Française, on October 26, 1914. "Before appearing in this Austrian paper," he says, "it was published in the Frankfurter Zeitung, October 17. This paper having fortunately come into our hands, we gave the passage relating to M. Caillaux. The censor requested us to put instead a blank space" (Maurras, La France se sauve elle-même, p. 421). It was not until November 17 that Le Temps published the same note, which was accompanied by the following comment: "Is there in these invitations from the Neue Freie Presse and also, we are told, from the Frankfurter Zeitung, a still more absurd hope, if possible, namely, to divide French public opinion, to arouse partisan spirit, to indicate more or less vaguely a pact for the future between certain republicans and the two German empires assuring 'reasonable politicians' a long lease of power in return for a reconciliation and an entente with Germany?"

Who can these "certain republicans" be? Why have certain Socialists in France supported Caillaux and consistently opposed Clémenceau? Why the courtesy and attention showed to Caillaux by German officials in South America during his stay there? Why especially did the German censorship give the following instructions to the German press on June 16, 1917: "For political reasons it is urgently requested that nothing be written about the former French Prime Minister Caillaux and that his name be not mentioned under any circumstances." To be sure, the former Premier warned the German authorities against the excessive praise bestowed upon him by their papers, especially the Neue Freie Presse, and desired that the Mediterranean and Morocco agreements should be adversely criticized. His position in France was much injured by German praise.

Caillaux is to go before the High Court for trial. Will the République des Camarades reassert itself and rescue the quondam premier? Is Joseph Caillaux destined to play in his own country an important rôle and, it is to be hoped, a happy one? It is for the French Senate to decide.

W. A. McLAUGHLIN
Ann Arbor, Mich., August 9

The Victorian Centenary

PERSONS

Queen Victoria, b. May 24, 1819
Arthur Hugh Clough, b. Jan. 1, 1819
John Ruskin, b. Feb. 8, 1819
James Russell Lowell, b. Feb. 22, 1819
Walt Whitman, b. May 31, 1819
Charles Kingsley, b. June 12, 1819
George Eliot, b. Nov. 22, 1819

Time—Their Centenary Year, 1919
Place—The shelter of Igrasil, the Ash-tree of Existence, whose roots reach down into The Kingdom of Death, whose trunk reaches up Heaven high, and whose boughs spread over the Universe

RUSKIN (with sublime assurance). Your late Majesty, aspect and shadow of bygone royalties, which only the spectral "likeness of a kingly crown" have on, now sees around you worthy head-workers, still well remembered on the "bank and shoal of time" (or shall we say, "bench and school of time"?): —immeasurably the truest claimants these to the Victorian name, since all of them were born just one hundred years ago in your Majesty's own birth year, and since all of them, unlike rust-kings and moth-kings and robber-kings, gathered treasures of wisdom for the English-speaking folk during the long lustres of your reign. Though I, John Ruskin, who outlived all save your Majesty, was born in London, ghastly heap of fermenting brick-work, my art-gift belongs to me by birthright, and came, by Athena's will, from the air of English country villages and Scottish hills; Charles Kingsley here, like me a strong and deep disciple of Carlyle and his gospel, and inferior only to Turner and myself in his loving thought of things and people and in his sense of form and color, sniffed in his cradle the western breezes of Dartmoor and the Devon coast; George Eliot, born Mary Ann Evans, was reared to womanhood in as sweet a Warwickshire home of ivy-covered red brick as ever hallowed the hearts of my readers (such word-pictures of mine bettering even the reality); and here is Arthur Hugh Clough, whose young eyes were first blurred by the smoke and soot and cinders of Liverpool, a city smeared by civilization's dirty finger. But these two Americans, —one of whom, James Russell Lowell, your Majesty will graciously remember at St. James's in the eighties of our century, and whom I knew through my friend Norton,—dwelt happily (so could not I) in a country that boasted neither castles nor cathedrals.

Lowell (incisively). The only "Cathedral" that this American ever reared (my poem of Chartres) was straightway brought by you, Mr. Ruskin, within the range of your critical canon. I have often felt the working of the old-world spell in the gray seclusions of the college quadrangles and cloisters at your Oxford and Cambridge; and yet I have returned to the unvenerable buildings of my own Cambridge with a deeper and fonder emotion than any antiquity could stir. And do not forget that we of the older Yankee stock spring from Shakespeare's and Milton's England, and hence have drunk more deeply of wells of English undefiled than—

Whitman (interrupting aggressively). I am Walt Whitman, a growth and idiom of America, my tongue, every atom of my blood, formed from this soil, this air, born here, of parents born here, from parents the same, and their parents the same. I did loaf and invite my soul far from decrepit old Europe, its ennui, its feudal shapes, its centuries, caste, heroisms and fables, cults and traditions, arts and languages.

Queen Victoria (loftily). We are not entertained.

George Eliot (solemnly). A new generation has arisen that denies and blasphemes our gods. The fortunes of our house have tottered, our characters have bled on every side, our faith has been questioned, our works belied, our wit forgotten, our learning trampled on, our very name, Victorian, derided—and, worst of all, our furniture and carpets banished! This perverse generation needs, as Mrs. Poyser says, "to be hatched again and hatched different."

Kingsley (with vehemence). What can be hoped, your Majesty, from an age which omits from the Coronation Oath the requisite declaration against Romanism? (Queen Victoria starts ever so slightly.) Can such an age breed English gentlemen and yeomen?

Clough (sadly). What hope is there of a time which prefers to the mettlesome prancing of hexameters the club-footed pedestrianism of free verse—beg pardon, Mr. Whitman, I quite forgot you—and turns from the mountain air and water of my Highland "Bothie" to the dust and ashes of the Spoon River graveyard?

Lowell (benignly). In truth, we types of the true elder race need no longer shake a rattle and talk baby to this bumptious century, for it has lately been matured out of much of its juvenile self-conceit. Though pert, the youngster has never been prudish. It may have yawned over your "Hypatia," Mr. Kingsley, but it has never, like your first public, denounced the book as immoral, and it seems as little inclined to bowdlerize you, Walt, as to expurgate Mrs. Hemans and Mrs. Howe. Moreover, the authoress of "Daniel Deronda" must remember that this generation, which she deems perverse, has converted her Mordecai's prophecy of a Jewish political nationality into the popular programme of Zionism through the power of a righteous war.

George Eliot (severely). Righteous war! Can the bloody sword of battling rage do right?

Ruskin (magisterially). You forget, Madam, that, fifty years ago, I reminded the women of England that war was sometimes willed by Him of whom, though Prince of Peace, it is also written, "In righteousness He doth judge and make war." Every soldier vows to his country that he will die for the guardianship of her domestic virtue, of her righteous laws, and of her any way challenged or endangered honor. Indeed, I told every young soldier of England then that I had much rather that he should ride war horses than back race horses—much rather would I have him slay his neighbor than cheat him. War causes an incalculable amount of human suffering, but it breeds beautiful characters and great nations.

Whitman (head high in air). I hear, in the hurrying, crashing, distracted war-year, the song of the banner, a new song, a free song, drums beating, trumpets blowing, millions jubilantly shouting, armies tramping, sentries challenging, guns roaring. I hear Liberty.

Kingsley (with enthusiasm). The same song filled the misty air of our fenlands when the last heroes of the old English race flocked from every hamlet to back Hereward the outlaw in his guerilla struggle for freedom against the Norman William, and when the chivalry of Elizabeth's England poured forth from every haven in tiny pinnacles to measure its strength against the Spanish Armada, and to determine the law which God had appointed for the half of Europe and the whole of future America. For the self-same stakes men have just been playing the war-game.

Clough (dreamily). In the mid-century I knew wars of the spirit, fervent soul-struggles, that wrought far more for liberty than the wretched clash in the Crimea. As Matt. Arnold said in his "Thyrsis," my piping took a troubled sound. I died before the raging storms had passed.

Queen Victoria. Against all the wars of our reign—wars with Chinamen, Russians, Boers—thoughtful subjects of ours lifted grave voices of warning, as they lifted them against the American War in our royal grandfather's time. But against the World War of to-day our spirit's ear hears no Anglo-Saxon cry of protest.

Lowell. Your Majesty, "civilization doos git forrid sometimes upon a powder cart." Hosea Biglow was long dead in 1914 or men would then have heard one nasal Yankee war-note blending with the British. Thank God, John and Jonathan, who in my prime often shook fists at each other, have at last joined hands against what Hosea would call "a pesky varmint."

Queen Victoria (with grandmotherly sternness). Mr. Ruskin, you know the Bible and many other books. Was it Solomon or Shakespeare who said "Sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child"? Had there been more laying of hands by his Father and Mamma on that imperial imp, William, in his "tetchy and wayward infancy" (that's surely Shakespeare), there would have been less laying of hands upon the world in his subtle and bloody age. We ought never to have let Victoria marry a Prussian; but in those days of my beautiful Prince Consort my people rather liked the Germans. (The Victorians glance somewhat shamefacedly at one another.)

George Eliot (bravely). Yes, your Majesty; we even admired them—with reservations. Much of my younger time was given to German religion and philosophy—Strauss, Feuerbach and Spinoza—and three months in Weimar with my dear husband, George Lewes, himself steeped to the heart's core in Goethe and Schiller, are a cheerful recollection. But I was never blind to the heaviness of Germanity, never unaware that all a German's subtlety is reserved for the region of metaphysics, and that his perception is seldom delicate. Indeed, I have said in my comment upon the one famous exception, Heinrich Heine, that German humor generally shows no sense of measure, no instinctive tact; that it is either floundering and clumsy as the antics of a leviathan, or laborious and interminable as a Lapland day, in which one loses all hope that the stars and quiet will ever come. A German comedy is like a German sentence: you see no reason in its structure why it should ever come to an end, and you accept the conclusion as an arrangement of Providence rather than of the author.

Lowell (smiling). What a language it is to be sure! with nominatives sending out as many roots as that witch-grass which is the pest of all child-gardens, and sentences in which one sets sail like an admiral with sealed orders, not knowing where the devil he is going to till he is in mid-ocean. Like the criminal classes, I object to long sentences!

George Eliot. I perceived in Germany—who would not?—the gross unwisdom of a bureaucratic plan of government, and the evils of a system which disregards traditions and attachments, and combats the healthy communistic life of the peasant. The German mind and the German method made a long and noisy day. But now the stars and quiet may come at last.

Ruskin. Men have often charged me with inconsistency; and I admit with my wonted frankness that in one instance they amply sustain their charge: for the waves of my opinion in respect to Germany's wars knew many an ebb and flow. It is true that finding, with Carlyle's good help, many merits in the political economy of Prussia, I applauded the fitness of the hereditary name of its princes, "Friedrich" or "Rich in Peace," and crowned them with wild olive; yet I was hospitable to the view that Frederick's history was sad stuff for anyone to read, unless he believed man was made to be a butcher of his fellow-man. It is true that I proclaimed Germany's success in 1870, "the victory of one of the truest monarchies and schools of honor and obedience ever organized under heaven," yet elsewhere I emphasized with equal force the dangers of a military organization into which the Devil put pride of caste. It is true that, at first, I refused to raise my voice against the ravage of France, deeming this inevitable; yet when I apprehended the imminent danger to Strassburg Cathedral and Sainte-Chapelle, and sensed the horrors of human suffering at Paris, frantic head and heart cried out together against these wrongs. While in the body, my spirit bewailed the harm wrought to Tintoretto's great canvas at Venice by Austrian shells; now it hovers over the shattered columns of Rheims and the fallen Cloth Hall of Ypres.

Kingsley (penitently). Mca culpa! Mea maxima culpa! I loved these Germans once, and tried to read them aright, but my interpretation seems now all awry. The idealism of their older and better days—all their talk about genius and high art and the rest of it—I rejected. Goethe seemed to me the ruin of Germany—a great fog coming down on the German people and wrapping them up. I blamed them in the mid-century, because they had been for fifty years finding out and showing people how to do everything on earth, and yet doing nothing themselves. And so when Germany's great day of action came in 1870, I rejoiced that her people were at last ready, and I was full of hope for them, believing that the war would work good for generations to come. I was as blind as my own Amyas Leigh, and with far less warrant.

Lowell. Say rather that our tiny tapers gave too little light. And yet often men of to-day foolishly extinguish their own flashing arc-lamps and turn for illumination to the dim little candles of precedent. They must upward still and onward, who would keep abreast of truth. You and Mr. Ruskin were led astray by Carlyle, who, in his later time, took as his type of what is highest in human nature, not the sagacious and moderate Goethe, but some Götz of the Iron Hand, some assertor of the divine legitimacy of Faustrecht. Like the latter-day German, Carlyle mistook downright violence for strength, and seeking sheer inhumanity, he got at last to kings, types of remorseless force. As I once phrased it, this is his conclusion so congenial to Teutons: constitutional monarchy is a failure; representative government is a gabble; democracy a birth of the bottomless pit; there is no hope for mankind except in getting themselves under a good driver who shall not spare the lash. As an American I have a deep-rooted dislike for the flick of the royal whip.

Clough. In 1870 the broad-bosomed earth had received me. Twenty years before, "Hermann and Dorothea," my only German inspiration, did not greatly endanger my freedom of soul. Such an idyll is a peaceful path, you know.

Whitman. Give me, instead, the noisy open road with jostling journeyers as companions. In 1870 all my hopes were with the star of France, dim smitten star, panting o'er a land of death, heroic land, the struggle and the daring, rage divine for liberty, star crucified. Then I, the only seer among you all, foresaw (do I speak verse or prose?) the clouds dispelled, the travail o'er; and reborn high o'er the European world (in gladness answering thence as face afar to face reflecting ours, Columbia) thy star, O France, fair lustrous star, in heavenly peace, clearer, more bright than ever, beaming immortal. I saw truly, because I did not build my faith on old conquerors, old campaigns, old reigns of kings across the sea—all phantoms—but on such realities as the democratic average and basic equality, the pride of man in himself, and from first to last the soul of the working man, the working woman.

Kingsley (with dignity). Others of us may have lacked, Mr. Whitman, your gift of prophecy, but one thing assuredly we did not lack, a very practical sympathy with our brothers, the workmen. I was a Church of England parson—Parson Lot, because I looked not backward—but a fighting man as well, and throughout the Chartist movement, Labor's struggle for the suffrage, I was in the forefront of the battle. Carlyle's teachings inspired in me the fiercest hatred of society's great king, Laissez faire ("Devil take the hindmost!"), who slips with smug complacency along the ruts of easy-going routine and do-nothingism, and takes no thought of tinker and tailor. Christian Socialist to the core, I taught that Jesus Christ, the poor man who died for poor men, would bring about freedom for them, though all the Mammonites of the earth were against them. In my novels I entered the Cockney home and the Cockney sweat-shop, and read amid the dirt and darkness the ignorant hearts that I found there—what a contrast to the country, the yard in which the gentlemen live! Through all this war for the rights of man, I sought to keep my loyalty, my love, my zeal,—my faith that a nobler day was dawning for England, a day of freedom, science, industry. With a like hope, my eyes are fixed on Weimar now.

Queen Victoria. We always loved our subjects. Mr. Tennyson, shortly after we made him Poet-Laureate, told the Americans that they must not mix the English queen with those that wish to keep their people fools, that she comprehends the race she rules, and that the foes of its freedom are her foes. I read your books, Canon Kingsley, about the fight between the rich and the poor, and those of Mr. Disraeli and of Mrs. Gaskell, who seemed to see both sides very much better than you men. But you must admit, Mr. Kingsley, that your Chartists behaved very badly indeed with all their rows and rioting. Why, the Duke and seventeen thousand special constables had to go out to stop them. Still, in the end, after many years, they got what they wanted; and on the whole they caused much less trouble than the masses seem to be giving to-day.

Clough. I, too, sat at the feet of Carlyle. And I can show what I felt about landlordism's comfortable doctrine of Laissez faire, if you will let me transpose some of my "Bothie" hexameters. Laissez faire says to the rich:—"O ye rich! be sublime in great houses, purple and delicate linen endure, cast not to swine of the sty the pearls that should gleam in your foreheads. Live, be lovely, forget them, be beautiful even to proudness, not for enjoyment truly; for Beauty and God's great glory."

George Eliot. I remember that my Felix Holt told the working men after they had got the suffrage, that the value of their political power depended entirely on the means and materials—the knowledge, ability, and honesty—they had at command; that a society, a nation, is held together by the dependence of men on each other and the sense they have of a common interest in preventing injury; that society can not be steadily improved by the attempt to do away directly with the actually existing class distinctions, but by the turning of class interests into class functions or duties; that the danger hanging over change is great just in proportion as it tends to produce disorder by giving any large number of ignorant men, whose notions of what is good are of a low and brutal sort, the belief that they have got power into their hands, and may do pretty much as they like; that each class should be urged by the surrounding conditions to perform its particular work under the strong pressure of responsibility to the nation at large—such counsels seem more timely than ever!

Walt Whitman. I follow you, lady, for I am of every hue and caste, of every rank and religion, a farmer, mechanic, artist, gentleman, sailor, quaker, prisoner, fancy-man, rowdy, lawyer, physician, priest. What is commonest, cheapest, nearest, easiest is Me, not asking the sky to come down to my good will. I breathe the air, but leave plenty after me, and am not stuck up, and am in my place.

Ruskin. In my early life, I sought to raise men's sense of the beautiful in art; in my later, to raise men's moral standard in life, to transfuse into the younger generation a social sympathy. I lectured, preached, instructed, counseled the poorest and most ignorant, caring for their bodies, their minds, their souls. I warred against Laissez faire, not in the terms of a soulless political economy, but by taking my Bible and acting on it. I grew also daily more sure that the peace of God rested on all the dutiful and kindly hearts of the laborious poor; and that the only constant form of pure religion was in useful work, faithful love, and stintless charity. Is not that the essence of the religion of Humanity?

Lowell. You are right, Mr. Ruskin, in insisting that humanity makes a part, by far the most important part, of political economy. But our republican ears fail to catch, in the teachings of your master, Carlyle, the accent of democracy. The Carlyle gospel is the feudal one of master and man—let mankind find the bravest and best, and obey him! Democracy means to Carlyle despair of finding any heroes to govern you, and contented putting up with the want of them. It is to him a ship trying to round Cape Horn in bad weather by vote of the sailors instead of by will of the captain. And you, Mr. Ruskin, say that all freedom is error, that liberty is on the whole and in the broadest sense dishonorable and an attribute of the lower creatures. Not so, Mr. Clough, spoke Philip Hewson, the hot radical hero of your Bothie, which, you will remember, I admired when you visited us at Cambridge. Not so your dearest friend and elegist, Matthew Arnold, when he tells us that "culture seeks to do away with classes, that to live in a society of equals tends in general to make a man's spirits expand, and his faculties work easily and actively, and that our inequality materializes our upper class, vulgarizes our middle class, brutalizes our lower class." Not so speaks the British Constitution, which, under whatever disguises, is essentially democratic. But even Carlyle admits that universal democracy, whatever we may think of it, has declared itself as an inevitable fact of the days in which we live. Not only is universal democracy with us, but, as I said to an English audience at Birmingham thirty-five years ago, America is in the air that all men breathe.

Queen Victoria (sympathetically). We like to hear you talk, Mr. Lowell.

Whitman (rapt in vision). The time has come to enfold the world. One thought is ever at the fore—that in the Divine Ship, the World, breasting Time and Space, all peoples of the globe together sail, sail the same voyage, are bound to the same destination. I see not America only, not only Liberty's nation, but other nations preparing; Freedom completely armed and victorious and very haughty, with Law on one side, Peace on the other, issuing forth against the idea of caste; men marching and counter-marching by swift millions; the frontiers and boundaries of the old autocracies broken; the landmarks of European kings removed; and this day the people beginning their landmarks.

FREDERICK TUPPER

Book Reviews

Spiritualism and Science

EXPERIMENTS IN PSYCHICAL SCIENCE: Levitation, "Contact," and the "Direct Voice." By W. J. Crawford. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

CONTACT WITH THE OTHER WORLD: the Latest Evidence as to Communication with the Dead. By James H. Hyslop. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

BOTH Dr. Crawford and Dr. Hyslop are convinced spiritists, but there after they have nothing in common. Dr. Crawford is a lecturer in mechanical engineering and has had much experience in graphic statics and temperature charting; Dr. Hyslop was a professor of logic and ethics, a psychologist through and through. Naturally, then, in the great division which splits the spiritist body, they came out on opposite sides. Dr. Hyslop gives sixteen pages to the physical phenomena; Dr. Crawford deals with practically nothing else, and while he "admits the genuine nature of mental phenomena," he is "appalled at the difficulties of sifting them; the mind of the medium has far too much to do with the results." Even for specific communication from the departed he prefers "the direct voice" and "psychic photography." It is a clean-cut antithesis of physicist and psychologist.

And naturally the physicist gets the most definite and assured results—assured, that is, apart from easy "they are all lying" criticism. The book is a continuation of his previous "Reality of Psychic Phenomena" and the greater part is occupied with experiments with Miss Goligher, the Belfast medium. About thirty-eight pages are given to "direct contact" phenomena with other mediums, that is, phenomena in which the hands of the sitters are in contact with the table, and to "direct voice" phenomena through so-called "trumpets." In both cases his mechanical experience has enabled him to make distinct advances in criticism and verifications. The real possibilities in contact were marked out through ingenious electrical apparatus, and even the direct voice, otherwise under the darkest suspicion, was made to register into a phonograph under excellent test conditions; excellent, that is, apart from the darkness which is asserted to be necessary. From the "blasting" effect on the record—so called by phonograph manufacturers—the voice would seem to have been very close to the horn of the phonograph, and if that was the case, the mouth-end of the "trumpet" must have been at least four feet from the medium. Yet, because of the darkness, Dr. Crawford keeps these experiments by themselves and publishes them only to put them on record for what they may be worth.

The others are in quite different case. They are further elaborate verifications and examinations of his hypothesis that table-levitations, raps, and the like are produced by cantilever rods projected from the body of the medium. These rods, which are sometimes, when great force is required, struts with a basis on the floor, consist of matter in a so far unknown form, apparently possessing weight but not palpability, and invisible under ordinary conditions. Yet if the hand is put through one of them a "disagreeable, cold, spore-like sensation" is felt. Their presence, nature, and working can be precisely demonstrated by mechanical tests; they are disintegrated by all light, except red light; they do not change the temperature of the table; their free ends are not conductors of low tensive electricity; they can not pass through open mesh cloth screens unless these are closely wrapped round the medium. If the medium touches the table with her bare hand, some kind of psychic circuit is made, the force is discharged and the table at once drops. If the hand is gloved the table drops more slowly; similarly, if the contact is through iron or copper. But a piece of twisted paper or of wood in the medium's hand did not seem to make the circuit. This evidently connects with the use of a wooden table as a concentrator of the force; it is a kind of Leyden jar. All manner of raps are produced also by these rods acting apparently as hammers on the floor. The mechanical reactions upon the medium as to weight, push and pull, and tipping strains were elaborately tested and recorded. It is also demonstrated, to all appearance, by exact weighings, that while the matter of these rods is taken from the medium and is returned to her without diminution, the force used is mostly taken from the sitters in the circle and involves a permanent loss of weight of half a pound each, more or less. All these experiments were carried out with the hearty coöperation of the so-called "controls," communication with whom was maintained by raps.

Dr. Crawford admits his indifference, for the purposes of these experiments, as to whether these "controls" are "discarnate human beings" or "masquerading sub-conscious elements of the medium's brain." But he is himself quite convinced that they are the first, and we now look to him for his reasons for this conviction. He knows certainly how much more difficult this step in his demonstration will be. He has put dynamite under our ordinary conceptions of matter and shown it mobile and plastic under the direct action of mind and will. Can he demonstrate that the mind and will in the case are discarnate?

Almost all spiritists have either been ignorant of this difficulty or ignored it.

Again, Dr. Crawford does not make plain whether he regards the projected material-rod method as that by which all telekinetic phenomena are always produced. He seems even to explain personal levitation by it, but would it meet the cases of levitation recorded of D. D. Home, for example? Also, would his hammer-like rods explain all rappings? Other physicists have been driven to the hypothesis of little explosions in the molecular structure of the material from which the raps seemed to come. Further, the material of his psychic structures, in its invisibility, seems essentially different from that which is used in materializations—as those of Schrenk-Notzing—although the two are alike in mobility and plasticity under the direct influence of mind and will. It is true that Dr. Crawford is evidently working towards a hypothesis that there are two different unknown forms of matter in his psychical structures. He is driven to that by the problem of how, at the one end, these rods can make connection with the body of the medium without injuring it, and, at the other, with the objects moved so as to affect them in these different ways. Finally, there can be no question that these two sets of experiments mark the greatest advance that has been made as to the physical phenomena since their reality was established to the satisfaction of Sir William Crookes. It may even be that they mark an epoch in our knowledge of the ultimate structure of matter as definite as the discovery of radio-activity.

No one could leave Dr. Hyslop's book with a similar feeling of certainty and possibility. His methods are almost entirely mental and his recorded results have evidently an utterly different effect in print from that which they had on the first-hand recipients. Neither William James nor Mark Twain nor Isaac K. Funk nor Carroll D. Wright is in the least convincing. After working through their communications the feeling remains that we have seen a great deal too many ghosts to believe in them. There is some music which is very interesting to the player but bores the audience, and the "cross-correspondence" engineered by certain members of the English Society for Psychical Research, and intended to be absolute logical demonstrations, have had little weight outside their circle of origin.

On another side Dr. Hyslop is so convinced a spiritist that the disinclination which most of us feel to the admission of an entirely different class of moments in the balance of forces, or kind of personalities in the drama—as you please to put it—does not exist for him. Discarnate spirits acting through mediums still in the body are part of his accepted scheme of things. Thus, when telepathy is urged as a counter-explanation to "spirits," he asks why telepathy may not be worked by "spirits" and points out, rightly enough, that telepathy is scientifically as unexplained as "spirits." He has passed entirely beyond our ordinary position that it is "easier" to posit that A's mind directly affects B's than to posit that A's mind by means of discarnate spirits affects B's. That is, he has passed beyond Occam's law of the limitation of agencies to the strictly necessary. Of course he can answer that we do not know what is "strictly necessary." Similarly, he has a chapter on "obsession," and accepts it. And it is true that much of the popular spiritualist literature of the present day shows a distinct drift in that direction. Whether that will tend to sanity in the popular mind is another matter; it is hopeless now to attempt to keep the most hazardous guesses of the laboratory out of the talk of the market-place. The popular mind must go through with everything until it becomes immune again. We can only hope that the "obsession" will not reach the peak of witch-burnings.

Dr. Hyslop's best chapter is undoubtedly that on "the process of communicating." This is very clearly and fully worked out—fully, that is, within the limits of our present psychological knowledge and the spiritist hypothesis—and many investigators of experience might well take it to heart. It shows that, at the best, the process is a deal more complicated than such new Pilgrim's Progresses as "The Seven Purposes" would suggest. Even so sane a student as Dr. L. P. Jacks might find light there on "Old Scott," "Young Scott" and "Sir Walter Scott," in his "Adventures in Psychical Research." Whether it would lead him to "spirits" or to still more pronounced agnostic despair is another matter. For the picture of that process which Dr. Hyslop puts before us is not an attractive one and raises wonder how under these conditions anything evidential can ever come through. The "spirits" seem like a cloud of moths fluttering round a candle or like the shades which swarmed round the trench of Odysseus, all trying to communicate at once. And even the one which, for the moment, has caught the medium's eye may send over all kinds of penumbral, fleeting thoughts besides that which he really means to communicate. And then the medium's "sub-conscious" comes into play with possibilities of Sally's and obsessions. That hoary old reprobate, Dr. Phinuit, a creation as human as Falstaff, seems solid beside all this.

But while Dr. Hyslop's book suggests all these limits and cautions, it can be read by any one to good purpose. And it is urged throughout by a passionate belief that only in acceptance of the spiritist position is there any hope of stemming the ever-rising tide of crude materialism. On that key the book begins and ends.

British Labor

MANAGEMENT AND MEN. A Record of New Steps in Industrial Relations. By Meyer Bloomfield. New York: The Century Company.

ONE of the most extraordinary features of our modern life is the rapidity with which books are made. In the good old days most writers were slow in formulating their thoughts—Adam Smith spent ten years on his "Wealth of Nations"—but now it is possible for one skilled in gathering material to compile in a few months a volume of 600 pages and to write several readable magazine articles as well. This journalistic tour de force is what Mr. Bloomfield has achieved since he visited the industrial centres of Great Britain in the fall of 1918, and while such a work may be quite ephemeral, it must be admitted that it has considerable value at the present time when those who are interested in industrial movements are eager to keep in touch with what is going on abroad.

Like several other recent writers, Mr. Bloomfield has included in his book an enormous appendix of illustrative material, such as the Whitley Reports in full, the Constitution of the British Labor Party, and various pronouncements as to the shortages of houses, the international distribution of raw materials, the employment of women during and after the war, the restoration of trade-union restrictions, and other problems of industrial reconstruction. This penchant for documents must surely have originated with the red, white, blue, and otherwise colored books of the early war period; and to those who like to drink from original sources the appendix will be quite welcome, although those who prefer their information boiled down may be somewhat disappointed in the scant 200 pages of "main text." It should also be said, in passing, that men will look in vain in this book for any light on questions of time and motion study, bonus systems, shop discipline, overhead, turnover, or other phases of management so dear to the heart of efficiency experts—for it is a book on British plans for promoting good feeling between management and men, which, perhaps, may be prerequisite to the success of those other devices.

There was much ill-feeling between labor and capital before the war, and although they made a truce by which organized labor for the time of national peril gave up the right to strike and its cherished trade restrictions, as soon as victory seemed assured the truce was declared off and the forces of labor began to be mobilized for a determined effort to obtain better living conditions and a larger part in the control of industry, if not for a revolutionary attack on the strongholds of capitalism. Labor was well aware of its services at home and abroad, without which the war could not have been won, and, when peace and security were restored, demanded as much consideration as when life, liberty, and property were threatened by a ruthless enemy. The employers as a class have been very free to recognize these services, and have gone far in concession to the demands of labor, but their advances have been received in a spirit of suspicion and hostility that augurs ill for the success of the schemes for industrial coöperation that have been launched with so much éclat. Perhaps, as Mr. Bloomfield suggests, this distrust and irritation may be due to the nervous strain under which the British people have labored and fought during four long and weary years; but, whatever the cause, the trouble is there and threatens to break out into a civil war in which Great Britain may bring upon herself the disaster which all the armies and navies of the Central Powers were unable to inflict.

Certainly British labor is none too modest in its demands, as the following list of items in its programme clearly shows:

The throwing open of land for use and development by the people; a public health act to prevent illness; a million new houses built at public expense and let at fair rents; nationalization of the public services, mines, railways, shipping, armaments, and electric power; extension of trade unionism; a national minimum wage for each industry based on determinations by industrial boards; abolition of the menace of unemployment; limitation of the hours of labor; drastic overhauling of the various laws dealing with factory conditions, safety and workmen's compensation; enlargement of the coöperative movement; international labor legislation to deal with the competition of sweated goods; revision of taxation upward; and equal treatment of men and women in government and industry.

Comprehensive as this list is, it does not include the most important point of all—the demand for a greater share in the control of industry. The unions, of course, exercised a certain negative—and very injurious—control through their trade customs or restrictions, which tended to reduce the output of industry; but, as these may never be fully restored, they demand, as an equivalent, a large measure of positive control, promising to coöperate with the employers for the increase of output and the general prosperity of the country. Some such control as this many unions exercised during the war, through the shop steward and works committees; but now they want these powers continued and extended and will be satisfied with nothing-less.

The appointment of the Whitley Committee by the Asquith Government in the year 1916 was designed to anticipate trouble by providing a workable plan for the coöperation of capital and labor in the rehabilitation of industry after the war. The first report of the committee was made in March, 1917, the second in October; and these, together with the supplementary reports, contain many valuable suggestions as to methods of coöperation between employers and employed, even though the general plan may be still highly experimental and probably not applicable to conditions in other countries. The committee devised an elaborate, though elastic, scheme for industrial councils which it was thought might be adopted with modifications by practically all the well-organized industries of the country. Three sets of councils were recommended: First, National Joint Standing Industrial Councils to consist of representatives of employers and employed in equal numbers elected by their recognized national associations; second, District Joint Industrial Councils similarly constituted but of limited jurisdiction and subordinate to the National Councils; third, Works Committees composed of representatives of employers and employed in particular works or establishments. All this points towards the creation of a National Industrial Council, and this, in fact, was unanimously recommended by the National Industrial Conference at its adjourned meeting on April 4, 1919. The setting up of an Industrial Parliament beside the ancient Parliament at Westminster would be a startling innovation in British life and would have most interesting and far-reaching results.

Already the Whitley scheme has been adopted by a considerable number of industries, so that the experiment is receiving a fair trial under the most varied conditions. The inauguration of the first Whitley Council—The National Council of the Pottery Industry—took place at Stoke-on-Trent on January 11, 1918. Major F. H. Wedgwood, of Wedgwood and Sons, was elected chairman; Mr. S. Clowes, of the Potters' Union, vice-chairman; Mr. A. P. Llewellyn, secretary to the Manufacturers; and Mr. A. Hollins, secretary to the Operatives. The National Council of sixty members—thirty on each side—was elected, representing such manufacturers as Doulton and Company, Furnivals, Ltd., the Wedgwoods, Cartwright and Edwards, and many other well-known firms. A constitution was adopted stating the chief object of the Association to be the advancement of the pottery industry and of all connected with it. The work of the Council was specified under the following heads: To induce all manufacturers and operatives to join their respective associations; regular consideration of wages, piece-work prices, and conditions of industry; maintenance of such prices as will afford reasonable remuneration to both employers and employed; consideration and settlement of disputes; regularization of production and employment; removing of danger to health in industry; encouragement of research and invention, and publication of results, where desirable; collection of statistics of wages, prices, profits, costs, and the like; representation of the needs of the industry to the Government and to the community generally.

As Mr. Bloomfield frequently points out, the Whitley scheme is still in the experimental stage. All that has been done is to provide machinery for joint consideration of certain phases of industry, and its successful operation will depend on the spirit of tolerance and coöperation animating the heretofore opposing interests. The employers will be slow to turn over to the workers any important share in the management of their properties, and the workers, who are aggressively pushing for all they can get, will not be satisfied to receive the shadow of power without the substance. Then, too, as Dr. Addison, formerly Minister of Reconstruction, has pointed out, the Councils might be used to form trusts or price rings inimical to the interests of the public. Again, there is some danger of political interference, although the committee has sought to guard against that. Like any other human invention, the plan has its strong and weak points, some of which will not appear until it is put in operation, and the progress of the experiment will be watched with intense interest on both sides of the Atlantic.

More or Less Truth

THE TAKER. By Daniel Carson Goodman. New York: Boni and Liveright.
THE GROPER. By Henry C. Aikman. New York: Boni and Liveright.
THE CHOICE. By Maurice Weyl. New York: Mitchell Kennerley.

HERE are three new stories, two of them "first" novels, which express anew the marked impulse in our recent fiction towards sober interpretation. They make no attempt to be amusing. They doubtfully attain that rating as "good stories" which, we may fairly say, belongs as a matter of course to all novels of the broadest merit, as well as to a vast number of novels which have, otherwise, no merit whatever. For the crude elements of a good story are, like those of a good play, almost self-sufficient. You can find them in the fables of the late Shakespeare or the later Henry James, but more or less overlaid with literature and things. The advantage, for the clientèle of the hour, remains, say, with Messrs. Rex Beach and George M. Cohan, in whose works you can find little else. And it is a real advantage, especially when the comparison lies between the Cohans and Beaches on the one side, and writers like those with whom we are at the moment concerned on the other. Everybody loves to be entertained, but not quite everybody hankers to be enlightened as well—still less instead.

These three books are, if you like, chronicles and commentaries rather than tales. Their common theme is the quest of the individual for personal success and happiness. Their method is consciously realistic, to use the word in its vague popular sense. Mr. Goodman's realism is not far from Mr. Dreiser's: not far, that is, from naturalism or animalism. It wishes above all things to eschew sentiment, and succeeds in sentimentalizing the squalid. Men are a little higher than the animals, and thereby less happy. They lack the courage of their impulses, yet impulse prevails. Leonard Vernon is the spoiled son of a widow of the American midlands. At eighteen he wearies of her spoiling and flings off to make his own way. He knows how to go about his task: "I'm going to get on . . . I'm going to be hard and mean . . . I'm going to be cold—strong." He gets foothold in an "Art Glass Works," marries his employer's daughter, becomes a master of men in his business hours, and of women when business permits. His commercial prowess we take pretty much for granted. The more (or less) enlivening task is ours to assist at his petty and miscellaneous philanderings. He has cast off a Jennie and married a Mabel and escaped her for the moment, when we are privileged to have a day off with him in New York: "Walking up Broadway, with chest out and shoulders back, which made his grey walking suit fit unusually well, he thought how different he was from all the people who passed him, the actors out of jobs with their careless apparel, the rough-looking men with weak faces who lined the curbs—suddenly he felt ashamed that he should be seen walking in this district . . . So at Forty-Fourth Street, he turned and went across town to the more adorned trumpery of Fifth Avenue. 'Here,' he thought, 'New York puts on a varnished mask over her harlot's heart, and doesn't betray herself.' And with his muscles echoing to the will of his mind he assumed a more elastic, tripping manner in his gait, while with his cane he cut the air every few steps. As he walked, he noticed how women turned and gave him a second glance." In course of time, two women commit suicide for the sake of this amiable citizen. He has a notion of doing it later, himself, but finds it easier to get drunk, and then to take back the comfortable original Jennie, and then and forever to go on ogling the women on the streets and feebly flirting with the new girl at the cigar-counter. . . .

After all, a good test of creative realism is its giving us people we can somehow tie to. These feeble cads and egotists with whom current pseudo-realism so largely concerns itself sufficiently refute their authors. There are plenty of people in the world like these, but why harp on them? They are of relatively little consequence in the larger scheme of things. It is not they or their philosophy that makes the world go round. We are not all "takers," pure and simple. Many of us, thank God, are finders, and more of us at least are gropers after something higher and better than the blind and brutal enjoyment of the hour. Lee Hillquit of "The Groper" is not an heroic figure, he gropes often in miry places. But there is a decency in him, a spark of aspiration that will not be quenched and that in the end kindles his life to meaning and to a generous happiness. It is in his hour of failure, when the fabric of his easy "success" has crumbled and he must take a lesser place in the world, that his heart is eased to understanding of what honest labor and honest love still have in store for him. He, like "the taker," returns to his first love, but for giving as well as taking. Her need as well as his own strengthens the solid foundations of their union, which is to bring him "a regenerating faith in himself," and in "the fundamental integrity of his own lonely soul."

"The Choice" is a study of marriage in which the woman holds in the foreground. Asenath McBride is a remarkable portrait. There is nothing salient about her except her beauty, which we have to take the author's word for. Daughter of a narrow-minded and pious laborer, she is narrow-minded without being pious. She has instinctively good taste in music, in dress, in all civilized trappings; but no intellect. Her speech is crude, half-articulate. Yet while still in her teens she strongly attracts two men of superior breeding, and marries the one who has the better mind. There are obvious consequences. The young husband, a man hungry for intellectual companionship, is gradually disillusioned as to his wife's possibilities. He sees that the mental sympathy he has given her credit for has been merely unreasoning assent. A great part of his life lies in the mind; and he must live it alone in so far as he lives at home. Asenath realizes her disability, but is powerless to change; and that fine gift of honesty which is her great possession forbids her making conscious pretense, even if it could conceivably be of use. But the husband happens to be a fine, honest, normal fellow. It doesn't occur to him to desert his wife, or to be unfaithful to her! He sees that his wife's lack is not her fault. They have many things in common: music, pictures, their child. Somehow they are together, the choice made: "Had it been his choice? Was it he that has selected her or was it something stronger, something which overruled his judgment? Instinct?" After all, it doesn't matter; they belong to each other, and the best they can make of it may turn out to be very good indeed. "She was his wife and the mother of his child. And he was humbly grateful." In realism of detail there is little to choose among these three records. As for "truth to life," it lies for one reader with those interpretations which are based upon a conviction of the fundamental integrity of that collective soul we call human nature.

H. W. BOYNTON

"Orchestrating" Society

TOWARDS NEW HORIZONS. By M. P. Willcocks. New York: The John Lane Company.

THE publisher's note that the discussions in this book are mainly with reference to the League of Nations and the place of labor under the new conditions to be created thereby is not very well borne out by the text. Still less is the statement justified that "Miss Willcocks possesses unerring insight into the deep springs of human action," and the concluding reference to her book as a "thoughtful analysis of world conditions" presses the advertiser's license to the extreme limit.

In sober truth, Miss Willcocks has no particular care for the League of Nations at all, unless the nations concerned should go into virtual dissolution in the process of giving it birth, in which case it would, of course, cease to be a League of Nations. If the extreme opponents of the League could once convince the world that its terms involved an international suicide pact of that kind, not one of the nations represented at Versailles would ratify it. It is no blind tumbling into racial and political chaos that is intended, but the discriminating attempt of well-defined national entities to aid one another in preserving, not destroying, the legitimate national functions of each.

If "unerring insight" and "thoughtful analysis" were characteristic of Miss Willcocks, one would expect to find also that lucidity of expression which is the normal attendant of these qualities. What one actually finds is the vague and incoherent language which springs inevitably out of an unanalytic habit of mind, and either the inability to see the deeper things of life as they are, or an unwillingness to look deeply when the first glance is not favorable to one's preconceived views.

If one can sift out a fairly constant note running through this volume, it is that the days of private property are numbered. The change from the present régime to an absolutely "socialized" system of production and distribution may require generations rather than years, a new and untried race may have to be brought to the front as the instrument of the new order, but the era of "possession" is doomed, all the same. And yet when Miss Willcocks feels the need of answering the objection that the fine arts would not thrive under such a system of communism as she heralds, she assures us that "with enormous labor-saving devices and with a world-wide wealth in the hands of the people, there will be leisure for art and ample means out of which the artist will be paid, not by individual patrons, but by the State." How inevitably, in every writer of this class, some such slip as this betrays the utter failure to follow their supposed principle through to its necessary results!

In her chapter on Self-Determination, Miss Willcocks betrays her own possession of that individualistic instinct which, in spite of its abuse, has been one of the strongest and most constant factors in the progress of human civilization. Some one has well said that the most reliable safeguard against the final triumph of communism in England or the United States is the fact that the average English or American laborer is at bottom so individualistic in temperament that when it should come to the test he would shoulder a gun to free himself from the shackles of such a system. Miss Willcocks is evidently haunted by the fear that under a system of the absolute leveling of the rewards of labor, together with the individual's self-determination of his sphere of activity, some rather important branches of labor might not find the necessary number of recruits. But she evades any close grip with the difficulty by imagining the race so transformed that the joy of creation is a reality, and that men and women can be "orchestrated" to the joint working out of some conception that is wide enough to claim the services of all types of character and of all degrees of mental power. "Orchestration" was an unfortunate word for her to use. Let her go to the leader of some really successful orchestra and ask him just how much room there is for self-determination in the musicians whom he directs. The negro slave before the war was not so wholly subject to his master's will as are the members of a successful orchestra to the will of a great leader during the time while they are functioning as an orchestra. But if they do not like it they may resign, a privilege for which the all-embracing industrial orchestra so easily imagined by Miss Willcocks has no provision. The simple truth is that a communistic control of all production and distribution, doing away with all private property, is humanly attainable, as nearly as it is attainable at all, only as a system of state slavery.

Miss Willcocks tells us that when "social production" comes it will be but a return to the primitive type of production. When we look into primitive communism, she thinks, we see "the very warp and woof of human nature itself." And what we find there, she holds as good, "especially to us, who seem born to come into contact with nothing but human selfishness." The first instinct in those times, she adds, was to see that none of the tribe should go hungry. Miss Willcocks is, of course, not the first to draw from imagination this rosy lining to the sombre cloud of early human history. The flaw in it is simply its utter lack of harmony with amply attested facts. The level of primitive communism was a level at the bottom of human comfort and convenience, in which "the instinct to secure that none of the tribe shall want" often failed disastrously of realization. And failure of the means of subsistence then did not start streams of aid from afar, as in these days, when we "seem born to come into contact with nothing but human selfishness." The "very warp and woof of human nature itself" is not to be sought in the fact of a greater or less degree of primitive communism, but in the individualism which, starting with the desire to better one's own position, has made countless advances of benefits to all. If this individualism can degenerate into a selfishness requiring restraint, it can also rise to the highest manifestations of self-sacrificing altruism.

Miss Willcocks imagines that "socialized" production and distribution will put so vigorous a spirit into the laborer that the rate of production will at once be greatly increased, making it possible eventually to reduce the day of labor to four hours, if not even less. As to the food supply, "by applying atomic energy to agriculture we shall produce on a scale that baffles all measurements of to-day." It had been our impression that atomic energy was already at work in agriculture, but perhaps it was unionized and ordered out on strike at the close of the golden reign of Saturn, when the crops ceased to grow without human toil, honey no longer exuded from the leaves of trees, and the advent of Jupiter made it necessary for mortals to live by the sweat of the brow.

But we can go no farther with the vagaries of Miss Willcocks. The volume is significant only as a well-marked symptom of what she herself, with a flash of insight wholly uncharacteristic, names "the peculiar mental disease of this time—a vague desire to make the world better, combined with absolute ignorance of how this is to be done."

The Run of the Shelves

IN the alarms and excursions of the present time, with its racial frictions and dynastic overturnings, it is refreshing to find Spain producing and printing its first translation of the Travels of Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, its great Jewish wanderer and geographer (Viajes de Benjamín de Tudela. Por Ignacio González-Llubera. Madrid: Sanz Calleja). There is a good introduction, especially on the personality of the author and his place among mediæval geographers, critical apparatus, commentary, bibliography, and full indices—in every way a useful and creditable production. It is a monument of the new Spain and should have been dedicated to the Manes of the Jews of the old time.

"Patriotism and Popular Education: Thoughts and Questionings on these and many other Matters of Urgent National Concern" is the title of certain "hot discursive thoughts" addressed by Henry Arthur Jones to Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, president of the English Board of Education (London: Chapman and Hall). Mr. Jones, whose plays are but scant indications of the range and even the quickness of his mind, is one of the sprightliest writers and one of the keenest and most caustic debaters with the pen to whom England can point at the present moment. It is impossible to follow through all its flexures the "discursiveness" of a criticism which will quicken reflection in minds predisposed to reflect, and provoke in others that anger which is the reaction of thoughtlessness to thought. We may pause on a single topic. Mr. Jones thinks popular education in England largely a failure, and he also thinks that the disappearance of Shakespeare from the English stage at a time when popular education is becoming universal is illustrative and demonstrative of that failure. He is cruel enough to remind his countrymen that "in the year before the war there were sixty-six companies playing Shakespeare in Germany, . . . while 1,104 representations were given of 'The Merchant of Venice' alone. Our English record for that year is too contemptible to be set down."

In America, Mr. Jones's test of the soundness of popular education seems irrelevant, not to say impious. We do not connect Shakespeare with popular amusement in this country any more than we connect prayer with baseball.

Still, there is Mr. Jones, the inexorable Mr. Jones, with his peremptory and indiscriminating test. Is that test unfair? The proof of a man lies in the voluntary rather than the involuntary part of his days, in the hours for which he lives rather than the hours by which he lives; and for the common man that chosen part, those vital hours, are represented by amusement. It would certainly not be fair to test popular education by its failure to make Milton or Bacon popular, but Shakespeare is quite another matter. There was no barrier between Shakespeare and the common man of his own time, and there seems every reason to suppose that the common man of to-day is a better fellow in sense, knowledge, and taste, if not in wit, than his Elizabethan prototype. Shakespeare never forgot that man in the street by whom he is now so obdurately forgotten. In New York to-day Shakespeare would be just the man to stand shoulder to shoulder in staunch comradeship or eye to eye in genial understanding with the very clerks and artisans who now desert the "Taming of the Shrew" and the "Comedy of Errors" for vaudeville and the cinematograph. Shakespeare "spells ruin," and it is difficult to argue with ledgers; still, it is a little curious that the love of pounds and dollars should bar from the stage in our time a set of plays to the making of which the love of crowns and sixpences was an unmistakable incentive. It is as hard to believe that Shakespeare in New York to-day would find the Messrs. Shubert or Messrs. Klaw and Erlanger incomprehensible as that he would find Mr. Eugene Walter or Mr. Rupert Hughes unsympathetic. Without overstressing a line of argument which has many disheartening facts to meet and face, it seems almost worth while to put once more the question whether the division between Shakespeare and common folk is an organic and necessary division, or whether it is a matter of fashion and habit which reform in education might control. There is that insulting German record of 1,104 representations of "The Merchant of Venice" in the year before the war.

A few years ago a lot of extraordinary gold and jeweled ornaments came out of Egypt and were sold to American, English, and German collectors. The objects included heavy pectorals adorned with coins and medals, necklaces with medals, a remarkable openwork breast chain, jeweled bracelets and earrings. It happily occurred to the late Professor Walter Denison to publish these splendid things, widely scattered as they were, in a single volume, which now appears in the University of Michigan Studies (Macmillan). The date of the treasure is the middle of the sixth century A.D.

There is a very interesting medallion bearing an Annunciation and Miracle at Cana, not to mention large cameos of various dates. While Professor Denison's minute and thorough commentary is naturally intended for archæologists, the numerous plates will delight anybody who cares for fine goldsmith's work. The perforated ornamentation forecasts interestingly both later Byzantine metal work and the splendors of the Saracenic style.

At last the fur-covered animals are receiving deserved recognition—in a reliable, popular, illustrated account of their lives and their place in the fauna of this continent. It is high time, since, more quickly than the birds which fly above us, or the reptiles which creep beneath, mammals are going to the wall before the onrush of human dominion. Another half century will unquestionably see the end of most large mammals except in game preserves and zoological gardens. Mr. Nelson, Chief of the Biological Survey, in his "Wild Animals of North America" (Natural Geographical Society) has written over one hundred brief biographies, giving a résumé of the habits and the ways of life of North American Mammals, and this is accompanied by a wealth of colored plates by Louis Agassiz Fuertes, sketches by Seton, and photographs. There is no attempt at systematic classification, the two parts of the thin, limp cloth volume being divided arbitrarily into the Larger and the Smaller Mammals, and all the troubles of subspecies are hidden away in the phrase "and its relatives." The accounts are well balanced, many given at first hand; the book should help to attract some of the interest which in most lay lovers of nature is wholly expended upon flowers, insects, and birds.

"Marie Bashkirtseff: the Journal of a Young Artist," published thirty years ago, has appeared in a new edition (Dutton), with the text of the translation revised, and with some additions, very slight in amount, from the original French. The journal begins when the writer is twelve and ends just before her death, when she is twenty-three. The early pages are, from one point of view, as insufferable as ever, with their exhibition of childish vanity and self-analytical precocity. Yet even these outpourings have a peculiar value, for they are written by a child, not, as in other documents of self-revelation, by a mature man or woman looking back with humorous compassion on the silly dreams of long ago. Vanity and petulant self-analysis remain till the close, but they are tempered by real and growing power as the writer, working courageously under the handicaps of ill health and traditions of idle wealth, develops her talent as a painter. Her comments on the world and on art, pungent, penetrating, and sympathetic, become more frequent than her praise of her own good looks and cleverness. Literary talent appears: bits of description of Spain, for example, are masterly in tone. And through the whole runs that aspiration for power and fame based on solid achievement, and not on mere social charm, which was the dominating note of the woman's character. Despite all its tinsel, the book has gained a permanent place, and a place of high honor, in the literature of self-revelation.

The Orange Convention in Canada

DURING the last week of July the ninetieth annual convention of the Supreme Grand Lodge of British North America took place in the city of Ottawa. Over two thousand lodges were represented and the resolutions adopted mark a very significant departure in the annals of the Orange organization. Three facts stand out in relief, as consequences of the lengthy deliberations of the delegates. The reëlection of the Supreme Grand Master; the attaching of the Order to one particular political party; and the extraordinary attitude assumed in regard to the Irish question.

The reëlection, by acclamation, of Mr. Horacio C. Hocken as Supreme Grand Master of the Orange Order in British North America, was not unexpected, nor was the distinction undeserved. Certainly no more zealous and competent man holds office to-day in the organization. Mr. Hocken is a Canadian by birth, of English parentage and a journalist by profession. He has been Mayor of Toronto and sits to-day as Member of Parliament for one of the divisions of that city. He received his education in Canada and worked up from the "case" to the editorship and proprietorship of The Sentinel, the organ of Orangism on this continent. Were he not so closely attached to the one special interest—that of his Order—there is every reason to believe that a brilliant future might await him. He has administrative and executive ability of no mean order, and, with his kindly disposition, strong determination, and natural talents, he is possessed of all the qualifications of a Cabinet Minister. He has, however, chosen another sphere of activity, and certainly he has so far been very successful in that.

On the third day of the Convention the Orange Order adopted, unanimously, a resolution to the effect that henceforth the whole body, and each individual member thereof, should support the Union Government and help in establishing in Canada a Unionist Party.

This is very significant. According to the charter of the Orange Order, obtained in 1890, the objects of the Association are set forth as being mutual benefit, fraternal coöperation, patriotic endeavor, and the protection and propagation of Protestantism. Ever since it has been the unvarying theme of the leaders of the Order to proclaim absolute independence in politics. Even Mr. Hocken's own organ, The Sentinel, not later than last June announced that the Orange Order was attached to no special party, but held itself free to support for the time being any policy that agreed with their own special aims. By this last resolution the entire Order, in Canada, is bound hand and foot to one political party. That independence which was heretofore its strength seems to have vanished with the closing of this convention. This is a situation that needs no elaboration. Suppose that the Knights of Columbus, in convention, were to pass a like resolution, it is quite obvious that such a course would lead to disintegration within the Society, and to an immediate falling off of its influence in the affairs of the country. So is it with Orangism in Canada; henceforth, instead of being an independent factor in the great political struggles of the Dominion, it will be considered merely an auxiliary of one party.

The third remarkable expression of this Orange Convention is its attitude towards the Irish issue. One could readily understand its absolute sympathy with Sir Edward Carson; its offer of support financially, morally, and otherwise; its faith in Ulster and all that the Carsonites stand for; its opposition to Home Rule in any form; its antagonism to Sinn Feinism, and all that the extremists of that ilk profess and propose; but it is hard to reconcile their persistent demand for an undivided, peace-enjoying, and prosperous British Empire with their declaration that they will not have any settlement of the Irish question. If they mean by this that they are opposed to the division of Ireland into North and South, or the establishment of Home Rule along the lines of Dominion government, or the creation of a Federal system for England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, they do not say so. They indicate no special policy, they suggest no solution. They simply declare that they are opposed to the settlement of the Irish question. If they mean what they say, certainly it is not for the greater peace and prosperity of the Empire they are acting. It is scarcely conceivable that any body of men, or any person in particular, who has an honest interest in the welfare of the Empire, could wish to see the thorny Irish trouble perpetuated unto the end

(Continued on page 330)

Steel!

C-W traditions of leadership were again exemplified in 1906 in the form of a motor designed specifically for the gruelling conditions of service encountered in steel mills.

This new C-W motor combined bull strength and unusually high overload capacity, thus enabling users to meet schedules of production which with motors of lesser stamina would have been impossible.

Crocker-Wheeler designing and C-W engineering have played a vital part in the development of American industry.

Alb Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

BRONZES BY ST. GAUDENS, MAC MONNIES
REMINGTON AND OTHER AMERICAN SCULPTORS

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

New Harper Books

TALES OF FISHES
by Zane Grey

Elaborately
Illustrated
$2.50

Among deep-sea fishers Zane Grey stands out almost as conspicuously as he does among novelists. He is president of the Tuna Club at Avalon, as well as vice-president of the Long Key Fishing Club, and has now written a fascinating book showing the sport in its most exciting moments.

Many adventures have been his, and most of them are told of in these fascinating true tales, which are fully illustrated with delightful photographs taken on the scene of action.

Those who have read Mr. Grey's novels will know with what vividness he has pictured these episodes in a true sportsman's life.

Do animals talk? Dr. William J. Long says they do, and his assertion is based on long and scientific observation. He believes in the common spiritual inheritance of animal and man, and he shows us the great affinity between them by showing us the real selves of the animals.

This strong affinity, he says, has been lost to a great extent through civilization and the ruthless pursuit of birds and animals.

HOW ANIMALS TALK

By
William J. Long

Illustrated. $3.00

Harper & Brothers, Established 1817 New York

(Continued from page 328)
of time. We can conceive how natural is the antagonism of the Orange Order in Canada and elsewhere to the "Irish Republic," the utopia of De Valera and his following; all that is in the order of things. But we vainly seek for an explanation of the two resolutions above referred to—support of the Union and opposition to all settlement of the Irish question—unless A. G. Gardiner throws some light upon it. In his "Pillars of Society," speaking of Carson's motive, that observant journalist says:

The motive is the Ascendency of his caste established and maintained by the Union. For a century or more the Orangemen have had Ireland under their heel. . . . With the Castle at their back they have held Ireland like a conquered province—they have held it as the British hold India. They have planted their nominees in every fat job; they have controlled the administration; the police have been an instrument in their hands; justice has been the tool of their purpose; the law has been of their fashioning and the judges of their making. And now the Ascendency is done. The outworks have gone; the walls are crumbling. Landlordism has been put to flight. The Irish people are emerging from the dust. They have their land; they have their local councils; they stand erect and ask for full freedom in their own household. The whole fabric of Ascendency is collapsing before our eyes. A new Ireland is dawning across the Channel. And against the dawn there stands a figure baleful and heroic, challenging the new day—a figure emblematic of an ancient tale of wrong and a night that is past.

Does this passage explain the exceptional attitude and the peculiar resolutions of the Orange Order in British North America?

J. K. F.

Ottawa, Canada, August 4

Books Received

FICTION

Burt, K. N. The Branding Iron. Houghton Mifflin. $1.65.

Pallen, C. B. Crucible Island. New York: Manhattanville Press.

MANY distinguished American and foreign authors have said that the MODERN LIBRARY is one of the most stimulating factors in American intellectual life. Practically everybody who knows anything about good books owns a number of copies of the Modern Library and generally promises himself to own them all. One of the largest book stores in the country reports that more copies of the Modern Library are purchased for gifts than any other books now being issued.

Many of the books in the Modern Library are not reprints but are new books which cannot be found in any other edition. None of them can be had in any such convenient and attractive form. It would be difficult to find any other editions of any of these books at double the price. They can be purchased wherever books are sold or you can get them from us.

At all bookstores, 75c. per copy. Hand bound in limp craft leather. Send to us for our new catalogue.

BONI & LIVERIGHT, 105 W. 40th St., NEW YORK

Hotel Puritan
390 Commonwealth Avenue
Boston

The atmosphere and equipment of the Puritan are unusual in an American public house.

Globe trotters say it is one of the most homelike and attractive hotels in the world. Rates are reasonable.

Motorists, send for our booklet with guide to Boston and historic vicinity.

R. E. COSTELLO, Manager.

The Collected Addresses of Elihu Root

Edited by Robert Bacon and James Brown Scott

ADDRESSES ON INTERNATIONAL SUBJECTS. $3.00
ADDRESSES ON GOVERNMENT AND CITIZENSHIP. $3.00
MILITARY AND COLONIAL POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES. $3.00
LATIN AMERICA AND THE UNITED STATES. $2.50
MISCELLANEOUS ADDRESSES. $2.50
NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERIES ARBITRATION. $3.00
THE UNITED STATES AND THE WAR. $2.50

7 Randall Hall,
Cambridge, Mass.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

280 Madison Ave.,
New York

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion.

Vol. 1, No. 16

New York, Saturday, August 30, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment
Editorial Articles:
Obligations and Reservations	333
Lloyd George Faces the Coal Situation	334
Accounting for Caporetto	335
The Shortened Working Day	336
In the Name of Liberty, Reaction. By W. J. Ghent	338
The Situation in the Mohammedan World. By D. B. Macdonald	339
Romain Rolland's Return to Fiction. By A. G. H. Spiers	342
Correspondence	343
Poetry:
Aftermath. By Charles R. Murphy	345
Book Reviews:
Colonel Repington's Memoirs	345
A Mighty Hunter	346
Idealists in London	347
The Psychology of "Correspondence"	348
"English A" in France. By Robert P. Utter	348

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

THE President's decision upon the railroad wage question is what the situation clearly demanded. His appeal to the railroad men ought to find a response in their patriotism and their regard for the public weal; whether it will or not remains to be seen. The attention of the country is so centred on the hardships of high prices that the President's insistence on the impossibility of keeping prices down and at the same time yielding to constant demands for raising of wages will be sure to find a hearty response among the people at large. With this state of public sentiment to reckon with, it may be that the railroad workers will realize that not only public duty, but also a calculation of their own interests, counsels a reasonable attitude and acquiescence in the President's decision. If this should prove to be the case, well and good. But the question that must be in the mind of every one seriously considering the situation is, what will happen if the railroad workers persist in their intention to strike?

PERSUASIVE as the President's appeal to the railroad employees is in many ways, it lacks one note which it would have been wise as well as courageous to sound now, instead of putting it off to some time when the situation may be more acute. To be conciliatory, to point out that a little waiting may relieve the situation, to assure the railroad men that their just claims will be taken care of in the future if this expectation should be disappointed—all this is right enough. But it is taking a great risk to implant in the minds of the men the idea that everything is likely to be mended in a short time, and that if it isn't they can count on the Government giving them all they want. For if things do not work as smoothly as the President appears to expect, there is going to be trouble; and when trouble comes the Government will have to take a stand, unless it is prepared to clothe the railroad unions with the power of being supreme judge in their own case. Short of this, it will become necessary, as it has so often been in the past, to assert the rights of the public by something more than smooth words. A reminder that in the last resort the workers must submit to orderly methods for deciding their claims, and that the right of the country to uninterrupted working of its transportation system will be firmly maintained, would have been most salutary.

THE radical action taken by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the question of Shantung must not be regarded as at all indicative of the attitude of the Senate. The vote was 9 to 8, Senator McCumber voting with the Democrats. With this exception the Republicans voted solidly for the change in the treaty; but the two most extreme opponents of the League—Borah and Johnson—and several others almost as extreme were included among them. This is, of course, not at all representative of the Senate Republicans as a whole.

Nothing more dangerous to the peace of the world at the present time, and to the prospects of good international relations in the future, can well be imagined than the adoption by the Senate of this violent and ill-considered move. The objections to it were formulated with admirable clearness and force in a statement made by Senator McCumber immediately after the vote of the committee. That it would render necessary the reopening of the entire treaty question is self-evident. For us to undertake in this way to pass unqualified judgment against Japan would be an affront to which she could not passively submit. That she would not only harbor resentment against this country, but would refuse to complete her membership in the League of Nations, may be set down as certain. President Wilson is probably right in his view that the settlement as made was the best to which Japan could be brought to consent at Versailles; but, whether so or not, to tear up the settlement now would mean a break of good relations which would bear the seeds of infinite mischief in the future.

What is necessary as matters stand is to work patiently towards the bringing about of justice to China, building both upon Japan's promises and upon the underlying principles to which she, in common with the rest of the nations of the world, is committed by membership in the League of Nations. The Senate should put on record, in connection with the ratification, its judgment of what ought to be done, thus refusing to give its sanction to the Shantung provision. To go beyond this assertion of the desire and attitude of our country would be reckless and dangerous folly.

THE Hungarian situation has reached a temporary balance without much advance towards a solution. The Rumanians have explained that they entered Budapest before orders to the contrary reached them, and they have abated their demands on the Magyars. They remain in military possession of Hungary as acknowledged agents of the Supreme Council, and subject to the orders of a local mixed commission of the Council. How this patched-up arrangement is working does not yet appear. Meanwhile the Rumanian Government has disclaimed all sympathy for or responsibility concerning Archduke Joseph's dictatorship. Remains to explain how his stroke was made at the moment of the Rumanian occupation and with the tolerance of the conquerors. The Archduke's coalition cabinet shifted almost from day to day. The spectacle of a Hapsburg in control of Hungary was highly disquieting to the new Slavic nations. The Supreme Council—thanks, possibly, to Herbert Hoover's courageous and indignant protest—has at least cleared the air by compelling the withdrawal of the Archduke.

A CURIOSITY of Sinn Fein agitation is a Society of Friends of Freedom for India largely officered by Irishmen, and including several disloyal Americans of pacifist and pro-German stamp. A similar organization undertakes the cause of Egyptian autonomy, and we may doubtless expect a Hiberno-Persian and a Hiberno-Tibetan brotherhood. The idea is to raise a smoke against England in every possible direction, appealing to the latent Anglophobia of the country. These movements will be judged by well-informed people according to the membership of these societies. America will not wish to be instructed as to the liberties of the world by those hate-blinded Fenians who only lately regarded Germany as the guarantor of universal liberty, nor yet by hyphenated Americans who sought a victorious peace for the Kaiser, nor even by unhyphenated Americans who opposed the raising of our armies. Doubting Americans may yet come to love England for the enemies she has made.

THE American Rights League was born of the Lusitania outrage, and its patriotism is altogether beyond challenge. It has issued an appeal for prompt ratification of the treaty which ought to have weight with the Senate. The arguments setting forth the urgent need of immediate action, and the benefits to be hoped for from the League of Nations, are put in concise and effective form. On the subject of reservations, the language is not entirely clear, the statement being that there should be no reservations "of a nature to make necessary a reopening of questions the adjustment of which has been accepted by the representatives in Paris." If these words are to be understood as permitting the reservations formulated by the Republican group of seven in the Senate, we entirely approve the position taken by Mr. George Haven Putnam and the patriotic league of which he has been president during these four fateful years.

THE Thracian dispute promises to end in a lame compromise under Mr. Wilson's universal formula of internationalization. Originally the whole region was Grecian, as it still is predominantly. Through persecution and proscription the Bulgarians, since the Balkan War, have artificially created a small Bulgarian region in western Thrace. Our delegates in the Peace Conference have ill-advisedly honored this poor claim to western Thrace, on the theory that the Bulgars would fight if they were not satisfied. France and the European members of the Conference generally urged the cession to Greece of all of Thrace except the zone behind Constantinople. The real argument of the Bulgars was simply the outrages committed by them in recent years and whatever atrocities they may be disposed to add in the future. This plea was naturally not sufficient to sustain our brief for Bulgaria. So the Conference is now considering the creation of the classic neutral strip, under the League, which will give Bulgaria an outlet to the Aegean Sea, while dividing Grecian Thrace into severed parts. It is the Dantzig makeshift repeated. On the merits of the case, Bulgaria has no just territorial claim in Thrace, and her commercial aspirations could be satisfied by proper port and railway facilities. To multiply unnecessary jurisdictions merely weakens the League. We trust our delegates may be instructed to abate a quixotic championship of the most dangerous and treacherous of Balkan Powers.

AS remarked in the Review last week, Admiral Kolchak's determination to fulfill his pledges to maintain a liberal and democratic policy and resist all attempts at reaction has placed him in an extremely difficult situation, because those Governments which sympathize with this policy have not brought timely assistance. This lack of moral and material aid had played into the hands of the monarchist reactionaries who desire a restoration of the old régime, and who count among their number many of the officer class. These men taunt him with the failure of his friends to help, and propose close coöperation with the Japanese, and later with the Germans. For the time being Kolchak has surmounted a serious crisis and is maintaining his position. The strength of the opposition, however, is indicated in the following propaganda news despatch which appeared in the American papers August 22:

Tokio, Sunday, August 17 (by the Associated Press).—The All-Russian Government at Omsk has transferred its gold reserve and archives eastward to Irkutsk, according to apparently reliable reports received here. Other information from Siberia indicates that the Omsk Government's position is growing weaker instead of stronger because of the advance of Bolsheviks and the desertion of Siberian troops.

The Hochi Shinbun today published a despatch from Peking that the Omsk Government had fallen, but added there was no confirmation.

It is believed here that the Japanese Army, if it becomes necessary, will attempt to prevent an advance of the Bolsheviks east of Irkutsk.

The casual reader would immediately receive the impression that the Omsk Government was on its last legs, which is not borne out by the authentic news from there. On the other hand, this communication from Tokio indicates clearly the connection between the reactionary opponents of Kolchak and the Japanese authorities, and evidently is intended to prepare the public for an announcement of Japanese intervention if Kolchak falls.

WE have to confess a serious error in understanding the Evening Post's reference to the fact that between 1873 and 1896 prices fell in spite of an increased supply of currency in this country to have been meant to show the falsity of the quantity theory of money. As the Post justly points out, this statistical fact was cited by it as refutation of the notion that currency expansion is "the sole and single cause" of changes in the price-level. As against any such crude notion as this the fact adduced is, of course, quite sufficient. We can only say, in explanation of our misunderstanding, that the Post's remark, although attached to the crude notion in question, was made by way of showing that Mr. Harding might have strengthened his case if he had referred to those figures of 1873-96. But in point of fact Governor Harding nowhere in his letter made any reference whatever to the notion which the Post attacks. He was engaged in showing that the increase of Federal Reserve note issues was not the cause but the effect of high prices; and his argument to that end could not in any way have been strengthened by proving that currency expansion is not the only cause of increasing prices.

Curiously enough, the Evening Post misunderstands our own position in regard to Governor Harding's letter. It says:

The Board is criticised [by the Review] for not making full allowance for the influence of the great import of gold, between 1914 and the middle of 1917; also for not giving due attention to the part played by expansion of bank credits in the rise of prices.

So far from criticising Mr. Harding on these points, it was a large part of the purpose of our article to draw attention to the fact that Mr. Harding's statement about the expansion of Federal Reserve note circulation—from which we dissented—was not to be understood as in any way denying that expansion of the currency as a whole operates as a cause of high prices, still less that expansion of bank credits operates in this way. On the first of these points we said:

Nowhere does there appear in Mr. Harding's careful and comprehensive discussion any intimation that the great influx of gold which marked the period between the beginning of the great war and our entry into it was not instrumental in causing a great rise in the general level of prices.

And, after quoting Governor Harding on the second point, we said:

It is most important that the public should understand that this clear acknowledgment of expansion of bank credits as a cause of high prices is contained in Mr. Harding's statement.

The danger against which we were seeking to guard is illustrated in such a remark as this, in the New York Times's leading editorial on Mr. Harding's letter:

Those most fearful of inflation regard it as the cause of the rise in prices complained of in the protests against the high cost of living. The Board regards it as "the effect of advancing wages and prices, and not the cause."

It was not as to "inflation" in general, but only as to the increase of Federal Reserve notes, that the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board made this assertion.

THE attractive crime of arson has found its devotees among the aspirants to fame ever since the days of Herostratus. The latest addition to this long line of pyrotechnic celebrities is made by a man who would seem to need no flaming distinction to be remembered with awe by posterity. This modern Herostratus, however, has a more subtle way of going about his incendiary business; he left the crime to be committed by others, not from any conscientious objection to its effects, but that he might the better surprise the world with the subsequent discovery that he was its actual instigator. In a letter to General von Falkenhayn, only recently published but written as early as September 17, 1914, he recommended a newly invented flame-thrower for military purposes. "I consider the suggestion to make use of the new invention from airships to be a very happy one." "Happy" is, indeed, the most felicitous term to describe this novel means of spreading Kultur. The torch of civilization kept burning and handed down from generation to generation is a symbol too commonplace and insipid to suit the imagination of these more refined days. A statue of dapper Herr Erzberger, the writer of the letter from which we have quoted, passing a flame-thrower with his pudgy fist to a martial emissary of Kultur, would have far more appropriateness. We consider the suggestion to make use of this statue for the embellishment and rehabilitation of the now-discredited Sieges-Allee in Berlin to be a very happy one.

A PAUSE in the conversation enabled Professor McAndrew Cantlie to slip in a word about the obliging ways of railway officials. "I asked for a return ticket to a near-by suburb and instead of giving it to me at once the ticket-seller most considerately explained that a war tax was placed on all tickets over forty-two cents, and, as a single ticket to my destination cost only thirty-nine cents, two single tickets would be less expensive than a round trip. Indeed, his thoughtfulness saved me six cents. I was most grateful. Only the other day, too, my wife desired to see our eldest daughter off on her first railway journey alone. But it appeared that they must part in the crowd that was surging about the gate. It seemed that there was no legal way in which her maternal solicitude to see her child safely deposited in the coach could be satisfied. An official, however, was again most fertile in suggestion. He proposed that as she passed the man at the gate she make a gesture indicative of the possession of mileage in some inaccessible corner of her bag. When the doubtful success of this experiment was pointed out, he suggested that she buy a ticket herself, and after having employed it as a sop to the Cerberus at the gate, carry it to an officer upstairs provided for that purpose and there redeem it. The efforts of these officials to eke out the imperfections of the law are most worthy of commendation."

Obligations and Reservations

IN the meeting between the President and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the central theme was the nature of the obligation imposed by Article X. of the Covenant of the League of Nations, and the way in which that obligation might be affected by reservations. Any fair critic must, we think, admit that a remarkably high degree of ability was displayed by both sides in the discussion; the questions put were pertinent, the answers were in clear and straightforward language, and the argumentation on both sides was keen and concise. But the question remains, Was anything accomplished by this "matching of minds"?

If we mean by this question, Was either side brought to a new view of the subject, Did the two sides come closer to an agreement, the answer must be "No." But if we mean by it, Were the issues more sharply defined, Is it more possible than it was before for fair-minded men to pass a trustworthy judgment on the situation, then the answer must be emphatically "Yes." For it was brought out beyond peradventure that the President understands the obligations of Article X. to be just what they are understood to be by the great bulk of those who, ready to assent to the League Covenant with effective reservations, are resolved not to permit ratification without such reservations. Accordingly, there is every reason to believe more strongly than ever, what there has long been strong reason to believe, that the final issue on the League in the Senate will be simply that between adopting reservations separate from the act of ratification and adopting them as part of the act of ratification—in other words, between really securing the points covered by the reservations and merely putting them on record without securing them.

In his attempt to remove the seriousness of the differences between these two forms of action, the President wholly failed. His plea for the adoption of the less effective course on the ground that the more effective one would involve delay has just such weight as any one may feel inclined to assign to it; his endeavor to break the force of the inherent need of the reservations themselves can not bear the test of serious examination. His distinction between legal and moral obligation was ingeniously and accurately phrased, but leaves the matter just where it was. The question is, and has again and again been stated by advocates of reservations to be, just this: If Congress were in any instance to refuse to take part in that preservation of territorial integrity which is guaranteed by Article X., would such refusal constitute a violation of the obligation imposed by the treaty? Mr. Wilson admits that the treaty imposes "a very grave and solemn moral obligation," and declares that "a moral obligation is of course superior to a legal obligation, and, if I may say so, has a superior binding force;" the only way in which a moral obligation is less constraining than a legal one is that in the former "there is an element of judgment" and in the latter not. But if that element of judgment relates only to the question of fact—the question whether the contemplated contingency has arisen—it does not meet the objection; and if it goes beyond this, if it means the right to judge the claim of the situation on its inherent merits, then it reduces the guarantee of territorial integrity to a nullity. There is not the slightest reason to believe that the other Powers that are parties to the agreement view the obligation in this way; and if that is the view the United States takes of the obligation it is assuming, it is essential that this be made clear at the time that we enter into the contract, and as part of it. In point of fact, the resolutions that represent the views of the important group of Republican Senators known as moderate reservationists do not go so far as this. They do not go into the abstract ethics of the matter at all, but they set forth in unmistakable language the fact that the execution of the undertaking of Article X., in so far as it may require "the use of American military or naval forces or economic measures, can under the Constitution be carried out only by the action of the Congress," and declare that failure of the Congress to take such action "shall not constitute a violation of the treaty." If that is what we mean, that is what we ought to say, and we ought to say it in such a way as to be of binding effect upon our relations with the nations with which we are to be associated.

It might conceivably be urged that the express statement of this attitude would lessen the moral effect which, in the absence of such statement, Article X. would have in spite of everyone's knowledge of the actual limitations of our Constitution. In the case of any treaty whatsoever, a future Congress has, of course, the power to refuse the means of its actual execution; yet everybody understands that, unless for very exceptional reasons, the obligation, resting as it does on the good faith of the nation, will be observed. The peculiarity of the present treaty, however, as regards Article X., is that its scope is so extensive and varied as to involve from the start the gravest doubts whether the nation ought to bind itself in anything like so absolute a way as is the case with an ordinary treaty agreement. For those who entertain such doubts, it is clearly the demand of honesty that warning of the actual attitude of the country should be clearly and authoritatively given. And, strange to say, the course proposed by the President, as interpreted by one of his leading spokesmen in the Senate on the day following the White House conference, does all that the effective resolutions would do to impair the moral effect in question, and yet fails to protect the country from a future charge of bad faith. The resolution introduced by Senator Pittman is identical with that of the Republican reservationists except in the single point of being proposed as an act distinct from the act of ratification. This cuts from under the feet of the Administration every argument against the adoption of the reservation as part of the act of ratification except the single plea of the delay which the latter course might entail.

That the treaty should be ratified at the earliest possible moment no one has felt to be more urgently necessary than has the Review. But it is highly improbable that any serious difficulty would be experienced in getting the express acquiescence of the principal Powers, and the tacit acquiescence of the rest, to these reservations by the United States, if the Administration accepted them with the sincere purpose of promptly securing such assent. According to the President himself, they but confirm an understanding already extant; and whether this be so or not, the interest of all the rest of the world in completing the settlement is so intense, so much more imperative than that of the United States, that the reservations would almost certainly command ready concurrence. It was pointed out by Senator Knox at the conference that exchange of diplomatic notes would be quite sufficient for the purpose. In any case, the object is too important to be waived on account of the bare possibility of immediate difficulty in the arrangements for securing it.

One cause of intellectual confusion in regard to the whole subject is to be found in the circumstance, inevitable in any such large matter of controversy, that some of the arguments invoked by opponents of the Covenant as it stands are in conflict with others. There are those who strenuously contend that the Covenant violates the Constitution by depriving Congress of its right to determine the question of peace and war. That this contention is not sound has been amply shown, and was brought out with particular conclusiveness in Senator Kellogg's able speech a few weeks ago. It is not a question of Constitutional legitimacy, but of far-reaching national policy, that is at issue. It is precisely because the obligation assumed in the treaty is not different in kind from what many former treaties have embodied that the reservations are called for. Not only in Article X., but also in the question of withdrawal, the question of the Monroe Doctrine, and the question of control over what we regard as purely domestic issues, the matters disposed of or affected by the treaty are of such comprehensive and fundamental significance that a due regard for the integrity of our future policy and conduct demands a plain statement of any limitations which the considered judgment of the nation recognizes as necessary.

The time has come for facing with intelligence and resolution the actual facts of the situation as between President and Senate. If the impasse is to continue, the fault will lie either upon the President or upon the leadership of the Republican party in the Senate. The little group of irreconcilables can not be blamed for it. They squarely take their stand upon ground on which it is impossible for those to meet them who wish to bring the affair to a reasonably prompt close. Such is not the case, however, either with the President or with the great bulk of the Republican representation in the Senate, not excepting Senator Lodge. A clear way is open to them for a rational settlement of the existing differences. Mr. Wilson has no reason to believe that the Republicans will yield to his demand, or that the country insists upon anything of the kind. The failure of leadership on the Republican side has consisted in its inability or unwillingness to take a definite stand. If the resolutions proposed by the reservationists should be adopted as representing the position of the main body of the Republicans, the President would be confronted with the necessity of a clear decision between the acceptance of that programme and insistence on one which, upon his own showing, has almost nothing to recommend it. Let the issue be sharply drawn in this way, and we feel sure that the country will make its wishes unmistakably known.

Lloyd George Faces the Coal Situation

ALTHOUGH Lloyd George is probably the best-hated man in the United Kingdom, he is apparently quite indispensable. At any rate, he has held high office through all the vicissitudes of the war and in every time of emergency and crisis both friends and enemies have looked to him for deliverance—and never yet in vain. But trouble did not end with the signing of the armistice, and it remains to be seen whether this astute leader will be able to meet the new difficulties that arise on every side, not the least of which is the dispute about the nationalization of the coal mines.

The Premier seems to have been afraid of the Miners' Federation, and no wonder; for it has a membership of 800,000 out of 1,100,000 coal miners in Great Britain, and it is backed up by the railway men and the transport workers, the other members of the formidable and notorious Triple Alliance, an aggregation of more than 1,500,000 men under the leadership of Robert Smillie, who is also chief of the miners. If all these workers were to strike together, as they have frequently threatened to do, all the industries of Great Britain would be paralyzed, and irreparable damage might be done to the economic life of the country. So Lloyd George has time and again taken orders from Robert Smillie, and the Sankey Commission allowed the miners practically everything that they demanded, going so far in the final report as to recommend, by a vote of 7 to 6, state purchase of royalties and the nationalization of the mines.

Socialists in Great Britain and America have viewed this process with undisguised satisfaction, and have heralded it far and wide as the twilight of capitalism and the dawn of socialism, forgetting that there might come, between twilight and dawn, a dark night of ruin and chaos. Ruin is what stares Great Britain in the face at the present time, for coal-mining is her most basic industry, and the total output, as well as the output per miner, has been rapidly falling off. Various causes have contributed to this result, but the fact remains that the export trade in coal is threatened with extinction, while the general export trade also is menaced and with it the means of subsistence of millions of people.

Nationalization is put forward by the miners as the one and only remedy for this state of affairs, but their arguments, which have in them a large element of personal interest, are not very convincing. Of course, they did not convert the six employers' representatives on the Sankey Commission, nor did the employers' arguments convert the six representatives of labor. Justice Sankey, the Chairman, who heard all the pros and cons during four long months, seems to have thought that the opponents of nationalization had the better of the argument from the merely economic point of view; but he gave the casting vote in favor of nationalization on the ground that it would promote better feeling among the miners and thus contribute to increased production. Obviously the Chairman's decision was somewhat influenced by political considerations, especially by fear of the long-threatened strike of the miners and the whole Triple Alliance.

While public opinion was slowly forming on this great question, and the Government were retreating from one compromise to another, the miners were advancing with great confidence, and it began to look as though they could whip the whole country into line and levy toll on every industry. But in their triumphant career they made several rather bad blunders. It was not wise in them to threaten the British nation, for while John Bull is a good fellow at his best he is a nasty customer at his worst, and will not take more than a certain amount of rough usage even from his best friends.

Again, the Executive of the Triple Alliance made a stupid move in advocating a strike for political ends, such as forcing the Government to withdraw from Russia. Direct action for political purposes is quite foreign to the spirit of the British people, as the promoters of it presently learned. The railway men, through their Secretary, J. H. Thomas, declared against the proposal; the transport workers did the same; the Lancashire miners also; so it was finally referred to the Trades Union Congress for decent burial. The second strike of the Yorkshire miners, too, which was really a failure, was another hard blow to Mr. Smillie, for it was an act of rebellion against both the Federation and the Government, and did much to alienate public sympathy and to show lines of cleavage in the once solid Triple Alliance. Finally, the miners' dogged insistence on nationalization without regard to the serious objections urged against it, or to the interests of the country at large, has made a bad impression and deepened the conviction that, sooner or later, the long-standing dispute between the miners and the general public must be fought to a finish.

Lloyd George, with the instinct of a born politician, must have nicely gauged the strength of the various factors in the situation or he would not have come out so strongly against nationalization as he did in his speech of August 18. Evidently he feels that the time for concession and retreat is past and the time has come to stand in his battle position, and, if possible, to advance. For in solemn truth the country is in a bad way. It has been living for five years on accumulated capital and on borrowed wealth, producing less than formerly and consuming more, and the time has come to call a halt if bankruptcy is to be averted. Since the year 1914 the annual output of coal has declined from 287,000,000 tons to 200,000,000; the "adverse" balance of trade has increased from $729,000,000 to $3,800,000,000; the public debt has increased from $3,100,000,000 to $37,900,000,000; and sterling exchange on New York has fallen from $4.86 to $4.20 and even lower. These and other facts indicate a serious state of affairs for which, as the Premier said, there is but one remedy:

We shall never improve matters until we increase production, or we shall be driven later to reduce even lower the standard of living in this country. There is no alternative except quitting the country for which we have fought for four years.

The application of such hard facts to the coal situation is obvious. Nothing must be done that will reduce the output of coal by a single ton, and the cost of production must, if possible, be cut down. By these tests nationalization stands condemned. Moreover, there is no assurance that the miners will not quarrel with the Government, as they did in the Yorkshire strike; so the argument upon which Justice Sankey rested his casting vote falls to the ground. The Government will buy out the owners of royalties, as recommended in the Report, but they will not nationalize the mines at the present time. They will, however, proceed to unify and reorganize the mines by districts, giving the miners representation on the advisory bodies and the district directorates—much as outlined in the minority report of Sir Arthur Duckham. Everything possible will be done in the way of improving housing and other living conditions; and of course all efforts will be made to restore harmony between the mine owners and the miners, to reduce the cost of production and to increase the output.

Without doubt the miners will be furious at the miscarriage of their plan. And yet they have no just cause for complaint, as the question of nationalization is one that concerns not themselves alone but the whole British people. They may call a strike, but if they do, it will not be an ordinary legal strike for their own benefit, but a political strike designed to force upon the Government a policy which the country has not approved—the very sort of direct action which their own allies so lately condemned. That the British people will submit to anything so revolutionary is not at all likely, and the miners will be well advised if they do not force the issue.

Accounting for Caporetto

GREAT military disasters are seldom fully explained. The beaten army or nation prefers to let a bad matter alone. But Italy, with Latin lucidity, decided to probe the catastrophe of Caporetto to the bottom, and has begun with a court of inquiry which finds General Cadorna and two of his generals responsible. The next step should be a court martial. These measures seem harsh, but they should be judged in view of what actually happened.

Early in the autumn of 1917 the Austrians and Germans located a morally rotten spot on the Italian front. Strikers from the northern industrial cities had been sent to what was regarded as the quiet sector of Caporetto. Soon they demoralized the discipline of certain regiments. Insubordination became the rule, Socialist and pacifist agitation a regular camp activity. Upon these disaffected units of the Second Army the Teuton worked by direct propaganda and by deceit. Forged editions of famous Italian journals were circulated with disheartening news of the war, and statements that peace had been declared. The war-weary shopmen and peasants were made to feel that they were fighting alone while more prudent nations had withdrawn from a hopeless struggle. The Russian revolution was dangled before them as the earnest of a new order in which the plain people should rule. Meanwhile came tidings of increasing hunger from the families at home. So when the Germans struck, on October 24, whole regiments surrendered without firing a shot, others fled, and in a day the position was pierced to a depth of over twenty miles on a front of nearly forty. Such was what the Italians appropriately call "the treason of Caporetto."

As the whole front was turned back, the retreats sometimes amounted to thirty miles a day. The artillery was sacrificed. The traffic management, which had always been bad in the Italian army, became null. Under these conditions panic infected much of the Second Army. It was stricken from the rolls after certain regiments had been paraded in the great cities with arm-bands reading "Traitor to the fatherland"—Traditore alla Patria. It had suffered undeserved ignominy for the baseness of a few of its units. How the battered armies at Asiago and the Piave thrust back the Huns and saved a breathing space for recuperation is one of the proudest chapters of Italian military history.

Caporetto, it will be seen, means two quite different things—the initial breakthrough, made possible by treason, and the subsequent retreat. Only the first could fairly be made the subject of a Court of Inquiry. Here the responsibility of General Cadorna seems unquestionable. It is a hard but a necessary dispensation that a commander-in-chief is held for complete knowledge of the condition of his command and for all acts of his subordinates. Evidently the Italian high command either was ignorant of the wretched morale behind Monte Nero or failed to act on information received. General Cadorna could not reasonably be expected to know that too many strikers had been assigned to a single sector. That was a detail of staff management. But once demoralization set in, the commander-in-chief should have detected it and dealt sharply with it. It may be admitted that it was very difficult for the company and regimental officers involved to report the rottenness of their commands. Whatever error of suppression they committed, however, most of them paid promptly with their lives. Again, it was the General's duty to make the report or to get the information through the secret service. Defective information explains many military failures but excuses very few. It is assumed that every commander's information about his own force is complete. Presumably some sort of punishment will be inflicted upon General Cadorna, but it is doubtful if any penalty can exceed the horror of seeing the positions gained through months of heroic fighting lost shamefully in a couple of days.

While the military responsibility for the breakthrough seems clear, in a larger sense Caporetto should be charged to the ignorance of the Italian peasant, to the fanaticism and treachery of the Italian Socialists, to the plotting of the Clericals, to the agitation of the pro-German defeatists of Giolittian stamp, and above all to that Campanilism which prevented in all but elect spirits any vision of Italy as a whole. Caporetto was an eye-opener. The Italians saw the price of humoring traitors, of indulging small politics and local squabbles in the face of the enemy. The work of military and moral reintegration was miraculous. From the shame of Caporetto Italy issued for the first time really a nation. That fact will seem important to historians long after the narrower responsibility for the crumbling of the Italian front shall have become a catch question for minute military examiners.

The Shortened Working Day

THE problem of the proper length of the working day has three aspects which must be clearly distinguished in any discussion of it, but which are generally confused or ignored in current discussion. It is, in the first place, a question of wage adjustment, in which considerations of fatigue, output, leisure, etc., are secondary to the question of the method of calculating wages. The Federal Eight-Hour Law, as amended to apply to war work, the Adamson Law, and any legislation for a basic eight-hour day are measures of this character. They aim to regulate rates of wages rather than to limit hours. They affect hours of labor only so far as they penalize overtime by higher rates, and in practice it has been found that their effect in this regard is the reverse. Measures shortening the basic day have been found not only to increase the amount of overtime worked by regular workers, but to increase the amount of absenteeism during regular hours, for with premium overtime rates workers can earn their usual wages in shorter time and are thus more inclined to "lay off."

A study of 20,000 shipyard workers in San Francisco during April, 1918, showed that for a group of over 3,600 workmen employed at a wage of $5.80 a day working under the basic eight-hour day, overtime constituted 11.8 per cent. of the total hours worked. These workers lost so much regular time that, even when their overtime was taken into account they were still 19.4 per cent. behind the full time which continuous work for the regular eight-hour period each day would have yielded. By working at double rates an amount of overtime equal to about one-half of the total regular time lost, these workmen earned 99 per cent. of the wages they would have received for regular full-time work.

Wage measures which establish a basic length of work-week are more likely to operate effectually to limit working hours, since overtime rates become operative usually only after the full weekly working period has been worked, and overtime is thereby largely robbed of its premium advantage. Wage adjustments under the guise of changes in the nominal working schedule are favored by organized labor, which has consistently, as at the conventions of the American Federation of Labor in 1914 and 1915, defeated resolutions favoring the enforcement of a straight eight-hour day by law, and have opposed other such measures for hour limitation except in the case of women and children.

The problem of working hours is in the second place a question of industrial efficiency, and in the third place a question of social values. It is obvious that these are really the pertinent issues. Wage adjustments can be made on their own merits, whether by force or by arbitration, quite independently of working schedules, and are being so made. But the proper length of the work-day or work-week is inseparably bound up with the effectiveness of the working industrial plant of a country and with the health, morale, social life and tone of the workers. The first adjustment is primarily a matter of relative bargaining power; but the adjustment in respect of industrial efficiency and social values calls for intensive and extensive investigations of the effects of various working schedules on output, organization and costs, and on the health and lives of the workers, of which we have as yet had very little.

What we have, however, makes it abundantly clear that there is not likely to be any answer of absolute, final, and general application, and that the proper length of the working day is as yet an unknown quantity in a series of complex social equations, a variable dependent upon many other variables such as the character of the industry, the organization of the plant, the nature of the special process in which the worker is engaged, market conditions, working conditions, speed of machinery, wage rates and systems, labor training, mechanical development, etc. The requisite knowledge has as yet been furnished for only a small portion of a few scattered industries.

The reports of the Health of Munitions Workers Committee, and of similar British Government agencies, resulting from investigations undertaken in 1915 to determine the relation between the length of work-day and the health and output of war workers, is, for example, extremely suggestive. Under stimulus of the war, laws and customs governing hours of work in British munition factories were generally abrogated. The work-week was lengthened until 80, 90, and even 100 hours became common. There was widespread discontent among the workers, evidence of excessive fatigue, and, what was most serious at the time, a continued shortage of product. These investigations were undertaken by the British Ministry of Munitions chiefly to see if the latter situation could not be remedied.

These reports definitely indicate that exceptionally long work schedules are uneconomic. Output from 70 or more actual hours of work per week was, in almost every case, less than that subsequently obtained under much shorter hours. For certain heavy labor by men, involving considerable hand work, the reports show that maximum output was secured from about 51 hours per week.

For certain moderately heavy labor, performed by women, they show that maximum output was secured from about 55 actual hours per week, and they indicate that somewhat shorter hours would have yielded equal production. For certain lighter work, chiefly of the machine type, performed by women, they show that 55 actual hours per week maintained maximum output. For still lighter machine work, performed by boys, they show that with 55 actual hours of work per week, output was about 4 per cent. less than the maximum obtained in 69 hours, and that a further reduction in hours involved a marked loss.

The value of these studies lies in broad suggestions rather than quantitative result. They indicate that reduction in work-hours within certain limits does not necessarily decrease output, but on the contrary may, for some classes of labor, actually increase it. But they can not be regarded as establishing the precise number of hours in which maximum product may be secured. Before even approximate conclusions on this point can be arrived at, it is essential to have a much broader basis of observation under normal conditions.

It must be remembered that these reports deal with actual hours, not with nominal hours which were the factory's official schedule. The nominal hours were much longer than the actual hours and there was no constant relationship between them, for they included varying absences, tardinesses, and minor interruptions of work. Furthermore, the investigations deal with war industries under war conditions and with British working conditions. Patriotism may have exerted an important influence, as may the high rate of wages. The reductions in hours which took place were made largely through the abolition of Sunday labor, and such labor and long-continued excessive hours may have resulted in an abnormally low rate of production at the time the studies commenced. Furthermore, output during the early course of the studies may have been deliberately cut down by the restrictive rules and customs universal in British industry before the war, and it is impossible to tell how much the individual efficiency of the worker was increased by the change from the closed shop to the open shop during this period.

For these and other reasons it is impossible to take more than the broadest hints from these investigations for American industries. To say, as has been said, that they prove that an eight-hour day is more productive than a longer one is not justified. The merits of an eight-hour day are really not discussed in the reports, but in practically every instance when actual hours of work per week fell below 48 (the latter being, of course, considerably in excess of the actual hours to be expected under a nominal 48-hour week) a significant loss in output is indicated. But the evidence on this subject in the reports is too meagre to warrant conclusions. Practically all the British reports, however, emphasize the importance of rest periods within the work-day, and considerable evidence is presented to show that, by checking fatigue, rest periods may increase total output.

The more recent investigations of the relation of hours of work to output and health conducted by the National Industrial Conference Board in several American industries are more timely and more to the point, although their conclusions are still far from positive. These investigations cover 126 establishments employing 47 per cent. of the total number of wool-mill workers in the United States, 85 of which had reduced hours in recent years; 166 establishments making standard cotton products; 84 establishments employing 32 per cent. of all the silk mill workers in the United States, and 138 boot and shoe manufacturing establishments.

These investigations point clearly to the varying effects of reduction of hours on output in the various industries, according to the nature of the processes involved in them and also according to the character of the labor employed and the system of wage payment. Reductions in hours in the Northern cotton mills from 58 or 56 to 55 or 54 have in a great majority of cases resulted in an approximately proportional decrease in output. Such data as are available for Southern mills indicate that hours in excess of 60 per week do not necessarily yield a materially larger output than 60 hours, while reductions below a 60-hour schedule, on the other hand, usually resulted in substantial decreases in output. In the wool-manufacturing industry the adoption of a 54-hour schedule in a large majority of cases involved a loss in output, strikingly in the more modern and larger mills; but taking the industry as a whole this loss has not resulted in a heavy burden upon production. In the silk industry experience with a 50-hour week has in a great majority of instances shown a loss in output, and the point of maximum production lies somewhere between 50 and 54 hours per week. This is also true of the boot and shoe industry, though there is evidence that there is an opportunity for a marked increase in efficiency of operation in this industry through the removal of arbitrary restriction, the more efficient routing of work and the regularization of nominal hours of work and of the work of piece-workers, which might permit as high a productivity on a 50-hour schedule as on a longer one.

In general the evidence of these reports is that in none of the industries covered could a 48-hour week be introduced without loss of productivity, and that this loss is greater in proportion as the processes involved are more continuous, mechanical, and automatic, requiring less of personal skill and attention on the part of the worker. They show, too, that the location, mechanical organization, unionization, wage-customs, and modernity of the plant are factors that strongly affect the loss or maintenance of production under change of hours. So far as these four basic industries are concerned, these reports point clearly to the necessity of some radical reorganization of method such as a six or eight-hour shift system, or some new development of manufacturing process, or to some compensating readjustment of price and demand, if the work-period is to be arbitrarily reduced generally, in response to arbitrary demand or to social consideration of the health and leisure of the worker.

It should be noticed in this connection that innovations like Lord Leverhulme's are primarily of the nature of reorganization of method and manufacturing process rather than sheer reductions of hours, and apply only to those industries in which the manufacturing process and the conditions of market demand are continuous. In such industries continuity of production is of first importance. Any reorganization which achieves such steady production, and thus increases output and at the same time benefits the worker, is of maximum social value. In industries which have not this advantage, a work-week which will not maintain factory production at a maximum may nevertheless be justifiable on broad social grounds. The relation of reductions of the working-period to the health, leisure, and social conditions of the workers is a distinct question, upon which the reports throw little light and of which there has been practically no painstaking study. Yet it is important that there should be such study, since the demand is everywhere being made that production should be generally sacrificed on the ground of such considerations.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

In the Name of Liberty, Reaction

A MODERN Madam Roland, perusing an article by Mr. Norman Thomas in the August number of the World Tomorrow, could not but cry out, "O Liberty, what pleas are made in thy name!" Certain readers, it appears, have found fault with that periodical's habitual palliation of Bolshevist crime, enforced starvation, and suppression of speech, press, and assemblage. They are puzzled that a journal which so insistently professes to stand for civil liberty, tolerance, and absolute abstention from the use of force should find so much virtue in a usurping oligarchy which rejects the idea of civil liberty, which proclaims and consistently practises intolerance, and which ruthlessly exercises the most brutal forms of force in maintaining its hold. In bewilderment they ask, "Why?" The editor, therefore, feels called upon to explain.

No one should miss the explanation. Its chief merit is that it explains more than is intended. It shows (as has often been shown) that vehement denunciation of offenses wrongly imputed to one community or sect or nation may be attended by excuses equally vehement for the real and monstrous offenses to another. It illustrates anew how prone is the zealot's mind to blind itself to the most substantiated facts and to make terms of established meaning do a multiple duty in standing for anything it chooses to make them mean. It further illustrates the kernel of truth (for it is not all a truth) in old John Dryden's aphorism:

For priests of all religions are the same; and it gives evidence that the priest of a secular cult may go quite as far as one of a supernatural faith in justifying any means believed to contribute to a desired end.

First, he says, the western democracies are as bad as the Bolsheviks, and perhaps worse. "It seems increasingly clear," he proceeds, "that the atrocities and tyrannies of Bolshevik rule . . . are paralleled in the internal affairs of all the so-called western democracies. We are even inclined to think that if a disinterested jury could be empanelled, let us say from the planet Mars, Lenin might well afford to challenge Messrs. Wilson and Lloyd George to appear before it to argue whether there was not at least as much civil liberty, tolerance and fair play, and less hypocrisy in soviet Russia, surrounded by her foes, than in victorious England or America."

This comparison, be it noted, is written by the editor of an opposition newspaper in a land in which such newspapers flourish and wax fat, in praise of a régime under which opposition newspapers are, most of the time, wholly suppressed; by a citizen of a land in which civil liberty has long been established, in praise of a régime under which civil liberty is openly rejected as a mere "ideology" of the bourgeoisie; by a citizen of a land in which broad tolerance is the rule, however shameful the exceptions, in praise of a régime which rejected tolerance as a crime and which openly avows its primary purpose to be to "crush out opposition"; by a citizen of a land in which the jury system, for all its defects, everywhere prevails, in praise of a régime under which conviction is by star chamber and individual decree; by a citizen whose income, whatever it may be, is secure, in praise of a régime under which there is no security for any form of personal property. In brief, it is the expression of an individualist whose present environment gives him every freedom and security consistent with the freedom and security of others, in praise of a régime under which avowedly, as well as practically, the individual has no rights, and under which any assertion of rights means a prison cell or a firing squad. The comparison can not have been written in ignorance, since no testimony in any degree credible can have given warrant for such fabricated assumptions. Even the most fanatical pro-Bolsheviks have given over the pretense that any of these immunities and securities exist in soviet Russia; instead, they content themselves with the declaration that none of these things really matters—that the terms in which they are expressed are mere bourgeois "ideologies." The comparison can have been written only in contempt of the plain facts and in blind unconcern for the rendering of a just judgment.

But the argument from comparison isn't enough, says the editor; "after all, it is a sorry defense for a cause to prove that its foes are as bad or worse." And, therefore, the crowning argument is presented—that the end sought estops us from too close an inquiry as to the means. The Bolsheviks, it appears, are actually doing something for the world. First, "in an age when chauvinistic imperialism has reached its bloody apotheosis they have clung to an ideal of international solidarity." Second, they have reformed education and have made the treasures of art and music available to the people. Third, they have adopted the principle of occupational representation in government; and, fourth, they "are making an honest attempt to free men from the manifold slaveries of our profit system by organizing society for the benefit of producers rather than of investors."

Because of these "positive achievements" and these "honest attempts," the sins of the Bolsheviks, even though they be scarlet, are to be as snow. We must look lightly upon their derelictions. For there are derelictions, reluctantly as the fact is admitted. In the earlier part of the article they were even referred to as "atrocities and tyrannies." But that use of the terms was probably merely rhetorical, to set them off against the "atrocities and tyrannies" practised, for instance, in the United States of America. In the latter part of the article they become merely mistakes. "In this gigantic experiment," he says, "they [the Bolsheviks] have made mistakes which the rest of the world ought to avoid." A more benign and indulgent condemnation could hardly be voiced. But, despite their "mistakes," the Bolsheviks are to be acclaimed. "All Americans who keep their faith in Liberty [capital L] must hail their positive achievements as steps along the road to the ultimate emancipation of the human race."

That none of these "positive achievements" has been achieved could easily be shown were that the point at issue. On the one hand, the world is farther from chauvinistic imperialism to-day than it has ever before been, and, on the other hand, the profession of an ideal of "international solidarity" on the part of a régime which uses to the limit of its power armed force against every people that desires to separate from it is merely a hollow pretense. There may be, and doubtless is, a "new passion for education" in Russia; but Lunacharsky's imaginative recital of the reforms he boasts of having accomplished is not taken at par by any open-minded student of Russian affairs. The principle of occupational representation has indeed been proclaimed; but the practice, except in rare instances, as every one knows, has not been followed. And finally, if the Bolsheviks are really making an "honest attempt" towards "organizing society for the benefit of producers," they must be voted the most inept and impotent ruling class that ever bore sway. The net result of their endeavors has been to reduce production, both in the fields and in the factories, well along towards zero.

But whether or not these achievements have been scored, in whole or part, is a question that may here and now be waived. What matters is, that the assumption that they are real is used in palliation of Bolshevist repressions. A "Libertarian," with a supreme faith in liberty, tolerance, and pacifism as ends in themselves, excuses Bolshevist violations of liberty, Bolshevist intolerance of opposition, and Bolshevist use of armed force as things of small moment in comparison with the "positive achievements" of Bolshevist rule.

In the jazz and turmoil of a world shaken to its foundations by a gigantic war, Bolshevism has won multitudes of heterogeneous disciples. There is nothing strange in the fact that it draws to its support those who are indifferent to the rights and securities of individuals; who believe in the sole arbitrament of power; who believe in violent overturns, in the smashing and scrapping of all that the race has won in its long struggle upward. But it is strangeness past parallel that it should be lauded in the name of liberty, tolerance, and non-resistance—entities wholly absent from Bolshevik thought or practice. That it should be so lauded is but another evidence that the turmoil in social conditions is matched by the turmoil in social thought. New schools have arisen which vie with one another in the fostering of a belief in the preposterous. The reaction from the rationalism of Huxley and Tyndall is at full tide. We have everywhere the cult of neo-obscurantism, which, though it uses the forms and phrases of liberalism and progress, sets itself in passionate zealotry against the substance of liberal aims. In the name of inquiry it refuses to investigate or to accept the results of investigation; in the name of enlightenment it obscures the truth and darkens counsel, and in the name of reform or revolution it plays into the hands of social and political reaction. It is itself an insidious form of reaction, and it can not help but ally itself, in spite of its professions and protests, to the more open and evident forms. In the falsely appropriated name of the noblest aspirations and ideals of the world's prophets and teachers it lends its aid to throw us back to stages long passed by the better thought and conviction of the race.

W. J. GHENT

The Situation in the Mohammedan World

THE very stating of such a title as that above involves absurdities. Is there one situation? There are a dozen. Is there any clearly separate Mohammedan world which can be considered by itself? There is not. Everywhere, except in parts of Arabia, that world is enmeshed with other worlds and their respective actions and reactions are of the essence of the problem. There is only one certain statement which can be made of all the situations and of all the worlds in their complicated mutual relationships and that is that the long armistice and the protracted negotiations at Paris have permitted the golden moment to slip by when feelings were warm and hearts were open, when the sense of deliverance was high and of brotherhood was real, when ambitions, local, dynastic, or personal, were at least in the background and the great human realities making for a new sanity and understanding were clearly in view. For a time it seemed as though the world of Islam and those oriental worlds with which it is entangled were hot metal on the anvil, to be forged to shapes and uses of the world's desire and made a real part of the great machine of things. That, it is certain, has passed, and what is left is a strange confused jumble in which the old elements are only too plainly to be seen, though twisted by stresses and strains full of questions and even misgivings to those who know the old best. In this annus mirabilis new things are bound to come even in the unchanging East; but all orientalist are certain that however it changes in forms and formulæ, it will be the same in mass and substance; that the democracy of the People of Mohammed will mold even Bolshevism to its own image and find the possibility of soviets in the Constitution of Omar. They know, too, that little economic influences will have more abiding effects than armies, and that the ideas which are sure to rule will be different from those of the West, however much they may proclaim themselves the same.

But taking the Mohammedan world as much by itself as we can, all roads in it lead either to Constantinople or to Mecca, and the deepest of its problems centre in the relationship of those two. All that world in its talk to-day is expressing its sympathy or repulsion, confidence or distrust for the personalities ruling in the one or the other. At one time it seemed as though Constantinople and the Turks had hopelessly lost their hegemony among Moslems and that, wherever the centre of the Moslem world might in the future fall, it would not be found in the capital of the Ottoman Sultan. That was the time of the beginning of the great schism when the entire Arabic-speaking world southward and eastward from the line of the Taurus fell away in revolt, open or veiled, and when the non-Turkish Mohammedan world seemed in sympathy with the break. But old habits are hard to change and the glamor of a prestige of five hundred years can survive even shattering defeat; and so the figure of the Sultan-Caliph of the Ottomans who had reigned for centuries in the City of the Cæsars in a quasi-Headship of Islam is rising again before the imagination of the Moslem peoples. And with it returns the fatal and unhappy unity of these peoples as a power banded for undying warfare against all that is not Moslem—undying until the whole earth is reduced to the faith and obedience of Mohammed. The general Jihad, forced by German propaganda upon the Turks, failed for many fortunate reasons, but the unity which was its basis is rapidly being restored. The time of the Church-State has not yet gone by for the East, and our doctrinaire politicians may, among other indigestible facts, take that and its possibilities to heart.

Such is one, and a most unhappy tendency to unity. Those towards disruption and multiplicity within that unity are manifold. It will be simplest to begin with Arabia, the historical source of Islam and still the religious centre of Moslem life. At one time it seemed as though the revolt of the Sherif of Mecca against Turkish overlordship had swept into unity all Arabia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, the entire Arabic-speaking part of Asia. Fundamentally the revolt was one of Arab against Turk; an expression of century-old antagonism to an alien, intellectually despised yet heavy-handed conqueror. The immediate occasion was religious. The Turks, it is true, were fellow Moslems, but the ruling party among them, the Young Turk Committee of Union and Progress, had plainly thrown in their lot with unbelievers, and in speech and act had set themselves against essential Islam. So Arabia and its immediate confines rose, while Syria and Mesopotamia would have risen if they had dared. And everywhere little local causes and situations hastened or hindered the change. The first news of it all to reach us was that the Druses, not Bedawin but a war-like people of settled life, had abandoned their plains in Hauran and withdrawn to their inaccessible Mountain. There they remained to the end, holding out against the Turks and waiting for the coming, of which they had long dreamed, of their kinsfolk, the English in red coats. There will be more of them and of this dream hereafter. The revolt of Mecca and of Arabia in general followed, and the Turkish armies and garrisons scattered through it were either captured or hemmed in and besieged. An army in the Yemen and the garrison of Medina did not surrender until after the armistice. But Arabia was at once lost to the Turks. The fate that has ever befallen all alien invaders of that land of isolation befell them; they vanished in it or withdrew, shattered, from it.

But meanwhile, in Egypt, the Moslems there either could not—would not—believe in the revolt or they assailed the motives of the revolters. Since the British occupation they had not been under Turkish rule and they had forgotten what it meant. They were more Turkish than the Turks in their attitude, and it is plain that even in the recent revolt of March and April of this year they had not realized that the Turkish cause was lost. For them the King of the Hijaz, despite his undoubted descent from Mohammed and his official status at Mecca, the centre of the Faith, was—and is—a puppet monarch set up by the Allies and maintained by British gold. This, of course, is in part true; but true also are the spontaneity of the Arab revolt and the feeling of the Arabs against the Turks. In India the revolt seems to have been similarly discounted although the respect there for the Sultan of the Ottomans was more academic and an expression of a feeling of a need for a visible centre in the Moslem world.

In Arabia itself, apart from the Yemen which was held more or less by a Turkish army, there were, and are, four elements of which account must be taken. There is the Hijaz, the Holy Land of Moslems, the Land of Pilgrimage, with its two sacred cities, Mecca and Medina, the one the City of Allah, where is the House of Allah, the Ka'ba, and the other the City of the Prophet where he lies buried. These with their surrounding territory are now controlled by a descendant of the Prophet, of a family—that of Qatada—which has been prominent there for some seven hundred years. That may seem to us a respectable antiquity but other families of the blood of the Prophet regard them as upstarts and criticize the Sherif who has now taken the title of King of the Hijaz, as a climber. Kingship, it is true, is alien to the nature of the Arab tribe, an individualistic democracy swayed only by the influence of respected families and individual chiefs. It is often said that this "King" has taken the further dignity of Caliph. That, so far, is not the case. He was very slow, even, to throw off all allegiance to the Ottoman Sultan, asserting that that Sultan was not responsible for the actions of the Young Turks who had usurped the Government at Constantinople. Now, however, he is an independent sovereign professing to rule in a constitutional manner over a part of Arabia. Poets, singing his praises, may call him "King of the Arabs," but he has claimed no such title himself and the rest of Arabia will at most accept him as primus inter pares. It is hard to see, too, how he could constitutionally himself assume the title of Caliph. That must come to him, if at all, as a free gift from the democracy of Islam electing him to that office, and the validity of his tenure would depend on the width of the electorate professing to represent that democracy. It is in his favor that he controls the Land of Pilgrimage and thus may extend his influence through the whole Moslem world. If that control is just and beneficent the pilgrims will return, full of his praises, and he will gain prestige even to the point, it may be, of being regarded as the visible head and centre of that world. But, on the other hand, he must overcome the reputation of being a climber and of being "kept" by the British. And this leaves out of account the evidently, if strangely, recovering prestige of the Sultan-Caliph of the Ottomans.

A second element in Arabia consists of the little states along the shores of the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean, Kuwait, Bahreyn, Oman, etc., down to the hinterland of Aden, the so-called Trucial Chiefs, relationship with which can be regarded as the oldest element in the British Empire as it goes back to the days of Elizabeth. Contact between these and the Government of India has always been close and they can be regarded as practically British protectorates. With the Hijaz the British connection is rather through Egypt, and just as there were the two Expeditionary Forces, Egyptian and Indian, in Syria and in Mesopotamia, so there are already signs of cleavage in diplomatic influence and policy between India and Egypt. India is under one Secretary of State and Egypt under another and their emissaries may meet and even clash in Arabia, just as in the early part of last century John Company and Great Britain sent rival embassies to Persia. But, whatever may come, the outlook of these states is eastward across the sea to Persia, India, and the lands beyond. Their sons have wandered far in these seas and lands for centuries and centuries; the teller of the story of Sinbad the Sailor, voyaging from al-Basra through uncharted ways, was but an oriental Hakluyt working behind a thin veil of romance.

The other two elements in Arabia are strictly Arab in the narrowest sense and have dominated the politics of Central Arabia for almost a century. One of these is the dynasty of the Ibn Rashids at Hayil and the other that of Ibn Sa'ud at Riyad. The first is an Arab court of the desert, probably liker to the Omayyad court of the old days at Damascus than anything else which yet survives; it took the part of the Turks and in consequence, for the time, but for the time only, is negligible. The other is the surviving representative of the Wahhabite power of a century ago, which for a time threatened to spread from Egypt to India and to found again a great and militant Moslem empire. At present Ibn Sa'ud is the rival in Arabia of the King of the Hijaz. He is not so astute a politician; he has not known how to change and rise with the times; but he is a far more sincere Moslem and holds the respect in a higher degree of the sincere Moslems of Arabia. But he is handicapped by the sincerity of his religious principles and by the memory of the Wahhabite rule, to which Moslems look back, much as did the English to Cromwell's Protectorate, with a feeling of never again. Yet there can be little question that in his desert capital he is drawing around him the Bedawi tribes and trying to make them more thorough Moslems and a weapon fit for his hand. He is, apparently, using for this the old method of Fraternities, perhaps linking up with that of the Senusites, but on all this our information is still too scanty and uncertain. It may even seem strange that so much attention should be paid to a little town buried in Arabian deserts, but Ibn Sa'ud is the one rival in sight to the King of the Hijaz and there are signs that Indian Moslems think more highly of him. In consequence, emissaries from the British Indian Government have visited Riyad, journeying from the Persian Gulf. It is not well that any one man, especially the ruler of Mecca, should feel himself too indispensable, but, on the other hand, to play with Wahhabism is to be on terms with the most intransigent form of Islam and may call for a very long spoon.

But the Arab problem is only the other side of the Syrian and the Mesopotamian problem. All these populations call themselves Arabs in a sense; they all speak Arabic and serve themselves as heirs on the entire Arabic past. But this does not mean that they are Bedawin, Arabs of the desert; or even that they are all Moslems. The Syrians are intensely jealous for their old Syrian civilization, reaching back, they maintain, to Phoenician times. Damascus has its memories and historical ambitions, expressed in 1913 at a Congress in Paris; Aleppo has its different memories linking up with the Kurdish Ayyubids and Saladin. Over the population of Palestine, Christian and Moslem, the fear of Zionism has fallen—and lies; to them it is the coming of Jewish capitalists to seize their sacred places and exploit their peasantry. Plainly, only a scheme of the loosest confederation would meet such a conglomerate of cases, but equally plainly there had to be some centralization.

For that, political exigencies pointed to Mecca and the Kingdom of the Hijaz was created with one of the great Sherif families as its ruling house. This purely Arab state was to be—one dare not say, is to be—flanked by a British Protectorate in Mesopotamia and a French one in Syria; the Zionist problem in Palestine was to be treated separately. Decentralization was, if necessity, to characterize the government and there were to be, besides, separate autonomies as the Lebanon and Kerbelanejef. Such, at least, was the scheme worked out on the British side by Sir Mark Sykes and carried through as far as the sovereign state of the Hijaz was concerned. It was expressed in the proclamations of General Maude on his entrance to Bagdad and of General Allenby on his entrance to Jerusalem. But it is plain that such a scheme required thorough understanding and good feeling between the confederated elements. That might have been possible in the early days of the conquest when the feeling of deliverance was strong and fostered sentiments of brotherhood and mutual tolerance. But as time dragged on there reappeared in full force the old sectional jealousies, the fear of each others' ambitions, the personal rivalries, the fickleness to purposes, the inability to form enduring political structures, which have characterized the Arab race as long as history has known it. Six centuries ago Ibn Khaldun, the first philosophical historian, observed that nothing has ever united the Arabs except the personal influence of a prophet, and Disraeli in his novel "Tancred" has given a striking and thoroughly true picture of this temperament in the person of Fakhredeen. Characteristic, too, of this temperament is a tendency to assert that its views are those of all Syrians.

One fundamental split was, as always, that between the Bedawin, more or less nomad Arabs of the desert and its oases, and the settled races of the fertile soil, peasants, farmers, merchants, manufacturers. The troops of the King of the Hijaz in Damascus might well send shudders of apprehension through that city population, for the desert has looked forward to plundering it for hundreds of years. Even the Druses, a heavy-handed people accustomed to hold their own and thinking themselves kinsfolk of the English, swung away from them at what they saw of favor to the Bedawin. Further north in the old Kurdish capital Aleppo the Kurdish-Armenian strife flared up again in massacre. Further north still in Asia Minor the railway lines and the principal centres are being held, but we know little about what is happening off them. The most cheering news is that General Allenby has been put in command of all the Allied troops there and it is certain that the British will need to remain in force north of Mosul in the mountains. There the Turks and Tartars combined are hoping to take control again. For all this the delay at Paris is largely responsible; uncertainty leads to unrest, and both have done their work. The recent attempt to shoulder off responsibility on the Senate is, of course, absurd; the mischief was done months ago and is now becoming evident. The recent speech by Lloyd George, too, has made plain that the British Government was led by the President to believe that the United States would accept a mandate for the new Armenia. But the people of the United States do not seem to regard the matter in the same way. In Palestine the situation produced by Zionist hopes and British encouragement of them is equally tense if outwardly more peaceful. The non-Jewish population, both Moslem and Christian, has united to form anti-Jewish committees, and "pogroms" are now in order. On that point, at least, Syria is as one. It does not mean to be exploited by the capitalists of a race which lost all historic sovereignty nearly two thousand years ago. And the Syrians, claiming to be the heirs of the Canaanites, and still holding the land, are prepared to take up the war again against Joshua and the invading Bedawi tribes of Hebrews. Thus history comes round after more than three thousand years.

So much for the situation, moving from Mecca out. What of Constantinople? For the Turks themselves Constantinople is a foreign city; they have always rightly recognized that Asia Minor rather was their home and they would probably move to Brusa or Konia with no great shock to their national feeling. But it is different with the wider Moslem world and more different the farther away that world stretches. For India, especially, much of the magical glamour which surrounds the figure of the Sultan-Caliph of the Ottomans is because he rules there at Stambul. Far away, shadowy, half-mythical, he is for them a dim uniting figure in all their divisions, political and religious. Heretics and schismatics, sects cast out and refused recognition by historical Islam itself, all feel that he speaks the oneness of their world. This, apparently, is the explanation of the sudden upflaring of Indian Moslems against the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire and especially against its expulsion from Constantinople. This, too, is the explanation of whatever hesitation has showed itself in Great Britain towards the "bag and baggage" policy. Cynical theories about the Turkish debt may be discounted; as also that there is a hopeless pro-Turkish prejudice in the British official mind. The feelings of a population which runs into hundreds of millions must be considered. Yet it must also be considered that in a Moslem state, under Moslem law, no non-Moslem can have the rights of a citizen. He may be protected; he can not be on an equality. If a Moslem state abandons this position it forfeits the support of all true Moslems.

But far more dangerous is a theory of Islam openly propounded by the spokesmen of these inarticulate millions and made the basis of their claims. It is that the Caliph has been and is a spiritual head, a Pope, and that the separate secular governments should recognize his spiritual headship and rule over their Moslem subjects. When this is urged by Moslems it can only be in conscious reliance on the ignorance of the non-Moslem governments to which they address it. All educated Moslems know that the Caliph has always been simply an executive, the administrator of Islam as it exists. He can not state doctrine or law; he can not even interpret them. He is, in legal term, a "corporation sole" for all the machinery of Moslem government. The agreement of the Moslem people provides him with the law which he must administer and he has no part in reaching that agreement except as an individual Moslem. Any government, then, which recognizes him, recognizes a super-state, a foreign sovereign who has been yielded the right to administer a separate and complete system of law in territory which is not his own. Against this kind of Pope English sovereigns had to pass statutes of premunire. That he can be or become a spiritual Pope is rendered absurd by the fundamental fact that Islam yields to no one spiritual authority over another; that a class of priests in Islam is an impossibility. All this is the merest commonplace among the constitutional lawyers of Islam and any one who denies it is relying on the ignorance of his audience.

Of farther-lying Islam it is hard at present to say anything. What have Bochara and Samarcand done with and to the Bolsheviks? We may guess that the old Emirs are back in power. Afghanistan is evidently passing through a dynastic revolution under external stimuli, which makes it for the time a most uneasy and unpleasant neighbor. From the Moslems of China we hear nothing. Persia has kept on protesting its neutrality, but its fate will be intimately connected with Mesopotamia and India. At present it is pretty thoroughly policed. What new thing Africa will send forth no one can tell. The Senusites have had their lesson but Lake Chad guards its secrets and the desert of Jupiter Ammon suggests oracular style. It is certain that everywhere men are awake and alert; that the unrest is general, but its forms multitudinous; and that if Pan-Islam is to have again a meaning it will be one entirely different from any it has had in the past. The hope of the future in the East as in the West is in the growth of national attitudes which respect, understand, and support one another.

D. B. MACDONALD

Romain Rolland's Return to Fiction

IT is with mixed feelings that many readers will learn of the appearance of a new book by Romain Rolland. Hostility towards Rolland has been very strong of late. The war had hardly begun when people took to speaking of Romain Rolland et sa bande, and only yesterday his name appeared in the unflattering title: M. Romain Rolland, l'initiateur du Défaitisme.

So strong, indeed, is this feeling that we are tempted to see in it an explanation of the fact that, though his "Colas Breugnon" was ready to appear five years ago, the publishers have only recently seen fit to put it on the market.

That Rolland the man, as distinguished from the author, has deserved this obloquy, there can be no doubt. One must of necessity associate "Au dessus de la Mêlée" with Rolland's retreat to Switzerland, and this retreat itself with the dire need of France at the moment and the evident justice of her cause. Rolland was too old or too young, either too prominent or too obscure, to take with impunity the stand he did during the war. Only a sage supported by the thought and observation of a long lifetime and corroborated, in his general tenets, at least, by the approval of thousands, could be forgiven for that complacency which permitted Rolland to cut himself off from the physical suffering and the moral anguish of his fellow-countrymen, to assume, far from the scene of torment, the rôle of a detached seer preaching wisdom to a world distraught; and only a stripling, misguided by the generous inexperience of his years and enjoying the privileges of irresponsibility, could be excused for setting such an example as he of inopportune-ness: the value of ideas, even of noble ideas, is contingent upon the circumstances of their expression, and the utterances of Rolland at a moment when his country needed, not vague preaching, but the whole-hearted support of all her sons, was as poison in the veins of France as she fought for a lofty ideal.

Rolland's new novel, "Colas Breugnon," can offend no one: it has no connection with the inspiration of "Jean-Christophe"; and if anything is needed to reconcile us with its author, nothing could be more effective than the seven or eight hours of delight which it affords. This is a good book, strong, healthy, well written (in my opinion, though many will think otherwise), and bearing the stamp of a quality not far removed from genius. It is without doubt one of the best novels that have come out of France in the last twelve-month.

"Colas Breugnon" is unlike Rolland's previous books. The author's own explanation of the fact is not without interest to those who are occupied with the gens irritabilis vatium. For all their preoccupations, novelists as a class are, it appears, not so different from the rest of us, after all. They, too, require relaxation and yield at times to the pressure of instincts much like our own. Have we not read recently the following most gratifying confession by Paul Margueritte? "Si différente qu'elle semble de ma manière, cette médiocre nouvelle, l'Abdication, répond au goût d'aventure qui m'a fait écrire depuis . . . trois grands romans d'action." Much the same spirit appears in the Avertissement au lecteur of "Colas Breugnon": "Les lecteurs de Jean-Christophe ne s'attendent sûrement point à ce livre nouveau. Il ne les surprendra pas plus que moi. . . . Cette œuvre insouciance . . . est une réaction contre la contrainte de dix ans dans l'armure de Jean-Christophe qui, d'abord faite à ma mesure, avait fini par me devenir trop étroite. J'ai senti un besoin invincible de libre gaieté gauloise, oui, jusqu'à l'irrévérence. En même temps, un retour au sol natal . . . a réveillé en moi un passé que je croyais endormi pour toujours, tous les Colas Breugnon que je porte en ma peau. Il m'a fallu parler pour eux. Ces sacrés bavards n'avaient pas encore assez parlé, de leur vivant!"

This passage sets the tone for the whole volume. Colas Breugnon, its hero, is what the French would call un fameux original. From first to last, he fascinates us by the display of an amusing and aggressive personality in which are successfully fused very different elements. Strange as it may seem, Rip van Winkle, Cellini, frère Jean des Entommeures, he reminds us vaguely of all three, this crony of the trees and the birds (Guillaume the finch, Marie Godrée the robin, and la grise Sylvie the warbler); this wood-carver loving his art "de la bonne manière, voluptueusement, de l'esprit et des membres"; this physical exuberant whose gastronomic enthusiasm before a full bottle or a well-laden board is equaled only by the joy of his muscles when dealing mighty blows.

Life in its totality, teeming and varied, justified and glorious because of its appeal to all our faculties, animal, æsthetic, and intellectual, this is Breugnon's delight. He has the vigor and the curiosity of the wide-eyed civilization of the Renaissance; and it is fitting that Rolland should describe him sitting at the head of the table surrounded by his numerous progeny, in a passage recalling the canvas of some full-blooded painter of the sixteenth century: "Ce soir, nous sommes à table, tous mes enfants et les enfants de mes enfants. Cela fait trente, en me comptant. Et tous les trente crient ensemble: Le roi boit! Le roi, c'est moi. J'ai la couronne, sur mon chef un moule à pâté. Et ma reine est Martine: comme dans les Saints Livres, j'ai épousé ma fille. Chaque fois que je porte à ma bouche mon verre, on m'acclame, je ris, j'avale de travers; mais de travers ou non, j'avale et n'en perds rien. Ma reine boit aussi et, gorge nue, fait boire à son rouge teton son rouge nourrisson, mon dernier petit-fils, brillant, buvant, bavant, et étalant son cul. Et le chien sous la table jappe et lape la jatte. Et le chat, en grondant et faisant le gros dos, se sauve avec un os."

Breugnon's character is shot through, as the above quotations show, with an irrepressible and spontaneous vitality, the pressure of rich blood and of an easily kindled imagination which might be expected to make their possessor blind to the hard realities of life. This suggestion is further developed by the peculiar cadences and occasional rhymes appearing in Rolland's prose. Yet it should be noted that not a little of our interest in Breugnon is due to a canny shrewdness underlying this exuberance. With what evident satisfaction, after a season of merrymaking at an inn, he remarks: "En trois petites heures eh! j'avais récolté, avec deux bons diners et de gais souvenirs, une commande du notaire pour deux bahuts qu'il me fait faire!"

The fact is that this flaneur, artist, and bon vivant is after all essentially a bourgeois. He has not only the bourgeois's keen eye for business, but also his eye for the secret motives animating those about him, his appreciation of the practical and the impractical, and his jealousy of his independence. Thus, though his exuberance is often a mere vent for his good spirits, it is often also a shield to protect him from the consequences of a very personal philosophy, an impatience of authority and a fundamental irreverence. In a passage on the typical Frenchman's exhilaration as true as it is amusing, he explains: "Ma fantaisie s'égayé et donne le spectacle à ma raison qui la regarde, assise confortablement. . . . J'ai pour théâtre l'univers . . . je crie bis à ces gens qui se cassent la tête. C'est pour notre plaisir! Afin de le doubler, je feins de me mêler à la farce et d'y croire. Mais je n'ai garde, ohé! J'en crois tout juste ce qu'il faut pour m'amuser. C'est ainsi que j'écoute les contes de fées . . . Pas seulement de fées! Il est un gros monsieur, là-haut, dans l'Empyrée . . . nous le respectons fort . . . Mais entre nous . . . Bavard, mange ta langue! Cela sent le fagot . . . Seigneur, je n'ai rien dit! Je vous tire mon chapeau."

Such then is Rolland's hero, one who charms us by the effervescence of healthy instincts which the exigencies of our modern life have chilled to stagnation; and it is in a setting well suited to the expression of these instincts that Rolland has put this hero: he makes him a citizen of Clamecy in the days when France was ruled by Marie de Medici as regent and by her favorite Concini, "la vermine que la grosse dondon de Florence, la reine, apporta dans ses jupons." Breugnon philosophizes cheerily upon the havoc wrought in the wine cellars and among the women folk by the passage of troops whose duty it was, on the contrary, to protect the body and to safeguard property. He throws himself lustily into the festivities on the eve of Lent—the eating and drinking, the quarreling and dancing, the picturesque processions with their costumes, their banners, and their floats. He fights with a mighty arm and with a no less redoubtable tongue in the half-serious, half-mock battles between the Clamecycois and the men of a neighboring town. And when the great curse of those days, the pest, comes to Clamecy, he, too, is stricken down, only to rise again, however, with a vigor such that he becomes the leader of his more timid townsmen as they wreak a fearful vengeance on marauding bands who, like the diables pilleurs et meurtriers of Rabelais, are taking everything in the town except—the pest!

It is in Rolland's treatment of this setting that we find the most evident traces of a thoroughly modern, one might say contemporaneous, art. He introduces us, to be sure, to the vicissitudes of an age in which all the little amenities of the Litany, plague, pestilence, and famine, battle, murder, and sudden death, added zest to human existence. But he makes no attempt at an historic reconstruction. It is possible to read many pages of "Colas Breugnon" without becoming aware of any particular localization, temporal localization, of the story. Differing in this from the novelists of a slightly older school, Rolland has not weighed down his account with material details based upon a presumably scientific study of his period, the early years of the seventeenth century. His is not the preoccupation of the writer of an historic novel: he is interested merely in an atmosphere or attitude, caring little for its provenience or its date; or rather, far from seeking to isolate this atmosphere within the limits of the past, he invites us to assimilate it to the present. And this peculiarity, one of the most interesting features of the book, brings us back once more to what was said of the diversity of elements contained in the character of Breugnon.

Here, too, we notice the same peculiarity. I spoke of a vague resemblance to Rip van Winkle, Cellini, and frère Jean des Entommeures. A little reflection would no doubt suggest better parallels (with the exception of the last, there is undoubtedly an influence of Rabelais in the portrayal of both the character and the incidents given by Rolland). The one thing to note is the association in the character of Breugnon of two very different attitudes, that of the Renaissance and that of a civilization much nearer our own. Passing lightly over everything that might label this hero as belonging exclusively to any particular age, Rolland has fused the past with the present; and it is in this fusion that lies what is perhaps the real æsthetic originality of his novel, and what is certainly the source of some of its most delightful pages.

Gently and discreetly, so delicately shaded as to avoid the cacophony of too sharp a contrast, there sounds throughout this book, amid themes and moods of three hundred years ago, a melody or bit of harmony belonging only to the nineteenth, or even to the twentieth century. For, in addition to the incidents of plot and the traits of character on which I have dwelt already, there appear others of a different nature, containing a suggestion, for instance, of the romantic surrender to nature or of that pervading pity that made Daudet once say: "J'aurais pu me faire marchand de bonheur."

The very skill with which this fusion is accomplished, makes it impossible of adequate illustration here; but the sensitive reader will not fail to discern it, and to his particular attention I recommend the chapter devoted to la Belette. This whole chapter is full of a remarkable charm; it contains one passage which I quote because it seems to me typical of the art of the book as a whole. After thirty-five years Breugnon has seen again la Belette, the woman he had loved and lost in his youth. Their interview has been anything but romantic: neither has lost the pride and independence of former days. Nevertheless, when Breugnon is on his way home, when he is alone, surrounded by the trees and birds which he loves with such picturesque familiarity, he is overtaken by memories of a beautiful evening spent years before with this same Belette:

Alors monta des vignes, sur lesquels la nuit de printemps s'était posée, la voix du rossignol. Pour ne pas s'endormir sur les ceps dont les vrilles traîtresses s'allongeaient, s'allongeaient, s'allongeaient, autour de ses petons à s'enrouler cherchaient, pour ne pas s'endormir chantait à perdre haleine sa vieille cantilène le rossignol d'amour:

"La vign' pouss' pouss' pouss' Je n'dors ni nuit ni jour . . ."

Et je sentis la main de Belette qui disait: "Je te prends et je suis prise. Vigne, pousse, pousse et nous lie!"

Nous descendîmes la colline. Près de rentrer, nous nous déprimés. Depuis lors, plus ne nous primes. Ah! rossignol, tu chantes toujours. Pour qui ton chant?

Vigne, tu pousses. Pour qui tes liens, amour?

It is impossible to read these lines without feeling their beauty. Their expression and lilt are reminiscent of the earliest European lyric. No one, however, would take them for a genuine product of the Middle Ages. They are a modern creation based on an old popular love song. And it is with the whole of Rolland's new book as it is with this passage. In content as in style (I have already pointed out the peculiarity of his prose), Rolland has so fused choice inspirations of the past and the present as to create a work of art, vital and full of meaning, and bearing the stamp of originality.

A. G. H. SPIERS

Correspondence

Professor Corwin's Reply

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Professor Adams, in his counterblast against my "Examination of the Covenant," voices a suspicion that I am trying to excite "special antagonism to the Shantung agreement" by stigmatizing it as a concession to the "discredited principle of the balance of power." I plead "not guilty" to the charge. Historically, to be sure, "balance of power" seems to have been applied to many and various situations and to have taken color from its diverse employment. I employed it in explanation of the Shantung agreement simply in its literal sense, and to indicate the idea that unless Japan could be induced to join the League of Nations, there would be a dangerous preponderance of power outside the League.

Like Ex-President Taft, President Lowell, and other advocates of the Covenant, Professor Adams feels it incumbent upon him to attempt to put a passable countenance on the Shantung arrangement. I agree with him that he is under this necessity; with his explanation of the arrangement itself I entirely disagree. He writes: "The arrangement demands nothing of China which she has not already granted, and the definite promise of restoration gives her a new advantage." But "the promise of restoration" is far from covering all the ground. Japan promises to restore China's territorial rights in the "leased territory" of Kiaochow, but on the condition that she be allowed to plot out for herself a "concession" in Tsing-tao, and she says nothing about privileges which, according to the Chinese at least, she has screwed out of China in territory surrounding the leased territory. She also promises to restore China's "sovereignty" in Shantung, but not the mines and railroads which the Peace Treaty transfers to her, together with "all rights of exploitation"; and she stipulates upon the right to police these railroads. True, China had "granted" all these things to Japan—at the point of the bayonet!

But the arrangement was "necessary"! Necessary for what and for whom? To be sure, England and France had already committed themselves; but not the United States, unless possibly in connection with the Lansing-Ishii agreement, our information regarding which is still perhaps somewhat fragmentary. But that possibility aside, our assent to this gross breach of trust, the like of which by private treaties would have subjected them to very stern treatment indeed, was the price our representative paid to get Japan into the League. No doubt the situation was peculiar, but it was by no means unparalleled in the history of international relations. So the question confronts us, Do we wish to enter a League the maintenance of which may repeatedly exact a surrender on our part of our freedom of moral judgment as a nation? Professor Adams instances as analogous the Slavery Compromises in the Constitution. These were, it will be remembered, but the first of a series of compromises touching the same subject, leading down to the war which grew out of them.

Professor Adams thinks Article X indispensable to the Covenant and indeed to any league "of any value for the preservation of peace." It would undoubtedly be indispensable to a league which undertook to provide a conclusive settlement of all international difficulties, but that is not the case with the proposed League. Professor Adams writes that "the execution of a judicial mandate or a mandate of the Council is not aggression." Certainly not. But I find no provision in the Covenant for such mandates in support of a "recommendation" of the Council; only an obligation not to go to war against disputants complying with the recommendation. Furthermore, such recommendation must be by unanimous voice of the Council, not counting members who are parties to the dispute under consideration. So, it seems to me that the contradiction which I point out between Article X and certain other features of the League remains. It is the dangerous contradiction of the features of a "strong league" with those of a "weak league."

Professor Adams takes me to task for declaring that the primary purpose of the League must be the "maintenance of a solidarity of interests among its principal members." He characterizes this assertion as "an assumption without justification." But let us suppose that solidarity is not maintained among these principal members, then what becomes of the League?—indeed what becomes of the Peace Treaty? So that the criticism boils down, as Professor Adams substantially admits, to a quarrel over the question of the most usual basis of international solidarity in the long run. And it is in the answer they return to this question that the Shantung and Fiume episodes become so instructive.

Another contention of mine which draws Mr. Adams's fire is that the Conference confused two distinct problems, that of enforcing the Peace Treaty and that of providing a satisfactory settlement of international differences generally. But is it not obvious that the former task must be left in great part to a political body acting subject to constant instruction from the several home governments, and is it not equally obvious that such a body is not the best sort of body to win and hold the confidence of the world in its capacity for the disinterested consideration of international questions generally? True, Professor Adams maintains that the powers of the Council "are quite different and much more independent" than those of the Peace Conference (italics mine). By "independent," I suppose that he means independent of political control; and if so, this is a very important statement. But what proof is adduced for it? None; and I am unable to conceive what proof he may have in mind. It is interesting to note that Mr. Taft is beginning to betray some uneasiness on this point, and that one of his proposed "reservations" or "interpretations" endeavors to deal with the problem, though certainly in a very inadequate way. As to the powers of the Council being "different" from those of the Peace Conference—they are so, I should say, principally in the sense of being much more general and undefined.

But, Professor Adams protests, "Conciliar management of an alliance of nations has abundantly proved its success." Precisely; if we are in for a general alliance, the Council ought to prove a very satisfactory body for effecting an exchange of views, for the secret elaboration of policies, the mutual underwriting of projects. But personally I hope that this country will never consent to enter such a council, or to submit to it.

One or two other features of Professor Adams's article demand passing notice. His attempted demonstration that the supplementary treaty guaranteeing France against unprovoked attack by Germany constitutes a vote of confidence in the League itself, I am unable to grasp. Another matter is his assertion at the beginning of his communication that "no advocate of the Covenant can maintain that there are not substantial objections to it." This is a mistake which does credit to Professor Adams's own fairness and moderation—but a mistake just the same.

I have met advocates of the Covenant this summer—enthusiastic advocates—who have never read it, and who consequently do not feel free to admit objections to it—at least, serious objections. The fact of the matter is, that the great mass of the supporters of the Covenant gave this document their sanction before it was ever disclosed. Being average Americans, they have great faith in legislation, even though they don't read the laws. They know that the Rum Traffic has just been abolished by Constitutional Amendment, and they see no reason why war should not be dealt with in the same efficient way. Besides, has not the President assured them that a new era is at hand? It is true that the President had earlier pledged himself—or so they understood him—to keep them out of war and then failed to live up to his word.

Nor is this matter of the intellectual processes of the trusting American public beside the point—the point being that we have missed our destination. We set out to provide an expected procedure for the peaceful consideration of international differences, a procedure designed to bring those differences to the test of the world's reasonable opinion and sense of justice. We wind up with a scheme which would make us sit in at every quarrel. We set out to make our aloofness available in healing age-long animosities. We wind up consenting to subject the questions of this hemisphere to the tangled exigencies of European politics. We set out picturing to ourselves a method by which governments would be compelled to submit their controversies, in the first instance to the uncoerced and so far as possible unbiased judgment of good men. We wind up in an effort to set up a few governments, whose principal title to the rôle is their power and the fact that they have widespread interests and so can not be unbiased as the arbiters of the world's affairs. I can conceive of no worse miscarriage.

EDWARD S. CORWIN

Ann Arbor, Mich., August 3

A Legacy of Hatred

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

For years the Balkan problem has been the despair of European statesmen. Is it certain that the attempts of the Peace Conference to solve it will be more successful than other attempts have been? The various little wars still raging suggest a negative answer.

When Bulgaria, Serbia, and Greece combined to overthrow Turkish rule there was a strong hope that the day of bitter quarrels among them was past. Yet in the very moment of victory the old dissensions broke out. And what Bulgaria did to Serbia in this war has created a gulf that the present generation need not expect to see bridged. Nor is this all. Complicated questions, full of danger, are raised elsewhere. The Jugoslavs are at odds, not only with Austria and Hungary, but with Rumania and Italy. Rumania, her claims ignored, is dealing with Hungary "off her own bat." The President blithely disposed of the Fiume issue, but it remains to plague all Europe. Albania is another tinder box. There are serious disputes between Italy and Greece.

Worst of all, America, which was never at war with either Turkey or Bulgaria, now seeks, through her delegates at Paris, to protect Bulgaria at the expense of Greece. The President as cheerfully runs the risk of alienating the countrymen of Venizelos as of alienating the countrymen of Orlando. What is his purpose? What does he expect America to gain by this policy of rewarding your enemies and punishing your friends?

Probably he would explain it all on the principle of "self-determination." But there are dangers in that principle which he apparently ignores. It is doubtless easy to misapply the lessons of history. But it is undeniable that each new state means a new possibility of war. If the League of Nations can hold all the new states in leading-strings, peace may prevail. Nevertheless the breaking up of empires has always been attended with dangers. One need not be a Cassandra to doubt the reasonableness of Mr. Wilson's confidence in his own supreme wisdom. The legacy of self-determination may conceivably turn out to be a legacy of hatred.

EDWARD FULLER

Philadelphia, August 11

Poetry

Aftermath

There is a beauty of the withered old
That autumn in its haggard noons has not,

Nor spring that has lean winter days forgot

To dream of summer's fullness yet untold;

There is a beauty of the withered old
That is not in a lone and lovely plot
Of summer twilight, nor in morning, shot

By winter's affirmation of the cold;
There is a loveliness in old men's eyes
Not in the asking face of youth; a wraith
Of deeper presences that we surprise

And then forget and reck no further of;
'Tis but the ensign of an ancient faith:
That wisdom comes alone of given love.

CHARLES R. MURPHY

Book Reviews

Colonel Repington's Memoirs

VESTIGIA: REMINISCENCES OF PEACE AND WAR. By Lieut.-Col. Charles à Court Repington. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

WE have in this well-made book the personal story of the famous military correspondent of the London Times up to the opening of the World War. The narrative begins with a mass of genealogy, which the author considerably advises the reader to skip. It continues idyllically in country places of Surrey and Ireland, with sports galore and glimpses of kindly and famous people; passes swiftly the brawls and un-scholastic joys of Eton, and the gentler recreations of a German coaching school for the Army; and closes the youthful chapter at Sandhurst.

Born in 1858, Charles à Court Repington fell upon the last days of the old army. The officers were patricians of abundant courage and physique, often clever minor tacticians, but hopelessly ill trained, unadaptable, and unprogressive. They often took their lead from their Commander in Chief, the worthy but thick-headed Duke of Cambridge. Apparently the single military maxim was the invincibility of the British soldier when led by "one of our sort." Charles Repington came up saturated with this belief, and his subsequent emancipation does him credit.

As a subaltern he had a brief experience of the clearing of the Khaibar Pass, where he observed the impolicy of minute orders imposed from afar upon a field force. Invalided home, he served for a time in Parnell's tumultuous Ireland. "I carried away with me one conviction at least, namely, that only Irishmen should deal with Irishmen, for they alone understand them." On a vacation Repington had written a little book on the Italian Army, and this with excellent examinations secured admission to the Staff College. Here he had mates of the stamp of the future Generals Plumer and Smith-Dorrien, and went far in the study of military theory. He rejoined his battalion in Upper Burmah and became enamored of the beauty of the scenery and the gentleness of the folk. Invalided again, he served as military attaché at Brussels and The Hague, obtaining a sound knowledge of European politics generally. Visits of German officers both in England and the Low Countries opened Repington's eyes as to German military psychology. One whom he took to the Derby surveyed the crowd open-mouthed and exclaimed, "Ach! what a mark for shrapnel."

Already well initiated in the Intelligence Branch, Repington had no difficulty in being transferred to Egypt for the Atbara campaign, and in the two great battles he had the luck to be temporarily on Kitchener's staff. Here we glimpse young David Beatty, the future hero of Jutland, as an intrepid commander of a Nile gunboat. Kitchener is graphically hit off. He declined to have a chief of staff, because it "created a channel." He gave chiefly verbal orders. For the Atbara only three orders were issued. "The Sirdar hated functions, public speaking, and ceremonial or display of any kind. He would, for preference, have lived in a cloud of smoke, unnoticed by the world and his men. I never saw him look at or speak to a private soldier or take the slightest trouble to ingratiate himself with his troops." After the assault on the Atbara, he had fairly to be dragged out to receive the cheers of the little army. He hung lovingly around his supply dumps—"nuzling" his staff family called it—and had little interest in tactics. Asked before Omdurman how he proposed to attack, he replied "that he had brought us 1,500 miles into Africa and had fed us, and that he expected us to fight the battle for him." In rare moments of leisure he loved to drive rivets in the river boats which were building. "It was an unwritten law for anyone with him to mark the K. rivets with a chalk cross, that they might be riveted afresh."

After an interval in Holland, at the first Hague Conference, and in Belgium came the Jameson raid and its sequels. It is commented in a most instructive letter from the Kaiser to an uncle of Col. Repington's. The notorious dispatch of congratulation to President Kruger is described as "the thankful outcry that our men and money had been saved from loss and ruin," meaning the German interests in the Transvaal. Col. Repington was appointed to Gen. Buller's staff. He found there had been no real estimate of the military in London, and that Buller had no plan to meet the peculiar Boer tactics except "to blow them off the kopjes with our guns." For a year the blowing off worked quite the other way. Buller increased his helplessness by isolating himself from his staff (Kitchener had always messed with his) and revealed the most curious mixture of sheer rashness and irresolution. The old Army had developed good field officers whose mentality stopped with the regiment. Between the merciful lines of Col. Repington's narrative one reads an awful tale of tactical incompetence and strategic nullity, yet one retains a certain tenderness for a stupidity so massive, warmhearted, and consistent with itself. Buller was likable. After an unnecessary retreat he once congratulated the chief of staff on the success of the movement. He merely sputtered in reply, "We have practiced it twice lately."

Shortly after the Boer War, Col. Repington resigned and began a campaign for army reform which led him to the Times. His extraordinary articles on the Russo-Japanese War, which, very sensibly, were written not at the front but at London, gave him a position of great authority. His problem as a war correspondent was whether to take a strictly professional or a political and opportunist view of his function. He wisely took the latter course and made himself the champion of such remarkable War Ministers as Mr. Arnold-Foster and Lord Haldane. He saw a general staff organized, an expeditionary army provided, and the territorials brought into a divisional organization of all arms, while the Officers' Training Corps was re-vivified. English Liberalism has many failures to answer for, but it should not be forgotten that no Tory government has ever taken anything but an amateur view of army matters, and that but for Lord Haldane's reforms there would have been no Expeditionary Army to help at the Marne and Ypres, the Germans must have seized the channel ports, and England's very existence would have been imperiled. In all these matters Col. Repington played an influential rôle, mediating between Lord Roberts's sound but politically impracticable programme and the indifferent public and the hampered ministers.

Before the great war he clearly foresaw the conflict itself and the effects of the new inventions. He was right on the value of the aeroplane, and on the futility of fortresses; foresaw the submarine peril and the new naval tactics implied, at the moment when the Admiralty was still mumbling about cutting-off expeditions behind Heligoland. All these issues were fully discussed in the remarkable articles "New Wars for Old," 1910, but the teaching fell largely on deaf ears. Lord Morley was a true prophet when he told Col. Repington that he would never get the army he wanted until the country was at war.

Perforce we have dwelt on the professional side of a book which is rich also in anecdote and personal reminiscence. It is most instructive reading, and its companion piece, which will treat the war just finished, will be eagerly awaited. We could wish that this country had a journalistic expert combining the professional accomplishments and parliamentary sense of the author. Our few war correspondents of distinguished parts have done little to aid in an army reform, which is only less needed here than it was in England after the South African misadventure.

This book contains the necessary maps and a few family portraits of interest, including a very enlightening miniature of Nelson's Emma, which was a gift to the author's grandmother.

A Mighty Hunter

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK COURTENAY SELOUS, D.S.O. By J. G. Millais, F.Z.S. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

WITH but very few exceptions, Captain Frederick Courtenay Selous, D.S.O., was the last of a long line of old-fashioned pioneer hunters of African big game. By long odds he was the most famous and conspicuous man of his kind. He lived and hunted from the period of the big-calibre smooth-bore elephant gun that he loaded at the muzzle with a handful of powder as he ran at full speed, up through the 577 English express rifle of the 70's, to the modern highly finished Mannlicher of small calibre and tremendous power.

It is with the feeling of a hungry man attacking a banquet that every admirer and friend of Selous will take up J. G. Millais' volume. Its bulk and the honest solidity of the types promise well for the fullness of things. A stirring and adventurous life of sixty-five years is not to be dismissed with a few perfunctory and double-leaded pages. And it is quickly discerned that Mr. Millais, who never yet did a poor bit of work, has in this volume come mighty near to turning out a masterpiece of biography. If the pictorial flavor were more strongly Selousian, as it really deserved to be, and so easily might have been, we should say that the volume attained perfection. In these pages we had rather see intimate pictures of and about Selous than even the best groups of African game animals. There is not even one picture of Selous as a soldier, or of his grave in the big-game country of the late lamented Hun colony.

This volume is not only the life story of Selous, but incidentally, it is also a valuable history of the development of South Africa, including the recent conquest of German East Africa. The actual amount of stirring history is really great, and it throws a searchlight on many things that to some of us were hitherto quite unknown. When Selous attempted to enlist in the British Army of Defense in 1914, Lord Kitchener flatly refused to accept him, on the ground that his age rendered him useless as a soldier. Kitchener never made a greater blunder in his life. Although sixty-five years of age when he went to Africa, Selous was as tough as a pine knot, and while younger and stronger men fell victim by scores and hundreds to hardship and disease, Selous marched, fought, and slept in liquid mud, in torrential and increasing rains, absolutely unscathed save for one slight ailment that sent him home for an operation, and a sound return after three months. Selous gloried in his remarkable health and hardiness; and Kitchener should have known that even at sixty-three the tough old outdoors man was still in his prime.

It gives "an old one" a heart pang to read Millais' quoted accounts of Selous' yearly adventures as a big-game hunter, just as it does to read now Roosevelt's "Hunting Trips of a Ranchman." Every misadventure and every success ends with the same thought: "That was long ago; and he is gone!" Selous began his adventures haltingly. He made his full share of mistakes and failures. Often he called himself the most unlucky of hunters. He strove to kill elephants in order to get money from ivory to finance more hunting trips, to kill more ivory and pay for more trips. But of all the great ivory hunters, he was only moderately successful; and we are rather glad of it! We would not have him an elephant butcher like Neumann, who once killed sixteen female elephants in one day.

In every sense of the word, Selous was a mighty hunter, a great admirer of big game, a close observer and a strictly truthful chronicler. His books contributed immensely to the world's knowledge of African fauna. But he was a dry writer. If he had any sense of humor, or joyousness of temperament, he carefully concealed it. He loved the outdoor life, but he never reveled and rejoiced in the beauties of nature unless they wore the hides of wild animals. But we will not quarrel with the great Captain on that account. All the older books of hunting adventures in Africa, without a single exception, were as dry as the Kalahari Desert.

It is a pleasure to see it recorded in cold type that Captain Selous was throughout life clean-minded and high-minded, a lover of justice, and a hater of meanness and folly. A hunter born, his energy was boundless and irrepressible. When living where he could no longer hunt big game, he hunted birds' eggs and butterflies, with all the zeal of his youthful quests for elands and hartebeests. He never made any money to speak of, save the $10,000 that came from his "Hunter's Wanderings"; but his friends were a host and his admirers legion. In general, he knew that he was appreciated, even though he felt that Cecil Rhodes never gave him a title of the credit that was justly his due for his wise and valuable assistance in the acquisition of Rhodesia and the founding of the Great Britain's South African empire.

Captain Selous was shot through the head and instantly killed on January 4, 1917, while leading his company against about ten times its number of Germans.

He fell at S. Lat. 7 deg., Long. 38 deg. E., not near any village, but a few yards to the east of the main road leading south from Mikesse on the Central (G. E. A.) railway to the Rufigi River, ten miles distant. "It is for the most part," continues the report of his death, "the haunt of a great variety of big game, including elephants, giraffes, and rhinos. Not more than four miles away is a warm salt spring running down into a salt lake where hippos, wild ducks, egrets, and numerous other wild fowl abound."

Mr. Millais has done well by his friend, "Great-heart" Selous. We are glad that this particular story of a most picturesque and interesting life has been adequately told. Its text may fairly be regarded as a model.

WILLIAM T. HORNADAY

Idealists in London

MUMMERY: A Tale of Three Idealists. By Gilbert Cannan. New York: George H. Doran Company.

IT is, we suspect, Gilbert Cannan's pre-occupation with modern life as a thing positive and self-contained that sets him a little apart from most of those contemporaries with whom he is commonly bracketed. His people do not so much spurn the past as affirm the present. They do not waste energy defying conventions which may be quite comfortably ignored. They offer no apology to past or future for a world which belongs to neither. Compare "Mummery" with another book of the moment, "The Moon and Sixpence" of W. Somerset Maugham. Both concern that "genius" with which current novelists are so excessively, not to say tediously busy. There is nothing in these stories unless you can swallow whole the initial assumption—that these people (musicians or painters, nine times out of ten) were geniuses, did at some time produce masterpieces and take the world by storm. You have to accept the author's word for this, since he can not produce the picture or the symphony. Say you do take it: then you are ready to consider how your genius was constructed and how he "worked"—what made the genial wheels go round.

Now Mr. Maugham's man is, on an heroic scale, the demonic figure most in fashion. He is the fellow who sacrifices the sixpences of respectability and conformity and decency and honor and all other trumpery treasures of convention to follow the moon of his inspiration. Or to put him more accurately, he is the helpless and irresponsible victim of an obsession. His moon is not an ideal to be climbed towards or guided by, but a cruel and obscene mistress who has her will of him—for the world's good, we are to suppose. "Mummery," on the other hand, justifies its subtitle as "a tale of idealists." It deals, one might say, with a whole mess of geniuses, irresponsible enough in little ways, not comfortable members of society. They are simply indifferent to the proper thing. But they do not live for the sake of defying and outraging that thing; there is more important business in hand. They wish to affirm beauty or truth as they feel it alive in them, or see it alive about them. Attacking ugliness and untruth is after all a lesser game, though our "new novelists," like the New Ones of every period, are none too ready to perceive this.

In his last critical utterance of note, Henry James set down Gilbert Cannan's chief merit as fidelity to the fact. This was before "Three Sons and a Mother" and "Mendel" and the present story showed how far beyond a literal and circumstantial realism the maturer Cannan was to go. If, as James said, the younger man shared his colleagues' impulse to counter the sentimental "dodginess" of the Victorian novelists, the best of them, by offering the slice of life (staple delicatessen for frothy delicatessen), certainly the older deals in another commodity. He has discovered the romance of the present, and is not above a dodge or two of his own in giving it point and saliency. His three idealists move in a plane quite above the slough of sentimentalism, Victorian or other, where so many others still wallow—the woman, Kitty, the incorrigible stage presence of Sir Henry, and most of his subordinates in "the profession." The action, after all, is of yesterday, "in one of those swiftly moving years which hurried Europe towards the catastrophe awaiting it." It begins with the arrival in London of a striking couple, the eccentric and irresistible Charles Mann, and his Clara Day, beautiful and intelligent, whom, a year or two since, he has found, a sort of innocent Trilby (save the mark!) among the studios of Paris and taken possession of "exactly as he did of stray dogs and cats and birds in cages." Clara Day remains his, in gratitude and affection. There is no passion on either side, Charles being incapable and Clara unawakened. But she is ambitious for him, sees him frittering away his great talent in small enthusiasms, and drags him back to England "where, as an Englishman and, as she knew, one of the most gifted Englishmen of his time, his work lay."

On their arrival she at once scents the British dragon of propriety, and lest her poor Charles be hampered by gossip, has him marry her. Unluckily it transpires that he has already a wife in England, deserted casually some years back, and now disposed to make trouble for the casual one. Clara leaves him, to his mild annoyance, but continues devoting herself to his interests. They both see in the theatre a promising field for his genius in design. Clara takes to the stage, purely as a step towards furthering his plans; charms the susceptible Sir Henry, most powerful of British actor-managers; induces him to produce "The Tempest" with Charles's extraordinary setting and with herself in the part of Ariel. Unluckily Charles's theatre and Sir Henry's and Adnor Rodd's (he is the third idealist) are all hopelessly at odds. Charles, as Rodd says, wants to use the theatre: "He wants to substitute a static show for a dynamic and vital performance, to impose his own art upon the theatre. The actors have done that until they have driven anything else out. He wants to drive them out." Sir Henry, of course, sees the theatre as a money-making concern that focuses in the exploitation of his own triumphant stage personality; while Rodd spends his solitary life writing plays which he knows have no relation to the possibilities of the commercial theatre. Among these cross-purposed males our Ariel flits beneficently. She is half-married to the visionary Charles; Sir Henry besieges her with well-seasoned eloquence—is "in love" with her in thoroughgoing Victorian fashion; while Adnor Rodd is her inevitable mate. "The Tempest," of course, is unsatisfactory to everybody but Sir Henry's public and Sir Henry himself. He spoils Charles with his electricity, spoils Shakespeare with his "business," does his best to spoil Ariel with his machinery. So she burlesques herself the delicate art so painfully mastered for this hour—and is hailed as a risen star. She will have nothing of such success, and turns her back upon the stage at the moment of her applauded debut. She has done her best for Charles and failed, and at last is free to go off quietly with Rodd towards marriage and the happiness of mated minds and spirits.

It has been said more than once of late that these younger British novelists all write pretty much alike; that without their names on the title-pages one could hardly say who the performer was. Certainly there is a striking family likeness among many of them. But this book belongs to Gilbert Cannan; it could not conceivably be the work of a Walpole or a Beresford or a Mackenzie or a Lawrence or a Swinnerton. Of its plot, as sketched above, almost anything might be made in the handling. Clara Day, we must own, moves among her men with hardly less freedom than dear Ethel of "The Young Visitors." The marvel is that we believe in her coming out of it all equally scot-free. Miraculously we believe in Clara Day and are grateful for her.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Psychology of "Correspondence"

MIND AND CONDUCT. By Henry Rutgers Marshall. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

MR. MARSHALL has taken the occasion of the Morse Lectures delivered at the Union Theological Seminary in the spring of this year to summarize and, to some extent, to develop his well-known theories of psychology in simple and what may be called portable form. His small volume is a model of orderly arrangement and clear presentation, and may be recommended warmly to those who desire acquaintance with the positions held by one of our leading theorists, yet might be frightened by the bulk of his "Consciousness," not to mention his other and lesser volumes. On pages 129 to 131 Mr. Marshall gives a résumé of his main tenets in so succinct and masterly a form that half the ordinary labor of the reviewer might be spared by simply copying it off.

Mr. Marshall is much concerned with the theory of "behaviorism," with the tenets of these so-called psychologists, that is to say, who virtually eliminate the soul from their consideration and study merely the physical acts and attitudes of a man or an animal under various excitements. In opposition to this non-psychic psychology he holds to a parallelism which he terms a thoroughgoing correspondence. Every situation in consciousness involves a special and specific mode of human behavior. And, on the other hand, every mode of human conduct has correspondent with it a special and specific situation in consciousness. There is no discoverable relation here of cause and effect, or of priority, but a mere correspondence. In this way he thinks the impasse of materialism is avoided, and at the same time due recognition is given to the scientific procedure which depends on a mechanistic hypothesis. At any moment a certain part of the total field of consciousness is emphasized and forms what may be called a "presentation" to the rest of consciousness, which is somehow unconscious. This part of "the complex psychic system of consciousness," to which the presentation is made and which is not present in consciousness, is the Self. The simulacrum, so to speak, of this Self, which then is presented to us at a later moment in memory, is the ego of which we are conscious. "Newness," or creativeness, is a real fact of the physical world, as it is of the world of consciousness, but is so gradual in its operation that ordinarily we are not aware of its steps. The Self is free to act in accord with its own nature. The fact that we choose between alternatives is due to the creativeness inherent in the free Self. We are thus always responsible for our acts, since the Self, which determines our acts, is at any moment the result of the sum of its previous acts of choice.

We fear that this summary of Mr. Marshall's own résumé may not seem quite so lucid as we have described it to be. If so, this is partly owing to certain additions of our own in the nature of interpretation. The truth is that clearness such as Mr. Marshall has attained in such a subject as he treats is likely to signify elimination as much as it does reflection. At every page of his book questions arise which are not answered, or even admitted. For instance, his fundamental theory of correspondence seems clear for the very reason that he waives some of the inherent difficulties. Thus he says: "We find that certain specific forms of consciousness always go with certain specific forms of behavior, and vice versa. . . . We can not be angry if we restrict certain bodily reactions; if, for example, we fold our hands and smile." In this, Mr. Marshall, we think, puts too much reliance on the conclusions of Professor James, who here, as so often, is essentially superficial while wearing the appearance of profundity. A great poet knows that no such complete correspondence exists between physical gesture and consciousness as Professor James and Mr. Marshall desiderate. The poet knows that a man may smile and smile and be a villain; he sees that the moral mood of which anger is, so to speak, the external expression, carries us into a region of consciousness beyond the reach of mechanistic search. The way of escape from behaviorism is not through the sort of psychology of which Mr. Marshall is so distinguished an advocate. So long as we maintain a complete correspondence between consciousness and behavior we have really given the case to the behaviorist, however we may seek to conceal the surrender by denying the relation of cause and effect. The moralist, whether of poetry or of religion, knows that logically and in what may be called the realm of values consciousness is not only prior to behavior but is more extensive than behavior.

To take one other point. Mr. Marshall has made certain distinctions between responsibility and accountability which are of high practical importance, but it is questionable whether they lead to anything philosophically. We are responsible for all our acts, as noted in the summary above; we are accountable only for those acts with which society must reckon for its welfare and preservation. A man is responsible for yielding to panic in case of fire, because his act of yielding is a result of his character, which in turn is the product of all his previous acts of choice; but he is not accountable for such weakness. This is a true distinction legally, but in the court of opinion the man is held both responsible and accountable and the difference vanishes. Again, the question of responsibility as Mr. Marshall propounds it is rendered clear and simple, we suspect, by avoiding the real difficulty. We are responsible for any act because this act is in accordance with our total nature at the moment, and we are responsible for our nature at any moment because this has been formed by all our previous acts of choice. This seems rather a circular form of argument, but its chief fallacy is still to mention. Strange as it may seem, in considering the freedom of choice by which the nature of the Self is gradually built up Mr. Marshall omits the initial problem of our character as given by inheritance. How far are we responsible for acts of choice which, to some extent at least, are determined by the initial substance of the soul?

It will appear that the present reviewer does not feel that the theory of correspondence either delivers us from the hands of the "behaviorist" or explains the deeper problems of psychology. But Mr. Marshall's book is for all that a notable work, one which every student of modern theories must take into account.

"English A" in France

"ENGLISH A"—is it necessary to define the term? "Freshman English" the students called it. The catalogue described it as "Elementary Composition, prescribed for all first-year men in the University." If you ever got as close as Freshman year to an American university, you know all about it. You remember paying good money over the counter for tuition, and then trying to slip out of the shop without carrying off the goods, thinking it a huge joke on the storekeeper. You didn't like the way the goods were put up. They came in packages of an hour each in the presence of a languid or a nervous young instructor who read you his own undergraduate themes, interspersed with passages from Walter Pater and Theodore Dreiser, by way of illustrating matters you never took the trouble to grasp because you knew they were quite unessential. If you got as far as the graduate school, you know still more about it. By that time you were the instructor. You called yourself a "section-hand," and described the course as, "Decomposition and Illiterature, with Special Studies in the Themey Side of Life," and agreed enthusiastically with the colleague who described the professor in charge of the course as having "an admirable talent for organizing sawdust."

When we got to France and looked into our old kit-bags (the original ancestor of which must have belonged to Pandora) we were surprised to find English A there along with everything else. It was like the goblin on the load of furniture that was being removed from the haunted house,—we did not know it was going with us. It must have been woven into the very fibre of our beings, for we carried no books nor any notes; we did not know when we started whether we were going to teach or sell cigarettes. We were told to include only bare necessities in our baggage, and it never occurred to us that English A fell in that category. But it did. We included it without hesitation or discussion in our preliminary list of English courses for the A. E. F. University. Naturally we must have a beginners' course of some kind; perhaps each heart did recall a different name, but all sang English A,—to be sure, it was English 1-A by the time it got into print, but that was the Registrar's doings. Then, between the acting of the dreadful thing and the first motion, we wondered what it would be like. There were we, indeed, the same old teachers in spite of our uniforms, and there would be they, the same old students. Yes, but think what they had been through since they left our class-rooms. "Eccovi l'uom ch' è stato all' Inferno,"—what will he say to unity, mass, and coherence, these three? What will he do to English A? Catch it and throw it back at us like a hand grenade? And if he does, will it explode, or is it a dud?

That was at the planning stage, and vague planning it was of necessity; we couldn't make definite plans without knowing who was to carry them out, and of the staff for the course we were only the nucleus. "We" were the professional teachers, wearing at first the Red Triangle, afterwards the "Golden Cooty," the winged torch of the Educational Corps,—only four of us at the outset to stand for the English Department, representing Massachusetts, Nebraska, Mississippi, and California. Afterwards we gathered them in, a major, two captains, half a dozen lieutenants, and as many enlisted men. They represented among them Harvard, Yale, Princeton, University of Pennsylvania, Cornell, Amherst, and State universities with North Carolina, Texas, and Minnesota as the geographical extremes. Among the enlisted men were some of the best of our teachers. Any university might be glad to get such a staff for its Freshman course, young men who had had experience enough to make them useful, but not so much as to turn them into automatons.

So without any tinkering whatever we set up the old machine at Beaune, cranked it, and were delighted to find that it ran more smoothly in its new surroundings than ever before. Through no prevision of ours, the surroundings had been adapted to it in three main particulars (English A always works by the rule of three). First, the sawdust had been properly organized for the first time in the history of the course—the Army had done the trick better than the originator of English A—it was spread under our feet in the class-rooms to keep the earthen floor from churning into mud. At the sight our hearts leaped up; for once we could keep the sawdust where it belonged, press it down into the mud, and if it could sprout in that soil whence spring the vines of France and milk of Burgundy, then we might accept its juice as the growth of God. Second, the men had not paid for what we had to offer them, and therefore did not feel obliged to neglect it. On the contrary, being paid thirty dollars a month and found for attending the university, they seemed to feel obliged to carry off all they could get. It becomes a habit in the A. E. F. to take anything anybody will give you. You see a line of men patiently standing, and automatically you attach yourself to the end of it, not knowing whether you will get a month's pay, a pair of pajamas, or a shot in the arm. It isn't that you get something you want; you get something for nothing. And you are not compelled to stand in the line; if you were it would be a formation, and you would dodge it if you could.

That is the third point: English 1-A was happily not "prescribed for all first-year men in the University," it was an elective as was every other course on the list; the result was that two hundred and seventy-nine men elected it. There were 1,171 registrations (including repeaters) in our nineteen courses of English, seven hundred and sixty-five students registered in the College of Letters, and six thousand and odd in the whole university. After a crude sort of picking over, they were the pick of the A. E. F. They were the survivors of hardship and hard luck, and were as fit survivors ought to be. They were high-school graduates who had not stopped thinking the minute they got their diplomas. They looked us straight in the eye, and wasted no words. They had wiped from their lips the milk of what they used to call their "preparatory Alma Mater,"—they were not the same boys who had left our classes for the training camps.

In view of these differences it is fair to question whether English 1-A was English A at all. It is hard to recognize English A without the sawdust, and especially without the elaborate organization thereof. I have seen English A at its source organized to the last gasp, in an office building of its own with impassable railings, stenographers, a director's room, files, catalogues, cross references, and a branch exchange connecting all departments. Perhaps this is necessary where they are training not only the eight hundred students in the course but half of the forty instructors. We had only a baker's dozen of instructors in English 1-A, and of this staff we found it necessary to hold only two or three formal meetings because we were meeting constantly anyway. Every man was in the office every day, there were no partitions to bar the free circulation of ideas, cigarettes, and experiences. We agreed almost without discussion on two or three fundamental topics for the course, and on the division of time among them. The order in which they were to be taken up, and the method of handling them was a matter for the instructor to choose for himself. Every man had a free hand to carry out his ideas if he had any. If not, he might consult a syllabus which was kept in the office to provide material day by day for the entire course. It was seldom consulted. Here was a plan intended to provide ideas and support for those who were used to working in a machine and those who were entirely inexperienced, and at the same time to allow complete freedom to those who knew how to use it. It worked admirably, and showed no flaws that would prevent its working as well with larger groups of teachers and students.

We had not even so much sawdust as is involved in entrance examinations; not even certificates except such as the students signed for themselves, which were merely the registration cards on which each student declared that he had attended such a high school from such a year to such another, and had or had not graduated. If he had not graduated, and still felt that he was qualified to carry on the work of the university, he was referred to a member of the registration committee for the Freshman group. Ordinarily sixty seconds was time enough to settle the matter. The instructor asked a few questions, not so much to learn the answers as to gauge the student. "How long since you left school?" "What business were you in?" "How old are you?" "Do you think you can swing this work?" If he said he could, and said it as if he meant it, and looked as if it were true, he got his chance to try, and rare indeed were the cases in which he did not succeed. If he, or any other student, was found wanting in a course in English, the instructor reported the fact to the chairman of the department, and either the chairman or the instructor held a conference with the student.

"Aren't you a little beyond your depth in this course?" he would ask. "You see, the other fellows have already been over this ground you are having trouble with, and we are not doing anything with it in the course. Why don't you go over and visit the divisional school tomorrow? There is a class there studying that very thing; it might be just what you want."

There was not a case in our department in which this did not work painlessly. The student would visit the designated class, report that it was exactly what he needed, and accept transfer to it gladly. It worked because we had grammar school and high school on the university grounds. The "demotion" involved no change of residence, no publicity, not even the expense of tutoring. Perhaps no such scheme could be devised for our colleges here at home, but those of us who have experienced the pleasure of setting a student to studying the thing he needed to study without having teacher, dean, and parents involved up to their necks in organized sawdust will have it ever before them as a far-shining ideal.

There was another element (or elementary matter) that threatened complications at times. The business end of the department referred to it darkly as brass tacks, and assumed that it was a mystery to the rest of us,—some of us had been in business before we turned to the more arduous paths of scholarship, but we didn't tell them so. We knew that the men were "hard boiled"; their choice of studies at registration showed their strong trend towards the practical. Books (at first) were few, and life abundant; literary material came more readily from experience than from literature. Before we met the students at all, we decided on one thing at least that they would all be interested in, the job at home. For the first theme we had each man write a letter applying for it, just the position he wanted and no other, a letter aimed straight at the man who had it to give. They took to it eagerly, and were as fussy as any teacher could wish about details that make the difference between the letter that goes into the waste basket and that which goes on file. Afterwards, in lucid intervals between classes around the stove in the class-room, or with our cigarettes on the sunny side of the building, the talk was nearly always of home, and it was from home that they took most of their subjects in spite of the wealth of material which their recent experience had placed in their hands. The last exercise for many of the sections was an impromptu theme written in class; they were to imagine that they had been at home for two days, and each was to write a letter to a comrade still in France describing his homecoming from the time he got off the train in his home town. The letters were nothing if not real. The experience had been so vividly imagined so many times that it was hard for the reader to believe that it had no bodily life. Every detail was there, and on one they all agreed; every man without exception (to judge at least by two sections of the course) had a glorious dinner of chicken for his first meal at home.

Poetry had its innings too; indeed, the students were scarcely less devoted to it than to their beloved brass tacks, and they went at it in a very practical fashion. There was a brisk demand for it at the library. The men read it eagerly, they talked to us about it, showed us clippings they had carried in the trenches, and laborious copies of other fellows' clippings. With surprising frequency they showed us poems of their own composition, usually of a crude, ballad-like vigor, often almost communal in origin—"another fellow and I cooked it up together," or, "a gang of us kinda doped it out among us." We used poetry as a sort of dessert after matters usually thought of as more practical; like the "orange after food,"—and the same question arises in regard to both: if an orange isn't food, what is it? If poetry isn't a practical matter, with us at least it was a matter of practice.

They were not held back from poetry as is the Freshman at home by shyness and inexperience. Their emotions were nearer the surface than we keep them in routine life. The unformulated objection to poetry, that it is a shameless parade of girlish emotion, was less of an inhibition to them than before they left high school. They had had experience with life that gave them direct contact with poetry as presentation of experience. But often, like Hotspur, they would shy at the name of poetry even as they expressed themselves in the medium they condemned. It was usually safer to approach it diplomatically from the practical side. If the instructor put it bluntly to the class, "Shall I read you a poem or dissect some of your themes?" they would vote for the themes. But let him write on the blackboard the word "wanderlust" (as he has written many another word) and ask a sergeant who has been in Germany to explain it. In the course of the explanation the instructor quotes stanzas from "For to Admire and for to See," and "Me that have been what I've been," at which they grin appreciatively. He asks them whether they ever heard of Ulysses, and one mentions his craft, another his wanderings. The instructor points out that they ought to sympathize with him; he was an officer of the Greek Expeditionary Force, unfortunately became a casual, suffering from the shortcomings of the transport service, and that when he got home he found the routine intolerable after his campaigns. He reads the poem, and if the keen attention leaves him in any doubt of the student's appreciation, the doubt is removed by the lively discussion that follows. A queer echo comes a day or two later when one of the men has the order to join his organization and go home. "It's funny," he says when the instructor congratulates him, "now that I've got it I'm not so awful sure I want to go."

Doubtless the old English A of the organized sawdust is a thing of the past, at least in the sense in which the originator of the phrase meant it, the organization of all possible "errors" in the use of language into categories and hierarchies, and parading them before classes with all the pomp of "Sound off!" and "Pass in review!" It is a joy that soon palls, this teaching innocent Freshmen to blush at a pleonasm and shudder at a split infinitive. One soon begins to question the utility of teaching students whole categories of errors they never dreamed of, and turns to the more positive process of trying first to bring them to the point of wanting to write something, and then trying to help them express themselves. The sawdust method is much easier; it is a comparatively simple thing to take a body of organized material assumed to be fact and pile it neatly in minds made vacant for the purpose, but it has no rewards worth winning.

The other way has real rewards; true, they are not always easy to win, but they can be had if student and instructor can meet on any common ground. In France the students came to meet us fully half way, and common ground was abundant, even if it was no more than the sawdust under our feet. Very likely the first keenness of the men for the work would have dulled if we had gone on longer. After that we should have had men like those who for one reason and another leave college and go into business for a half year or a whole year. When they return they usually know pretty well what they want, and go about with some steadiness of purpose to get it. There is no obvious way to bring about this state of mind in our students here at home. But it sets one to thinking about the plan for army education: would three months or a year of army training between high school and college, or even in the midst of college, give our students an idea of the value of theoretical training and an appetite for it such as they showed us in France?

ROBERT P. UTTER

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 17

New York, Saturday, September 6, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	351
Editorial Articles:
The Opportunity of the Seven	353
The Future of Labor	354
Louis Botha	355
England in Persia	356
The Daylight-Saving Fight	357
A Bas Literary Profiteers	357
The Question of Thrace. By Aristides E. Phourides	358
Private Judgment and Inefficiency. By F. Lyman Windolph	359
Correspondence	361
Book Reviews:
Whitewashing the Bolsheviks	362
Blasco Ibañez and "Mare Nostrum"	364
Moore's History of Religions	365
The Higher Law	366
The Run of the Shelves	367
The Joy of Possession. By A. J. Barnouw	368
Bolshevist Propaganda Ninety Years Ago. By Gustavus Myers	369
Books and the News. By Edmund Lester Pearson	370

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

VIEWED in the abstract, Senator Knox's speech on the German treaty was a powerful attack. Viewed, however, as the attempt of a statesman to influence the course of affairs it can only be regarded as futile. Mr. Knox brought home to those who read his speech a remarkably vivid sense of the hardness of some of the terms—especially those relating to shipping—which have been imposed upon Germany. But Mr. Knox, like the rest of us, has had many months in which to weigh this matter, and there is no more reason to-day than there was months ago for arriving at the conclusion to which he seems so suddenly to have been driven. That Germany will resent her punishment, that she will cherish a desire for revenge and for restoration to her former position of power, there is only too much reason to believe; but this would equally have been the case if the terms had been far less harsh than they are, far less harsh than any which could with safety to the world have been adopted. The United States is not going to shirk its share of the responsibility for a settlement which shall insure the result that its splendid effort was so vitally instrumental in attaining. Senator Knox's eleventh-hour appeal for rejection of the treaty on a ground which neither he nor anybody else had hitherto brought forward can be nothing more than a flash in the pan. It appears to have awakened no echo, and is likely to awaken none.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us a clipping from the first issue of the Review (May 17) and one from the last issue (August 30), and thereupon remarks:

How can you expect one to have confidence in your sincerity in view of these absolutely contradictory statements? In the first you admit the iniquity of the Shantung feature of the treaty. In the second you condemn the Senate Committee for correcting it.

If we had said on May 17 that the Shantung settlement was iniquitous and on August 30 that it was just, these two statements would indeed be "absolutely contradictory." But on May 17 we were expressing our judgment of the merit of what had been done in this particular at Versailles, and on August 30 we were expressing our judgment as to what can now be done in view of the fact that the treaty stands before the Senate for action. This action can not be taken as though it were perfectly open to us to change the result in any way we think fit; it must be taken with a full sense of responsibility for the entire consequences of what we may do. It is one thing to say that a treaty is perfect, and it is another thing to say that it is our duty to accept the treaty in spite of its imperfections rather than plunge our country and the world into consequences big with evil and disaster. There are many things in this world—many things in our own country—which are wrong and which nevertheless we do not propose to correct by violent or ill-considered measures. As regards Shantung, the conclusion we expressed in our issue of August 30 was this:

What is necessary as matters stand is to work patiently towards the bringing about of justice to China, building both upon Japan's promises and upon the underlying principles to which she, in common with the rest of the nations of the world, is committed by membership in the League of Nations. The Senate should put on record, in connection with the ratification, its judgment of what ought to be done, thus refusing to give its sanction to the Shantung provision. To go beyond this assertion of the desire and attitude of our country would be reckless and dangerous folly.

Mr. Wilson might have done better than he did; but if it would be reckless and dangerous folly to throw the result overboard—and this is what we believe the proposed Shantung amendment would in practical effect do—then it is our plain duty to say so.

THE New York State Federation of Labor has made a fine response to the appeal made by the President in his message to his fellow-citizens on August 25 relating to the railway troubles. The Federation strikes the note both of American patriotism and of individual responsibility. Increased production and a firm abstinence from strikes and disturbing agitation are urged by it upon the workers of the nation. The President has thus far good reason to feel highly gratified by the way in which his recommendation for a joint endeavor to meet the economic crisis in a wholesome and helpful spirit has been received by all classes. For the moment at least, the preachers of discord are relegated to the rear. Let us hope that the old spirit of America, a spirit which recognizes no permanent class divisions, will prove itself stronger than our easy-going semi-revolutionists have imagined.

SHIP me somewhere east of the three-mile limit, where there ain't no ten commandments and a man can quench his thirst. Cuba seems to be the first convenient station on the line of escape from all-encompassing aridity, and reports indicate that the island has already gone a long way towards transforming itself into a paradise that shall outdo the wildest promises of a Mohammed. For neither Mohammed's heaven nor any other comprised hotels at thirty dollars a day and gambling palaces that surpass all that the world has ever seen. It is plain that we shall soon have to annex the island, or our locomotive engineers and window cleaners will have just grounds for complaining that they can not meet the high cost of living—in Cuba. Quite seriously, along with the high cost of living there is the cost of living high that we are paying dearly for. There is no need of a Daniel to come to judgment on a matter of this sort; he who runs may read what the hand writes on the wall.

THE daily press of last week contained obituaries of a descendant of Mr. Peter Stuyvesant. The old Hollander's fate has been better than his name. For Stuifzand, in Dutch, means "loose sand that is blown away by the wind," but the Knickerbocker's name and race have proved firm rock not to be injured by the breath of time. English and American history has given due prominence to the figure of the stubborn opponent of British rule in the Dutch colony. It is one of the finest traits of the Anglo-Saxon that he knows how to be fair to a beaten antagonist. That virtue should still hold even with regard to an enemy who, unlike Petrus Stuyvesant, did not, in the manner of his fighting, live up to our own ideals of fair dealing. We are thinking of the complaint made in the Senate about the promised publication, this month, of General Ludendorff's story of the great war. Senator Chamberlain desires that the newspapers refuse publication. But, apart from the fact that such a course would run counter to the best of Anglo-Saxon traditions, it would be detrimental to ourselves as well. For in the hearing of the enemy's version lies the best antidote against a chauvinistic teaching of history. The average reader, indeed, has neither time nor discrimination enough to weigh opposing views and draw his own conclusions, and we admit that he should be protected against a one-sided propaganda. But this could be done by better methods than suppression, if the publishers could be brought to understand their responsibility towards the reading public. We should not object to, but even applaud, the publication of the German general's memoirs, if they were brought out with a running comment representing the Entente version of the same story, written with the ability and authority requisite for such a task.

ONE result of women's new war-found capacities is to be seen in the determined efforts that are being made to open new lines of effort to women and to put them on equal footing with men in the old lines. The Federation of Women's Civil Service Organizations is preparing a movement "to open civil service examinations to women; to abolish sex eligible lists; to secure equal pay for equal work in the public service and equal opportunity for advancement; to obtain appointments for women on civil service commissions." For this some new legislation will be necessary, but for the most part only change of rules by the Civil Service Commission or a change of ordinary practice, in all of which it is to be hoped the movement will meet little opposition on any but grounds of real expediency and efficiency. In the civil service we need ability and conscientiousness, and these desirable qualities have not been distributed among us humans on strictly sex lines.

SINCE the conviction of A. C. Townley and Joseph Gilbert by a jury of farmers at Jackson, Minnesota, on July 12, on a charge of "conspiracy to teach disloyalty," the friends of these gentlemen have been busy casting aspersions on the character of the judge, the jury, the county attorney, the witnesses, and all connected with the prosecution. To their way of thinking, the trial is to be regarded as a vindication of the accused and a condemnation of all the accusers. It may be worth while to show how little validity there is in many of their complaints.

The friends of the accused allege that the trial was held in a small town in a remote corner of Minnesota, omitting to state that Jackson was the place where Gilbert's offense was committed, and where he was promptly arrested and indicted by the local authorities on their own initiative. They say that the trial was delayed for over a year, but do not mention that the delay was due to the defendant's own demurrer to the indictment, which the judge—now accused of gross bias—overruled, but nevertheless certified to the Supreme Court. They say that the jury was hand-picked by political opponents, but the record shows that counsel for the defense declared themselves well satisfied with the jury. They point out the fact that the defense were allowed only four peremptory challenges, but the record shows also that they used only two of these and that the prosecution did not use any. They think it worth noting that each member of the jury possessed his own auto, but do not state whether it was a Packard or a Ford. They accuse the prosecuting attorneys of making long speeches as compared with the attorneys for the defense, but the record shows that the reverse was the case. They say that Teigen, the chief witness for the prosecution, had been in a Wisconsin jail on a charge of forgery; but they omit to say that it was the Non-Partisan League that had him arrested, on the eve of the trial, and that the charge was dismissed on the very next day. They say the Court should have granted a change of venue on account of local prejudice, and it must be admitted that the accused might have had a better chance of acquittal in some community less loyal than Jackson County.

It is almost like beating the air to refute arguments so unsubstantial as these, especially as they fade away at the least opposition, only to reappear in another quarter in slightly different guise. However that may be, as there is to be a motion for a new trial the case is not yet closed, and fair-minded people will reserve their opinion.

THERE is a small but very dogmatic sect of journalists in this country who have been nosing about amid the refuse of the old order in Europe in company with the Bolsheviki and other friends, and have ferreted out secret treaties and understandings which, they aver, have a most evil odor. As to whether the aforesaid odors are really nasty, or merely a little musty and unpleasant, there might be lengthy debate between experts in such matters; but the most peculiar feature of the case is not the corruption that is found so much as the mental pathology of the finders. All odors are alike to them, apparently; but, inasmuch as the stench of Germany's misdeeds rises to Heaven, attention must now be given to the rotteness of our allies. These gentlemen seem to be sorry when they find anything which adds to the total of Germany's guilt, but extremely glad when they can point an accusing finger at England, France, or Belgium and show that they were not spotless.

Fairness, evidently, in the mind—or nose—of these faithful searchers, demands that they find odor for odor, sin for sin, so that the scales of justice may remain in eternal balance, none being weighed therein and found wanting. One is reminded of the words of Paul in discussing the Mosaic law: "If a man offend in one point he is guilty of all." This is old-fashioned theology with a vengeance, yet it was applied by the gentlemen in question during the course of the war as well as now, though how they could be so nicely logical at such a time passes ordinary comprehension. For example, when the Lusitania was sunk, they were shocked, of course, but when the British took American ships into harbor for examination they were up in arms against so gross a violation of the rights of neutrals. To them all transgressions were mortal sins, especially those which to the common mind appeared most venial. Right was right and law was law, and no nation had a right to call names, because all had sinned and come short of the ideal. What would have become of the world if the plain people had been possessed of this spirit, it requires no gift of divination to discover.

A STROLL up Broadway at the luncheon hour gives one cause for reflection. The individual walker's accustomed pace is involuntarily slackened down to the gregarious trend. There may only be one in a thousand passers-by who marks that slow onward move, but it is to that one man's beat that the nine hundred and ninety-nine others time their step. The small minority of slack ers regulates the motion of the crowd; to them yield even the impetuous, the foolhardy, the headlong; to run is the single man's privilege, the sum of individuals can only stroll along the crowded road. It is not otherwise with ideas. "Les idées marchent," to be sure; a stagnant idea were a contradiction in terms. But the speed of that march decreases in proportion to the increase of their number. In times when one all-embracing thought obsesses the minds of men it rapidly gains ground, as it finds no competing ideas in its way to retard its onward motion. The primitive mind of the Russian people is such a broad way, empty of contending thought. That accounts for the amazing rapidity with which the Bolshevik idea has run its reckless course through the country of the moujik. In sole possession of the unbeaten road, it could travel with the speed of a sledge across the snow. But it has to be more considerate on the crowded thoroughfare of Western civilization. There Bolshevism walks shoulder to shoulder with a variegated multitude of isms; its progress must mechanically slow down to the moderate trend of a host of ideas that are moving on to distant and widely different aims. The freedom of the road is a privilege granted to all, and the people whose mind is freest of access to the greatest diversity of thought is likely to be safest from the danger of being rushed headlong into error and perdition.

THE experience of Australia and New Zealand has shown that compulsory arbitration is a very imperfect remedy for strikes because of the difficulty of enforcing the awards of a court against a large body of recalcitrant workmen. Even the Canadian Industrial Disputes Act, which provides, in the case of public utilities, for compulsory delay pending investigation, is objected to by the workers, who do not like to give notice of their intentions, preferring that a strike should fall—like a bolt from a clear sky—upon the unsuspecting employers, and, incidentally, upon the unready public. Yet what have the public done that they should be victimized in this way? Are they to take their medicine with a cheerful smile every time a strong body of workers choose to cease functioning and thus tie up some essential industry? And is the public to wait patiently for the I. W. W. in its own good time to bring on the long-threatened general strike of transport workers whereby to usher in the social revolution? Such questions are in the air nowadays, and an answer must be found. The late strike of the Interborough employees in New York was verily a spectacle for gods and men. It was great to see the cheerful public driving home through the pouring rain—some in autos, some in trucks, some in coal wagons—nearly all of them taking the performance as a huge joke. If the strike had not been settled that very evening, the joke would have seemed less obvious on the following day and the day after.

We ought to have a law like that which has long been in force in Canada. But, as the Review showed in a recent editorial on Direct Action and the Public, the long-suffering public are by no means so helpless as they think; for, if any particular group of workers quit their post, a volunteer industrial army can "carry on" until the strikers—or their employers, as the case may be—are willing to listen to reason. Now comes Lord Wrenbury, formerly Lord Justice of Appeals, in a letter to the London Times, proposing to form a permanent association of industrial volunteers, who shall hold themselves in readiness to take the place of strikers when the public welfare is seriously menaced. "Strike-breakers" and "scabs" they would be called, no doubt; but citizens may be found to bear even that ignominy for the public good. Whether these suggestions be carried out or not, organized labor might do well to consider them before going too far along the line of direct action.

"SPEAKING of the Irish," said Professor MacAndrew Cantlie, with a quizzical smile, "I understand them in part, but not altogether, as I have some of the Celt in me, but not too much. If they were Scots—which unfortunately they can not be, Providence having ordained it otherwise—they would have less to say about independence and home rule and Ireland for themselves alone, and more about recognizing the Union as a fait accompli and regulating their lives accordingly. We Scots, as everybody knows, were independent for centuries, with kings of our own and chiefs and parliaments and wars and great and glorious victories, like Bannockburn, to make us proud, and some few defeats, like Flodden, to keep us humble; but when the Union came, much to our disgust—for we disliked the English then as we do now—we took it as an act of Providence, foreordained from all eternity. Yes. There we were tied to England for better for worse, and we determined to make the best of it. Speaking quantitatively and superficially, we were England's; but in a deeper and truer sense, because of our superior quality, England was ours. Like the Israelites of old we marched in to possess the land, singing a battle song of our own, 'All the Blue Bonnets are over the Border.' Man, but it was a great invasion. Like Julius Cæsar, we came, we saw, we conquered; and we set ourselves down in the gates of the enemy, where we are to-day. You have heard of Gladstone? Son of a Scotsman. And of John Stuart Mill? Another of that ilk. And the names of Campbell and Fraser and Henderson and Macdonald and all the rest are familiar to your ear—you will find them in any list of England's mighty men. As to recent times, I will admit that yon little Welshman, Lloyd George, is Premier, but what could he do without Bonar Law and the two Geddeses, the brains of his Cabinet? And what would the army be without Haig, or the navy without Beatty—Irish born but of Scotch ancestry—or the English Church without its two archbishops, Davidson and Lang? Possibly Professor de Valera could see the point if he were a Scotsman or even a real Irishman."

The Opportunity of the Seven

FROM the time that the seven Republican Senators known as moderate reservationists first announced their attitude, it has been evident that they hold the key of the situation. The time has now come for them to make effective use of the commanding position which they occupy. There has been no sign of any weakening of conviction on their part, and there is every reason to believe that a more or less considerable number of other Republican Senators have come to share their attitude. The radical course taken by the Foreign Relations Committee on the question of Shantung, followed as it was by the adoption of amendments vitally altering the treaty in other particulars, has deepened the line of division between the seven and the Republican leadership. Senators McCumber and Nelson on the floor of the Senate, and Senator Spencer in an interview, reasserted their opposition to the policy of the committee very soon after it had shown its hand. It is not necessary to accuse anybody of being actuated by an express desire to wreck the treaty; but it is manifest that the course laid out by the Foreign Relations Committee is one which, if adopted by the Senate, would have that result. And the group of seven are sincerely and profoundly anxious to save the treaty if they can.

Have they the courage of their convictions? Upon the answer to this question everything turns. If they have, now is the time for them to make such an announcement to the Senate and to the country as will secure the great end which they have at heart, and which circumstances make it possible for them to command. The changes which the Foreign Relations Committee proposes can not be adopted if they vote against them. On the other hand the treaty as it stands, and unaccompanied by reservations embodied in the act of ratification, can not be adopted without their assent. It is quite inconceivable that anything which may yet be brought out, either in the Senate or by the President, can be of such character as to affect the fundamental reasons on which the position of the seven and of those who think with them is based. It would therefore be no act of arrogance or assumption for the seven, at this critical moment in the development of the treaty situation, to make a firm and dignified statement of the course which they feel in duty bound to pursue. Others may be playing for position—may be making moves that mean something else than what they seem to mean, with a view to strategic advantage. But of this the seven need not fear to be accused. They evidently mean exactly what they say. The only question is whether their action will be as bold and firm as their thought has been conscientious and unbiased—whether they will rise to the height of their great duty and their extraordinary opportunity.

How profoundly this act of courageous and conscientious self-assertion would affect the situation, it is hardly necessary to point out. On the one hand it would reduce all proposals of the kind which the Foreign Relations Committee has so light-heartedly adopted to the status of mere gestures. This alone would obviate an incalculable amount of time-wasting debate in the Senate; for, with their defeat foredoomed, not much more than the mere form of supporting the proposals would be gone through. On the other hand, when the country's attention is fixed on the President's speeches on his tour across the continent, the people would have in their minds, for the first time, a clear conception of the practical alternatives before them. They would know that in order to secure a prompt disposal of the treaty it is only necessary that a small additional number of Republican Senators should align themselves with the moderate reservationists and that the President should assent to the reservations being made part of the ratification instead of being voted as a mere expression of the Senate's views. With public interest clearly focused on this essential fact, public opinion could be counted on to crystallize in an effective way. That the result would be a speedy settlement of the long-drawn-out dispute there is every reason to believe.

Rarely does such an opportunity come to any man or group of men. If they will seize it now, at the golden moment, they will do an act upon which throughout their lives they will have a right to look back with just pride. And for the doing of it they are, in one respect, in a position of unusual advantage. The treaty has not been made a party issue. To assert such a position as we have indicated when it runs counter to the policy of those who are regarded as the party leaders does, indeed, require courage; but it can not possibly in this instance involve anything like proscription or persecution. Half a century ago there was a group of seven Republican Senators who performed for their country an imperishable service for which the judgment of history has done them due honor; but in the heat of party feeling in those intense post-bellum days they suffered obloquy for what was regarded by partisans as party treason. The seven Republicans who voted for the acquittal of Andrew Johnson were honored even at the time by those whose voices were most worth heeding; but, as the consequence of a noble act which all now recognize to have been of inestimable benefit to their country, they suffered martyrdom at the hands of the masses of their party. No such prospect faces the seven Senators who now stand between the President on the one hand and the extremists of their own party on the other. Without defiance of any party decree, they can declare with firmness and decision as their active purpose what they have already declared to be their conscientious conviction. If they shall do this, they will make themselves the instruments of the solution of a problem momentous almost beyond precedent, and will earn the gratitude of their countrymen to-day as well as that lasting honor which history accords to great achievement.

The Future of Labor

PRESIDENT WILSON'S Labor Day announcement that he will call, for as early a date as practicable, a conference of "authoritative representatives of labor and of those who direct labor" is most welcome. Such a conference has long been desired by thoughtful men of almost all shades of opinion. Whether the President has in view the advocacy, on his own part, in connection with this conference, of any definite policy must for the present be matter of conjecture. His proposal is that the conference shall "discuss fundamental means of bettering the whole relationship of capital and labor and putting the whole question of wages upon another footing." Whether this points to the bringing about of essential changes by governmental interposition, or only towards such encouragement and illumination as may be supplied to individual efforts by the collective wisdom of those who take part in the conference, it is at the moment impossible to say.

That "the world will not be what it was before the war" has become a platitude. Nobody disputes it; perhaps nobody has disputed it from the time that the war and its accompaniments assumed the stupendous character with which during the past two years we have become familiar. But while there is general agreement on the proposition, there is every possible diversity as to its interpretation. To some it means that the very foundations of the existing social order are destined soon to disappear; to others it means only that important changes, which, though by no means revolutionary, seemed only yesterday to be matters of the more or less distant future are to-day on the eve of realization. While the former view gives rise to by far the greater share of brilliant writing and of moving oratory, it is the latter which, we believe, more and more plainly represents the conviction of sober thinkers, whatever their personal predilections. The changes that we are about to witness—in countries which like our own, or England, or France, have not been subjected to volcanic upheaval—will not be brought about by the introduction of radically new factors into the social situation, but by the intensified and accelerated working of forces that have long been operative.

Among these none is more important than that which tends to the humanizing of the relations between labor and capital. The ideas of a better understanding, a more harmonious coöperation, between employer and employed, which had so long been floating about with little apparent result except in isolated instances, have suddenly become endowed with a new energy, and have found genuine recognition in quarters where before they commanded at most but a languid interest. And there is every reason to hope that they will within a short time become embodied in actual practice to an extent that a few years ago would have seemed impossible.

The direction which this movement is taking is, above all, that of giving to labor a voice in the adjustment of working conditions, not by the occasional granting of specific demands, but by continuous contact with the management, by candid interchange of views and frank communication of the facts of the situation. It would be idle to deny that such a course is beset with great difficulties. It demands a degree of tact and intelligence, of moderation and good sense, on the part of both employer and employed, which are not easily to be counted on. In many instances, no doubt, even with these qualities present in a high degree, there are obstacles too great to be overcome. But to say that there is difficulty is only to admit that a great result can not be obtained by a mere turn of the hand. If there are to be better relations between labor and capital, we must begin by bringing employer and employed closer together as human beings; let this but be generally recognized, and ways will be found for overcoming the difficulties. To realize what is needed is half the battle. Sanitary surroundings, "welfare" arrangements, and the like, were the chief objects held in view by progressive employers in the past decade or two, and this was very well as far as it went. But the new movement strikes far deeper; and while it presents correspondingly greater difficulty, there is good reason to expect that it will spread no less rapidly.

Alongside this movement there is that represented by the profit-sharing idea. This, too, has its difficulties—equally serious perhaps, though of a different kind. But along this line, too, we may expect marked progress in the near future. There is one factor that obviously tells in favor of profit-sharing and which is not so obviously present in the idea of the shop-council. Profit-sharing can be put upon a basis in which the share of the profit that goes to labor depends, partially or wholly, on the efficiency—or rather let us say the productivity—of the labor. In the Taylor plan, the plan of "scientific management," this is the sole determinant of labor's extra reward; so much so that the plan is usually not classed—and rightly not classed—under the head of profit-sharing at all. Labor looks askance at scientific management, partly owing to a fear which, whether justified or not, rests upon a real basis—the fear of undue "speeding up"—and partly owing to the deep-rooted but fallacious belief that increased productiveness is contrary to the interests of labor. But the basis of profit-sharing may range anywhere from a division of profits based on a sheer calculation of the productivity of the labor to a division according to a fixed percentage, wholly irrespective of any such calculation. In any case, the workmen have a direct and tangible interest in the prosperity of the concern for which they work; and the consciousness of this interest can not fail to affect profoundly their mental attitude.

The difficulties connected with profit-sharing are of quite a different nature from those that pertain to the shop-council plan. Here it is not the personal, but the economic, element that presents the obstacle. The most familiar objection to the sharing of profits is that its natural complement would be the sharing of losses, and that labor is neither willing nor able to accept this. But this difficulty, while real, is by no means insuperable. A margin which is to be untouched in the sharing of profits—a sort of sinking fund set aside in every good year, to cover the losses of the bad years, whether past or future—is one means by which the difficulty might be met. A more serious trouble, perhaps, relates to the computation of the profits themselves—the determination, for instance, of how much of the proceeds should be reckoned not as profits but as necessary to cover, besides ordinary depreciation of plant, the sacrifices of good plant which the march of improvement makes necessary from time to time. But serious as any of the difficulties may be, there is surely a large range of cases in which they can be overcome, given a genuine and hearty desire to overcome them.

The stirring up of thought and feeling which is now going on all over the world will certainly turn the attention of great numbers of employers into such channels as these. There will be conferences and conventions at which the various proposed methods of bettering industrial relations will be considered. Scientific study and governmental inquiry will throw more and more light on the question of the practicability of the methods in any particular type of enterprise. With the ideas themselves thus made familiar instead of remote, and with their applicability a matter of experience instead of guesswork, headway will be made at a rate of which there has hitherto been no prospect. In the matter of profit-sharing, progress may be relatively slow; certainly the demand for it on the part of the workers is far less widespread than is that for some kind of voice in the determination of shop conditions and shop management. But in this latter direction there is every prospect of great advance in the near future. In our own country, we have a way of being comparatively slow in taking up new methods of dealing with industrial problems; but once they get a real hold on us they spread with astonishing rapidity. The way in which State after State enacted workmen's compensation laws, once the ball was set rolling, is a striking illustration of this. If any plan for enlarged participation of labor in questions of management proves itself a good thing in a few conspicuous instances, it will require no compulsion to secure its adoption by hundreds of establishments in every part of the country.

It is in the steady development of progress towards better relations between labor and capital, through the voluntary adoption of methods that have proved their merit, that the best hope of benefit to labor and the community at large is to be seen. Resort to governmental dictation would not only be full of hazard as regards its immediate results, but would carry with it implications going far beyond the original purpose. You can not compel industry and trade to follow the ruts laid down for it by centralized authority and preserve the immeasurable benefits of individual initiative, and the elasticity which adjustment to the infinite variety of modern enterprise demands. The temper of the country is favorable, in a degree far beyond all past record, to broad and liberal methods of dealing with all questions of labor. Upon the working of this spirit, stimulated, as it is sure more and more to be, by the pressure of public sentiment, we may rely for great and steady progress. But a plunge into a régime of governmental dictation would be almost sure to bring about either a reaction towards the conditions which have been complained of in the past or agitation for a downright socialist organization of society. There is nothing, we believe, either in the condition of the country or in the temper of the vast majority of its people, to justify any such experiment.

Louis Botha

THE death of General Botha calls up recollections of a time and a world which, though less than two decades have since gone by, bear little resemblance to the present. The right of self-determination was yet to be invented, and British imperialism, being rampant then, trampled upon the freedom of the two Boer Republics. Lloyd George was in the opposition and attacked the Government and the jingo spirit it played upon with so much fierceness that he narrowly escaped stoning by an incensed London mob. Botha stood in the "veldt" at the head of his brave little army, winning by a successful though hopeless guerrilla war against the "Rooineks" (Rednecks), the admiration of the world, which was not yet aware of his abilities in the field of political action. And President Kruger had gone to Europe, in hope of moving the cabinets of the great Continental Powers to joint intercession with the Government in London on behalf of the two Republics in agony. His chief confidence was fixed upon Wilhelm von Hohenzollern, whose sensational telegraphic message to him justified those sanguine expectations.

Paris gave the President a generous, sympathetic reception, regardless of the impression which such a welcome might create on the other side of the Channel. Berlin came next on the President's programme. On his way thither Cologne received him with a spontaneous outburst of feeling for him and his suffering people. But there and then his progress came to a sudden end: a telegram from Berlin requested him to quit the country and not to insist on an interview with the Kaiser. "Deutsche Treue" forsook the South-African "Stammgenossen" in their hour of direst need. General Botha was forced to give up a struggle which had become hopeless. Kruger remained an exile in Holland, and the Kaiser-König in Potsdam made it his boast that he himself had suggested to the British Government the plan of campaign which brought the South-African War to a successful end.

And now Holland harbors again a famous exile, though not with the homage and love which she gave to "Oom Paul." The proud Emperor who requested old Kruger to quit the country has quitted it himself in deeper disgrace than his dismissal of the President could attach to the latter's departure from Cologne. Lloyd George is Prime Minister in London, and Botha, the defeated enemy of seventeen years ago, dies Premier of the South African Union, not long after returning from Versailles, where he sat as one of the British Empire's councillors in judgment over the Kaiser's Germany.

It is fruitless to speculate on what the world might have been if that ominous telegram had never been sent to Cologne, and if the Emperor had dared, at that time, to draw the sword in defense of a just cause. "Gottes Mühlen mahlen langsam aber sicher," God's mills grind slow but sure, runs the German proverb. By fearing to do in defense of the oppressed what he afterwards dared do to oppress the defenseless, he dug his own inglorious grave.

But the grave into which, last week, the remains of General Botha were lowered will be a famous landmark for all time to come. It will be honored not only by South Africa, which indeed owed him the greatest debt, but by the gratitude and remembrance of the world. For his championship of freedom did not limit itself to the cause of his own people. Rising above the bitter memories of his own defeat, he gave his support wholeheartedly to the victor when the latter rose in arms to defend Belgium and the freedom of the world. The General's tomb will be a monument not only to himself but also to the wisdom and generosity of British rule, which made such a miraculous change possible. Botha had, it is true, his opponents among the Boers, who did not approve of his siding with the Briton. Hertzog's party, the nationalists, considered him a traitor to the injured cause of the Dutch in South Africa, which, in their eyes, could be righted only by the restoration of the independent Boer Republics. Botha, however, like his friend and colleague Jannie Smuts, scanned farther horizons than fall within the scope of party politicians concerned with the immediate future. His leadership pointed the way towards a greater South Africa, an Anglo-Dutch Dominion where, under Dutch Roman law, the two white races would gradually unite into one Africander nation, a development which the war has precipitated beyond calculation or hope. The Dutch element is not in danger of decline in this fusion of the two races. On the contrary, there are unmistakable signs of a strong revival and extension of Africander Dutch all over South Africa. The speech of the Boer, no less simple in structure than the English, is gaining ground and bids fair to become the ruling language of the Dominion. Its rich vocabulary is proving its capacity for the expression of high thought and deep emotion. Botha, the hero and statesman, will survive himself in the verse of the poets who will sing his praise in his own Africander Dutch.

England in Persia

THE arrival of the Shah of Persia at Constantinople on board a British cruiser coincided with the publication by L'Echo de Paris of an Anglo-Persian treaty which is decried by the French press as constituting a complete British protectorate over Persia. The consternation caused by this pact in Paris is somewhat naïve, as the past history of Central Asia and the part played in it by British diplomacy find their logical sequence in this fastening of the British grip on the Shah's country. England has thereby reverted to a traditional policy from which, to the astonishment of Europe and the resentment of the radical London press, she departed in the conclusion of the Anglo-Russian convention of 1907. The growing power of Germany and her Drang nach Osten had seemed to the rulers of British India a greater danger than the steady penetration of Central Asia by Russian influence. The "secret" treaty of Bjorkö, concluded during Mr. Witte's absence in America, between the Tsar and Kaiser Wilhelm—who, abusing the loss of power and prestige which Russia had sustained in her war with Japan, had practically forced this pact upon his helpless "dear Nicky"—had been a warning to England to change her anti-Russian policy in Asia.

At Portsmouth British influences were at work in August, 1905, to secure milder peace terms for Russia, and at the Conference of Algeciras England joined Russia in supporting the policy of her French ally. The Northcliffe press sang the praises of the Russian people and its recuperative power, thus preparing public opinion in England for the acceptance of the Anglo-Russian Convention, which Sir Edward Grey concluded in 1907. The liberal and radical press strongly condemned this alliance with the autocracy of the knout. "Grey must go," was the heading over a violent leader in the Daily News. But Sir Edward gained a majority for his point of view that "rather than being antagonists, we should be in Russia's councils," and, in spite of Daily News denunciations, remained in office until the course of events brought on by the war compelled him to resign. The Convention, coming soon after the peace of Portsmouth, constituted a rehabilitation of Russia as a Great Power; British foreign policy understood better than the amateurish ex-Kaiser how to win a humbled antagonist: not by abusing his weakness but by making him forget the humiliation.

The pact had reference to three semi-independent states of Central Asia: Thibet, Afghanistan, and Persia. The two signatories recognized the sovereign rights of China in Thibet and the integrity of the Thibetan territory. Russia admitted that Afghanistan lay outside her sphere of influence, the Emir, as far as his foreign policy was concerned, standing in the relation of a suzerain prince to the government at Calcutta; but in Persia England made a concession to Russia: the country was divided into a northern and a southern sphere of influence, with a neutral zone between. The northern sphere, where English influence had gained ground in many ways, was ceded to Russia, the old antagonist of British Central Asiatic policy.

The treaty was followed by a German countermove, whose success was secured with the help of the camarilla of the Tsar at St. Petersburg: in 1910 Tsar and Kaiser concluded the treaty of Potsdam, under which provision was made that the Bagdad line was to be connected at the Persian frontier with the projected Russo-Persian railway net. Thus England's position in Persia was made precarious: to obviate a coöperation of Russian and German interests she had to yield part of her influence in the country of the Shah to one of her two competitors, whose adherence to the treaty could not even be relied upon.

The war has changed the situation. The two competing Powers are momentarily powerless. The time is propitious for a reestablishment of Britain's suzerainty over Persia. It may take both Russia and Germany only a generation to recuperate and recommence the race for expansion which ended in their present collapse. To fasten, at this opportune moment, a stronger hold on Persia and transform her into a buffer state between British India and the territory of the Soviet Republic is, from the point of view of British colonial policy, a demand of self-preservation. The Shah's journey to Europe under British auspices is obviously a part of this scheme, which constitutes a return to the policy adhered to until 1907. The evidences of British ascendancy in European affairs will impress him with the advisability of a course to which he may only reluctantly have resigned himself.

The Daylight-Saving Fight

TWO Presidential vetoes were not enough to deter a few farmers and their strangely zealous friends from robbing the people of the United States of one of the few undoubted benefits that recent legislation had conferred upon them—the added hour of summer daylight. For their loss the people have only themselves to thank. And how great a loss it is, and how shamefully they let such a boon slip from their hands, they may now at last begin to realize. It is the old story of a huge, careless, unorganized majority made the victim of a small, determined, and narrowly selfish minority. It is no longer necessary to dwell on the benefits arising from daylight saving. The people have had a taste of them and it is not likely that they are going tamely to surrender them. Fortunately, it lies quite within their power to retain them, if they but choose to exert themselves a little. If the cities and towns, through their Boards of Aldermen, will vote to set forward the hour-hand of the clock, forward it goes, and there, after a little preliminary confusion, is a happy end of the matter. Happy even for the farmer, for in a few years he will grow accustomed to the change and drop his nonsensical talk about people trying to fool themselves into thinking it's later than 'tis. The Dutch farmer, though he grumbled at first quite as loud as his American brother, accepted the arrangement cheerfully at the end of a three-year trial.

Such is the programme to which the National Daylight Saving Association proposes to devote its best energies. It adds the excellent suggestion that clocks should be set forward on the last Sunday in April instead of in March, and back again on the last Sunday of September instead of in October. By far the greater part of the saving falls within the shorter period, and the change would remove from discussion the two points—Spring and Fall—at which the farmer came nearest to having a genuine grievance. There is every prospect that this procedure will meet with success. The Board of Aldermen of New York City have already, by unanimous vote, expressed themselves in favor of daylight saving. New York State is similarly on record, and several cities East and West. The means to recover the lost goods is clearly pointed out. If the people want it they can get it, and Federal confirmation of their action will follow as a matter of course. If the hitherto supine majority is ever to assert itself—and it can not afford much longer to postpone laying aside its good-natured lethargy—it could ask no better rallying point than this. It is not a matter to loose unholy passions. It is not a question of indispensable good against incalculable harm. It is a very considerable good against a very slight inconvenience. It is a case of an overwhelming majority against a small minority. Let the majority rouse itself and see if in an easily attainable point like this it is capable of ruling. Then, perhaps, we shall become fitted to pass on to greater things.

A Bas Literary Profiteers

THE contributors who have been batten on the bounty of the Review have been properly brought to book by the tax authorities of this State. Lurking in their scholarly fastnesses from Maine to Oregon, they have duly received their space cheques and by so much have diminished the taxable resources of the great State of New York. But that is over. We have been ordered to reveal these secret profits and to withhold on every dollar one per cent. for eventual satisfaction of the State income tax. Meanwhile our prosperous contributors are torn between reluctance to disgorge their inordinate gains and pride at being amalgamated to the notorious category of profiteers.

Justice is closing down upon this over-privileged class. It is clear that a magazine contributor who lives in Massachusetts, but sells all his copy in New York, must now pay income tax to the nation, to the State where he lives himself, and to the State where his editor does business. But this is a very simple and bearable case. Take the situation of an author who has slyly extended his connections from Boston to New York, thence to the homes of the Ladies' Home Journal, and of the Geographical Magazine, has experienced the bounty of the Bellman in Minneapolis and of Sunset in Los Angeles, perhaps has been on the payroll of the Sewanee Review or of the South Atlantic Quarterly, has drawn as well rich "space" from the Yale Review, and has had valuable consideration, if not cash, from Modern Language Notes, and the American Journal of Archaeology, now imagine his paymasters duly traced and his fractional income taxes assessed in ten States, he having already paid two income taxes at home—what will be the effect upon that author's character?

We greatly fear it will make for pride in what has been, if an eccentric, on the whole a reasonably modest class. To collect assessments may cost a little more than to subscribe to a clippings bureau, hitherto the average author's most costly besetting vice, but it may more potently minister to the pleasing sense of being known. Besides, we are only at the beginnings of things. Always writers have been taxed where they reside, but this principle has been applied in the large and without due refinement. If it is reasonable to tax authors where they are paid and also where they write, then as the paymaster's office is precisely located so should the spot where the copy is actually produced.

That an author resident at Tenafly actually produces all his copy there is a crude assumption. For purposes of convenience it will be well to continue to tax him on all his income there, but as a matter of fact and record his best seller may have been written in his Adirondack camp, or in somebody else's, or in territorial waters of almost any State, while the climax which made the best seller what it is may have been penned in Utah on a transcontinental express. It behooves all thrifty communities to keep track of their authors and author transients. If it can be proved that Mr. Robert Chambers used, for instance, the facilities of Chatham, Massachusetts, for conceiving the sub-aqueous kiss that made the "Fighting Chance" famous, why then should not Mr. Chambers pay town rate in Chatham village until the easement shall have been requited in cash?

In general it is wise to go for the literary feller. He has rather few friends. You couldn't make a Connecticut farmer pay taxes in New York on eggs shipped to that market. But eggs is eggs, whereas book reviews, sonnets, and serials are nondescript and apparently without right of city. Besides it can only do good to stir the author up. All the world knows that he thrives on uncertainty, learning in suffering what he gives in song. If enough men of letters are subjected to two full income taxes and half a dozen fractional ones it should reduce that complacency which has kept American letters in a subordinate estate. Decimal taxation may well produce the longed-for great American novel. We sincerely trust that our vigilant tax authorities will not let escape any author who can be proved guilty of any income whatever.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

The Question of Thrace

OWING to recent developments in Paris, Thrace seems to be the chief difficulty of the Peace Conference in reaching an agreement regarding the treaty with Bulgaria. Press reports attribute the complication to the attitude of the American delegates, who, under Douglas Johnson's influence, have declared in favor of leaving Western Thrace to Bulgaria, against the recommendation made by the technical committee on the Greek question. The same reports have it that the United States is alone in this stand and that all the other Powers represented in the supreme council, including England, France, Japan, and Italy, are in favor of the Greek view. Now, by the treaty of Bucharest of 1913, the territory of Thrace conquered from Turkey east of the Nestos River, with the exception of a narrow strip yielded to Greece for strategic reasons, was conceded to Bulgaria, who thereby gained access to the Aegean between the Nestos and the Hebrus (Maritsa) rivers. It is this part that Greece demands in order to obtain a continuous territory bordering on the proposed state of Constantinople to the east and in order to exclude Bulgaria from the Aegean.

About forty miles directly north from the mouth of the Nestos on the northeastern boundary of Greece there is the height of Yula, or Hill 2,177, near the sources of the Arda river, which flows eastward into the Hebrus not far from Adrianople. The Arda, forming a natural boundary between northern and southern Thrace, is proposed by Venizelos as the dividing line between Bulgaria and Greece. From the confluence of the Arda and the Hebrus, the proposed boundary is identical with the Turkish frontier of 1913, and runs first northwest along the Hebrus to Jisr Mustafa Pasha, thence north to the neighborhood of Dirinji, and thence eastward to Iniada Cape.

The population of Thrace presents the usual variety of a Turkish province. The old Thracians, whose native deities exercised a great influence over the religion of the ancient Greeks, were closely akin to the Pelasgians, the aborigines of Greece. The Greek equivalent of the word religion is θρησκεία, which means simply Thracian ritual. The legends of Orpheus, Linus, Thamyris, and Eumolpus originated in Thrace, or, at least, what was called Thrace, north of Olympus. But with the exception of what lives in the modern population as unconscious racial and folk-lore tradition, the old Thracians have been superseded entirely by the later immigrants, especially the Greeks, the Bulgarians, and the Turks.

The Turkish statistics of 1912 give the population of Thrace, including the villayets of Adrianople and Constantinople, as consisting of 957,477 Turks, 730,822 Greeks, 183,253 Armenians (almost entirely in the city of Constantinople), 112,174 Bulgarians, 65,821 Jews and 149,825 foreigners. The distribution of the national elements is unequal. Greeks are strong on the coast of Western Thrace and numerous everywhere in Eastern Thrace. With a few exceptions, the Bulgarians are grouped north of the Arda and towards Kirk Kilissi, a fact which Venizelos has considered in proposing the Arda as a boundary and the modification of the Turco-Bulgarian boundary in favor of Bulgaria in order to include within the Bulgarian state the Bulgarian settlements of the neighborhood of Kirk Kilissi.

Of the elements mentioned in these tables, the Greeks are undoubtedly the oldest. As far back as 657 B. C., Greek colonists founded the city of Byzantium, which later became Constantinople. Numerous other Greek colonies were established in Thrace in the seventh century which soon acquired power and prosperity. The Thracian Greeks contributed 120 ships in the Persian War. When the Eastern Roman Empire became Greek, Constantinople remained its capital until it fell to the Turkish invaders in 1453. Under the Turkish yoke the Greeks persevered in their national traditions and never lost hope of ousting their conquerors. In spite of the presence of the Turkish capital in their midst, they managed to the present day to exist and to control the economic and cultural life of the country. In numbers they are second only to the Turkish element. They own 653 schools with 1,493 teachers and 62,293 Greek students. Their literary societies in Constantinople and Adrianople not only have been centres of nationalism, but have also produced scholarly and literary work of distinctive merit, while their principal schools might serve as models even for the Athenians.

The Bulgarians of Thrace number less than 113,000 and are the outposts of their race, which dwells in a compact mass between the Danube and the Balkan mountains, and which in recent years has overflowed into Eastern Rumania. They made their first appearance south of the Danube in 679 A. D., i. e., about 1,350 years after the Greeks. At present, they form in Thrace only a minority, being even less numerous than the Armenians. Their schools are 126, against 653 Greek; their teachers number 225, against 1,493 Greek; and the Bulgarian students are 7,181, against 62,293 Greek. Roughly, there are in Thrace seven Greeks to one Bulgarian and most of the Bulgarians are included in the territory north of the Arda, which is not claimed by Greece.

The Turks invaded Thrace from Asia Minor in the fourteenth century and became masters of Adrianople in the year 1361, although their conquest of the Province was not completed until 1453, when Constantinople fell into their hands. They have been there as masters nearly 500 years, with full opportunity for economic, social, and political development under the very shadow of their Empire's capital. They exceeded the Greeks in 1912, according to Turkish figures, by 226,655 souls. But, strange to say, they still form the most ignorant and backward element of the population. Economically and culturally they are inferior not only to the Greeks, but also to the Armenians, Jews, and Bulgarians. In fact, they are the best illustration of the extent to which a purely fatalistic faith aided by a corrupt government can affect its followers.

Claiming Thrace for Greece on the basis of the principle of nationalities, the Greek Premier endeavors to strengthen the case of Greece by the following arguments:

1. Both Turkish and Bulgarian sources admit the numerical superiority of the Greeks over other Christian elements. The Turkish statistics have already been quoted. The Bulgarian recognition of the Greek majority is inferred from the Greco-Bulgarian agreement reached under the auspices of the Greek Patriarch and Bulgarian Exarch before the Turkish elections of 1912, by which the two nationalities decided to present a solid front against the Turkish vote by supporting in common seven Greek candidates and one Bulgarian.

2. Even though Constantinople be agreed upon as the capital of an international territory, the Greek claim to the rest of Thrace should be strengthened as a compensation for the loss of the Greek population of that city, amounting to more than 300,000.

3. Bulgaria, by the probable acquisition of Southern Dobrudja, where the Bulgarian nationality predominates, even after the loss of Western Thrace, will be the only enemy state which, in spite of its responsibility in protracting the war, will issue out of the struggle without territorial losses.

4. The economic reason for an access to the Aegean Sea for Bulgaria must not be preferred over the principle of nationality, a position rendered more plausible by the facts that Bulgaria is essentially an inland state, requiring no naval force for her defense, that she has free access to the Black Sea, which by the internationalization of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles will become an open sea, and that Greece, eager to preserve her territorial continuity and to provide for the defense of her island population against any future submarine basis on a Bulgarian Aegean coast, is willing to yield to Bulgaria free economic access to her ports under the same conditions which will be provided by the Peace Conference for other inland states, such as Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, and Austria.

5. Concession of any part of the Thracian coast to Bulgaria will be a favor to an enemy state against a friendly one basing her claim on the accepted principle of nationality.

On the other hand, the treaty of Bucharest, which was signed by Greece and which assigned Western Thrace to Bulgaria, is the great argument brought against the present Greek stand. Venizelos explains his former policy as a policy of necessary sacrifice, dictated by circumstances. Public opinion in Europe and America had become accustomed to look upon Bulgaria as the most important factor in the Balkans and did not cast aside her claims as altogether unreasonable. People abroad continued to think that Bulgaria was being robbed of the fruit of her labors, a fact made clear by the strong pressure exercised on Greece in order to induce her to yield to Bulgaria even the city of Cavalla. Strong friends, such as Russia and Austria-Hungary, were anxious to save Bulgaria from humiliation. Thus it came about that, in spite of her defeat, Bulgaria emerged from the treaty of Bucharest with an area of 47,750 square miles and a population of 5,517,700, i. e., greater in area, population, and wealth than either Serbia or Greece, her victors, which exceeded in numbers her entire nationality by almost a million. But present conditions have revealed the truth about Bulgaria. The principle of nationality should be substituted for that of the balance of power. Bulgaria joined Germany's forces in spite of the generous terms offered her by the Allies at the expense of Greece and Serbia. To pursue this policy of unreasonable generosity towards a state stigmatized by highly unprincipled conduct would be an injustice to the legitimate claims of other nations, based on accepted principles of self-determination and justice.

ARISTIDES E. PHOUTRIDES

Private Judgment and Inefficiency

THE conflict between authority and private judgment is as old as human history. It is to be found in religion, in philosophy, in science, in politics, and in law. The question at issue is one of practice rather than of theory, and it has less to do with the merits of the principles concerned than with their appropriate limits. Most people are agreed, for instance, that the Ten Commandments express the world's conclusions on certain ethical questions which it would be unwise to reopen. We are so nearly unanimous on this point that we have provided jails and insane asylums for the forcible detention of the unconvinced minority, and so far as I know there is no suggestion that we ought to depart from the practice. On the other hand, even so warm a dogmatist as Cardinal Newman was quite willing to admit that the experiments of Galileo were not a proper subject of ecclesiastical discipline. In short, both authority and private judgment are admittedly excellent things in their respective places; but the trouble begins the moment we attempt to determine what their places are.

The sea of authority (like Arnold's Sea of Faith) was once at the full, and Galileo was by no means the only victim who was caught in the undertow. There have been times when men have acted as if convinced of the truth of Pope's ponderous saying that whatever is right—when the obligation of conformity has stifled every walk of individual endeavor, and when art, letters, and the manifold details of personal conduct have alike been helpless in the dead hand of tradition. Those times are past, and I for one am unreservedly grateful that my lot was not cast in their midst. But in our own day and generation we have had an opportunity of seeing what things are likely to befall a civilization left high and dry on the sands of private judgment, and I have set out to discuss some of the disadvantages of that position from the standpoint of efficiency, because efficiency, although itself somewhat discredited by recent events, is nevertheless a word to conjure with.

It may be worth while to give a single illustration of its potency, out of many available. The prohibition movement in the United States is almost as old as our Government itself, and except for a few minor successes resulting from the wave of moral enthusiasm which swept the North in the decades immediately preceding the Civil War, its progress was negligible until a few years ago. At a time so recent as what a radical acquaintance of mine used to delight in calling "the late McKinley period," the passage by Congress of a constitutional amendment providing for national prohibition would have been absolutely unthinkable, and yet at the present writing such an amendment has actually been adopted and is about to be enforced. The striking reversal of sentiment which is reflected in these facts is the direct result of a change in the appeal of the prohibition propaganda. For more than a century the basis of that appeal was mainly religious. We were told that the use of intoxicating liquors was a sin, and the even current of public opinion flowed onward as unheeding as the Nile. But when the scientists unlimbered their batteries we suddenly became attentive. It was made clear to us by experiments of the psychological laboratories that a man who has imbibed even a tablespoonful of beer can not roll as many marbles into a given compartment as his unstimulated competitor, and insurance statistics were pressed into service in order to demonstrate that a moderate drinker enjoys an expectancy of life a definite number of days less than that of a total abstainer. Being firmly convinced of these facts, we have had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that prohibition is an unmixed blessing, and we have set about obtaining it for ourselves and our children. It is beside the point to question whether the ability to roll marbles accurately is an adequate test of a well-lived life, and whether the fine old maxim, non multa sed multum, applies to length of days as well as to the fruits of achievement. The point is that the argument from efficiency has done more for prohibition in twenty years than the argument from religion was able to do in a hundred. Consequently, it would be foolish to overlook so formidable an ally in any discussion which is even remotely directed ad hominem.

Now, as I conceive it, the argument from efficiency is all on the side of authority and against private judgment, and yet, side by side with the philosophy which would add inefficiency to the list of the seven deadly sins, has run in America a disposition to dismiss authority as a thing unworthy of serious consideration. This disposition has been least prominent in the realm of the exact sciences, possibly because the exact sciences, as has been aptly said, "are indeed well able to take care of themselves." Many a man who is quick to boast that he cares nothing for accepted standards in politics, art, or religion is nevertheless quite willing to accept the benefits of electric light without insisting on a personal trial of the inconveniences of the tallow dip and the fat lamp. But in almost every other connection we have become accustomed to hearing authority spoken of as if it were opposed to, or at least unconnected with, progress.

This attitude is the more curious, because, as a matter of fact, the exact opposite is the case. Not only is authority not opposed to progress, but it is the only possible basis of progress. A foundation is implied in the very definition of a superstructure. The idea of motion is as inseparably bound up with the idea of a starting place as a sense of difference is bound up with an antecedent sense of similarity. Only children demand proof in their own persons that fire is hot and that the moon can not be touched with the hand. It is because men have been willing to take something for granted that they have been free to move onward to something else. "The record of things past," said Louis XI, "is the most profitable, as well to console, advise and comfort us against adversity as to avoid the inconveniences before which others have fallen, and to encourage us to do well like the best." Unless, therefore, the present generation is blessed with a higher natural endowment than those which have gone before, it can ill afford to make light of the accumulated experience of antiquity. Still less can it afford to ignore that experience altogether. There is, Heaven knows, enough personal pain and cost in the age-old insistence of youth to taste for itself the fruit of the forbidden tree to discourage a deliberate repetition of the experiment on a larger scale.

The result of all this is that common sense would seem to suggest the wisdom of testing the conclusions of private judgment on any given subject with the weight of authority. If the two agree, the evidence on the point is cumulative and convincing. If they differ, the presumption is that the weight of authority is right—not only because authority represents an overwhelming numerical majority of personal opinions, but because it is a summary of experience rather than the expression of a mere hypothesis. I do not wish to be understood as saying that authority is infallible. The demonstration of the truth of the Copernican theory, for instance, struck down at a blow nearly the whole edifice of traditional astronomy. But the presumption is certainly the other way. There are, after all, only a few questions of transcendent importance under the sun. Civilization is not a new thing, and good minds have been busy with these questions since the dawn of recorded history. There is abundant evidence that the men of to-day are not the equals of the men of the Age of Pericles. Indeed, there is little evidence that the best men of to-day are superior to the best men of any enlightened age, but it by no means follows that there has been no progress since the Age of Pericles. "The law," said a great jurist, "is wiser than any of us," and at least this ought to be the case. Improvement in the quality of the race itself may be at best a debatable matter, but there can be no question about the steadily growing richness of its inheritance.

Some months ago I heard a young man who had just received his doctor's degree in philosophy from one of our largest universities deploring the fact that Christian theology as expounded by St. Augustine and the early Church Fathers was much influenced by Greek philosophy, and particularly by that of Pythagoras and Aristotle. He concluded by saying casually that "we ought to get away from this primitive stuff." The phrase seems to me typical in its placid disregard for the historical facts of the case. Whatever else it may be, Christian theology is not in the least primitive. Pythagoras and Aristotle are not particularly primitive, and still less so are St. Paul, St. Augustine, and the Church Fathers. It may be said with much greater plausibility that Christian theology is unnecessarily metaphysical and subtle, just as a Gothic church may be said with some show of justice to be unnecessarily intricate and ornate. Cubism is primitive, but not the Cathedral at Rheims. Mrs. Eddy is primitive, but never St. Augustine, and this is so precisely because the theology of St. Augustine is the result of a conscious development, while that of Mrs. Eddy is the result of an unconscious but significant reversion to a discredited type.

Probably Cubism and its prototype in the field of poetry are not to be taken too seriously, and yet I can not resist the temptation to quote, by way of example, a poem by Mr. Ezra Pound, which was lately reprinted in a widely circulated magazine, presumably as a favorable specimen of its author's work. It is called "Papyrus," but it turns for its inspiration to an age more remote than that, or any other, writing material. I quote the poem in full:

"Spring . . .
Too long . . .
Gongula . . ."

Long ago, Carlyle, having in mind that very continuity of history which Mr. Pound ignores, said that the word we speak to-day "is borrowed, not from Ulfila the Moesogoth only, but from all men since the first man began to speak." Clearly, Mr. Pound has gone back to the first link in the chain. If Ulfila the Moesogoth ever spoke after this fashion, it must have been in a moment of inadvertence. For all I know, Mr. Pound may consider Shakespeare "primitive," but if Mr. Pound himself is "advanced" he must have advanced in a circle, for he stands at a point on the very borderline between articulate and inarticulate speech. Technique and intelligibility have alike gone by the board, and nothing remains to bear witness to several thousand years of civilization except the printed words which are employed to transmit this amazing performance to the world, and which seem oddly out of place in what would otherwise be a perfect example of prehistoric survival.

But if the inefficiency of private judgment began and ended in an editorial willingness to pay for literary experiments in incoherence, there would be no just cause for alarm. But it does not end here. The statute books of every State in the Union are full of enactments which are either unintentional duplications of existing laws or revivals of discarded ones. Heresies have been accepted as new which were old when the Nicene Creed was adopted. Political and social theories are on trial which have been exploded in the past as utterly as the fallacy of fiat money. All these things represent a loss in time, in money, and in good will, which should make us loth to let them run their course unchallenged.

No modern problems have been more insistent and pressing than those which have arisen from our rapid industrial development—monopolies, trusts, and the conflict between organized capital on the one hand and organized labor on the other. All of these problems are very old. Corporations in some form were known to the Romans, and ordinary trading corporations were chartered in England as early as 1600. Trade Unions flourished before the discovery of America. The corner in corn secured by Joseph in Egypt was cited as precedent in the Great Case of Monopolies, which was argued in the seventeenth century by distinguished lawyers, three of whom afterwards became Chief Justices of England. "Government by injunction" dates from Jack Cade's rebellion in 1452, and was attacked and defended with the same arguments which are current to-day. Practically every provision in the original Sherman Act, including the allowance of treble damages to the party aggrieved, was foreshadowed in the Statute of Monopolies which was passed by the House of Commons in 1623. Indeed, the existing common law relating to trusts and monopolies has always been so nearly adequate that, in the opinion of Professor Stimson, very little legislation by the States would have been necessary, "except, of course, to affix modern penalties to such offenses." When the bulk of this legislation is considered, it is more than ever apparent that something can be said, on the mere ground of economy, for the wisdom that comes slowly down "from precedent to precedent."

But the final word in the indictment of private judgment was spoken in August, 1914, when the guns of the Great War startled a world swaddled in the theories of well-meaning enthusiasts into a renewed sense of the grim realities of life. Authority was unquestionably at the lowest point which it has touched in modern times. Mr. Henry Ford and Judge Lindsey were in the act of assuring us in the face of common sense that there is no such thing as a bad boy. The Christian Scientists were proclaiming in the face of common knowledge that there is no such thing as pain. President David Starr Jordan was writing articles to prove, in the face of all history, that a civilized nation is always a good nation. The internationalists were in the act of telling us that patriotism was dead. To find a parallel situation it is necessary to go back to the days when the nebulous doubts and conjectures of decadent Greece and Rome went down before the vivid affirmations of early Christianity. Then Germany launched her offensive against Belgium, and since that time the message of the unconverted apostles of private judgment has sounded strangely obsolete.

For it has suddenly become apparent that all our progressives were really reactionaries. My friend's philosophy stands convicted of being more primitive than that of the Church Fathers. The spirit of pacifism is infinitely more remote than the spirit of the Crusades. Emma Goldman is less modern than Richard the Lion-Hearted. The iconoclasts who were said to be a thousand years ahead of their age are a thousand years behind their age. Even Mr. Bryan's speeches ring with a far-off, archaic note of which he is perhaps unconscious.

Everyone who has read "Man and Superman" will remember the dialogue between Ramsden and Tanner in which the former boasts that he was advanced before Tanner was born. "I knew," answers Tanner, "it was a long time ago." "A long time ago," in "the late McKinley period" and afterwards, until the war put a stop to the promiscuous talking of nonsense, there were men who actually believed that mere goodness of intention, allied with formal education and the physical sciences, was enough to cure the ills that flesh is heir to and to redeem the world. Faith did not matter much. History did not matter much. Nothing mattered except a vague altruism and the magic of persuasive words. We know better than that now, we who have sat and watched the younger generation going blithely about the business of making our great atonement with untroubled spirits and contented hearts. It was the old atonement of the innocent for the guilty, of the spirit of affirmation for the cultivated agnosticism that is summed up for all time in the classic query of Pilate as to what is truth, and perhaps even now the younger generation is unconscious of the meaning of it all. But, whether consciously or not, the younger generation, which was never shown the path that leads to the broad highway, has found it out for itself and for the world as well. The old landmarks are miraculously back in their accustomed places. All the world knows now that it is a finer thing for men and women to do their duty than to live their lives, however specious and virile the argument to the contrary may have hitherto seemed. All the world knows now that truth and justice are solemn and objective realities which are deeper than any matter of attitude or of opinion. All the world knows now that to be innocent and helpless is no guaranty against the rapacity of wrongdoing, and that it is indeed a sweet and seemly thing to die for one's country. The shining paradoxes of Christianity have become in a trice more vital than the dreary logic of the skeptics—and it is surely more than a coincidence that the only influential skeptics remaining in the world are the Bolsheviks, who are the only leaders who have proved themselves wholly unworthy of their trust.

There will be time enough in the future to qualify and revise our conclusions—to-day we can do no more than to note in general terms what things have been approved by the fire of a stupendous crisis and what things have been burned and purged away. "Revision," as Professor Royce has finely said, "does not mean destruction. We can often say to tradition: 'That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die.' But we can sometimes see in the world of opinion a sort of resurrection of the dead—a resurrection wherein what was indeed justly sown in dishonor is raised in honor—glorified—and perhaps incorruptible. Let us bury the natural body of tradition. What we want is its glorified body and its immortal soul." And that, I think, will be the heritage and the reward of the younger generation.

F. LYMAN WINDOLPH

Correspondence

The Army Bills

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your editorial of August 16 on the army bills recently introduced in Congress brings out the point that the weakness of the Administration bill is the figure set for the peace strength of the Regular Army, to wit, approximately half a million men. Before the war it was difficult to maintain the strength of the Regular Army even at something less than 100,000, and it is safe to predict that it would prove impossible to raise half a million men by voluntary enlistment.

You correctly call the bill in question the Administration bill. It is sometimes spoken of as the General Staff bill, but I am satisfied that it does not represent the views of the General Staff. It is most desirable that this bill be not confused with the National Service Act introduced by Senator Chamberlain and Representative Kahn, and which was drawn by the Military Training Camps Association of the United States. The two bills are very different. The Administration bill is faulty under four principal points:

The first is the size of the Regular Army, to which I have already referred.

Second, the training given to the youth of the country is for three months, which is too short a period.

Third, the youth trained are not organized territorially into any reserve, but are turned loose. This means that at the outbreak of war these men will have to be organized into units or fed into the Regular Army to increase its size. Thus the mistakes of the past will be repeated. The only trained and organized force, to wit, the Regular Army will have to be pulled to pieces in order to organize the citizen army, with the result that we will have no force which can be utilized without going through the process of organization or reorganization. In other words it may again be fifteen months before we can put an effective force in the field.

Fourth, there is no adequate system provided for the training of Reserve Officers. During the war some 200,000 officers were employed, or about 5 per cent. of the total force of 4,000,000 men. Theoretical training of officers will not suffice. They must have experience with troops in the field. This training can best be given through organizing territorially the young men trained, calling them out annually for a short period of manœuvres. The organization of men trained into reserve therefore serves two purposes: It acts as a training school for officers as well as providing means for the prompt mobilization of an organized force.

On the other hand, the National Service Act is drawn on the theory that the strength of the Regular Army should be the minimum necessary for the performance of the functions that obviously can not be performed by men temporarily in the service, such as overseas, coast, and artillery garrisons, a small mobile force to preserve order along the border, administrative detachments, and training cadres, etc.

Six months' training is provided as the initial training of the private soldier.

All men trained are to be organized for a period into reserve according to their places of residence, and to be called out periodically for manœuvres.

The Reserve is to be officered chiefly by Reserve Officers who, together with non-Commissioned Officers and enlisted specialists, are to be chosen from the ranks after further and progressive training to qualify them to successive steps in promotion. Under such system there will be no fear of militarism through the creation of a class of professional soldiers, while on the other hand the entire youth of the country could be mobilized at shortest notice, fully organized and prepared to take the field.

The National Guard is not relied upon as an expeditionary force, but is restored to its constitutional function of a guard. Its recruiting is provided for by excusing from service in the Federal Reserve a limited number of men graduating from the training camps provided they serve a short enlistment in the guard.

T. MCILVAINE, Acting Chairman,
Military Training Camps Assn. U. S., Chairman, Committee on Universal Training.

New York, August 21

Government Ownership of Rights of Way

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Since your periodical is expressly dedicated to general discussion, perhaps you can grant me space in which to suggest a treatment of the railroad problem different (so far as I am able to learn) from any solution now before the public. The suggestion I have to make will of course appear academic and unreal to the men of the hour. It may none the less forecast the final reconciliation of discordant and conflicting views.

The Government of the United States should assume ownership of railroad rights of way, terminals, tracks, and all other forms of real estate. Locomotives, cars, and all other forms of rolling stock the Government should leave severely and scrupulously alone. This rational and clear-cut line of demarkation assimilates the train to the steamboat, the automobile, the mule-cart, and the bicycle; that is, assimilates it to those methods of transportation which have never caused political trouble.

Who then will "run" the railroads? Anybody, nobody, and everybody will run the railroads. To illustrate. John Doe has four suits of clothes, two chairs, and a victrola to transport from Baltimore to Annapolis. What does he do? Puts them in a privately owned truck and hauls them over a publicly owned highway. Richard Roe has a boatload of shoes to ship from Boston to Palermo. What is his procedure? He sends them in a privately owned boat over a publicly owned ocean.

Now comes William Coe with a hundred tons of coal to be hauled from West Virginia to California. The coal must pass over steel rails; but what of it? Why should metal rails and wooden crossties so enormously complicate the question? Let William Coe get his locomotive and his freight cars wherever he can manage to root them up. Let the Government maintain the track, let it maintain an ample mileage in prime condition; and then let private enterprise do the rest.

Private enterprise is abundantly capable of meeting the emergency. The American business man will somehow secure an adequate supply of wheeled boxes, technically called freight cars. It is no more credible that a permanent shortage of cars should exist than that scarcity of picks and shovels should cause a fuel famine.

On the other hand, no business man can fairly be expected to build or repair seven hundred miles of rail, when no one dreams of requiring him to pave, let us say, ten miles of city street. The gist of it is simply this: Avenues of transportation constitute a public function and a public charge. Vehicles of transportation are each individual's private concern. The part of political wisdom is to hold the balance even.

MALCOLM C. BURKE

Washington, D. C., August 17

The "Mark Twain House"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The article on page 223 in your issue of July 26 about the four corners of Fifth Avenue at Ninth Street will not suffer severely if you will accord me space for a suggestion. You speak of the "historic mansion" of my grandfather, Henry Brevoort, 24 Fifth Avenue, and then you go on to say "diagonally opposite is the Mark Twain house, of which the present owner might, if he had been less public-minded, have disposed at a handsome profit to the seekers of gain." Be the last part of this sentence as it may, I dissent from your designating No. 21 Fifth Avenue as the "Mark Twain house," inasmuch as Mr. Clemens only had the property on lease from October, 1904, to October, 1908, and his connection with it lasted only those four years, whereas my brother-in-law, Mr. James A. Renwick, and his forbears have owned the property since the Indians lived on Manhattan Island. There is no deed to it that I have ever heard of and it has never been sold or been out of the hands of the Brevoort family or their descendants. The present house was built over seventy years ago by Mrs. James Renwick, only sister of Henry Brevoort and grandmother of the present owner, who was born in the house. In view of this length of tenure, perhaps you will agree with me that it is hardly appropriate to dub it the "Mark Twain house," very fine gentleman that he was notwithstanding.

ROBERT SEDGWICK

New York, August 8

Book Reviews

Whitewashing the Bolsheviks

RUSSIA IN 1919. By Arthur Ransome.
New York: B. W. Huebsch.

WHEN the Soviet Government is investigated by its admiring friends, a biased report is naturally to be expected. We have had such reports from William C. Bullitt, Lincoln Steffens, Robert Minor, and others. We might have expected something of a slightly higher order, albeit prejudiced, from the pen of Arthur Ransome, because he had something of a reputation as an author and journalist to maintain. It is, therefore, with something of a shock that we note that his account of the Soviet Government and its operations, gleaned during a visit in Petrograd and Moscow last February, is not only strongly biased, but is replete with palpable misstatements and downright falsehoods.

Disregard for truth and moral myopia are bad enough in any book, but they are particularly serious in the present volume, which will undoubtedly be used to the fullest extent as a propaganda document by our radicals and Bolshevik sympathizers. If not challenged, many of these misstatements might pass unnoticed and, receiving credence among people unacquainted with actual conditions in Russia and somewhat confused by conflicting reports, tend to create the impression that, after all, the present tyrants at Moscow are not as black as they have been painted. A careful perusal of the book leads inevitably to the conclusion that the author was something more than a willing dupe through predisposed sympathies.

Mr. Ransome left Stockholm to go into Russia at the end of January. It is noteworthy that he was personally conducted by Vorovsky, former Commissar of Finance, who took 62,000,000 rubles with him to Stockholm last year, and Litvinov, the unaccepted Bolshevik Ambassador to London. Naturally, he had no difficulties, but this circumstance throws an interesting light on one of his characteristic misrepresentations. He relates how on arrival at Petrograd they loaded their baggage into a motor lorry sent to meet them, and then notes that there was a long time to wait while rooms were being allotted to them in various hotels. Now it happens that there were no hotels at that time, and had not been since October 12, 1918, when the last of them, the Medved, was closed. But the explanation of his statement is not far to seek. He goes on to state that as soon as the rooms were allotted he found that he had been lucky enough to get one in the Astoria. Now the Astoria, formerly a leading hotel, had long before this become the Soviet House, the residence of influential members of the Soviet. The allotment of a room there is sufficient evidence in itself of the nature of his relations with the Bolshevik authorities.

But his disingenuous misrepresentations began even before he reached Petrograd. On crossing the frontier from Finland he noticed the great contrast:

On the Finnish side of the frontier we had seen the grandiose new frontier station, much larger than could possibly be needed, but quite a good expression of the spirit of the new Finland. On the Russian side we came to the same grey old wooden station known to all passengers to and from Russia for polyglot profanity and passport difficulties.

The facts are that the Finnish frontier station was built in 1913, while Finland was still a part of Russia, and during the war was used as a home for convalescent wounded soldiers. It is therefore amusing to hear it referred to as "quite a good expression of the spirit of the new Finland." Furthermore, since 1912 plans had been made to move the frontier station from Bieliostrov to Terijoki, and of course there was no object in replacing the old wooden station to which he refers by a new one. All this is a mere trifle in itself, but the emphasis he places on it is an indication of his general method. Another trifling observation is worth noting for the same reason. As he went about Petrograd in the evening, he found that "the streets were certainly better swept and cleaner than they had been since the last Winter of the Russian Empire!" Now the snowfall in Petrograd last winter was the heaviest for years, and the streets had a covering of packed snow to a height of three or four feet above the level of the sidewalk. To state that the streets were swept and clean is of course pure invention.

He went, of course, to Smolny for his meals; Smolny, the headquarters of the Petrograd Soviet. While walking in the streets he made interesting observations and gives us his impressions. He found that the town, in daylight, seemed less deserted than in the evening, though it was obvious that the "unloading" of the Petrograd population, which was unsuccessfully attempted during the Kerensky régime, had been accomplished to a large extent! Thus lightly does he touch upon the horrible tragedy of the falling off of Petrograd's population to a fifth of its former size. Disease, starvation, and executions loom up in the background, and the piteous streams of unfortunates who have sought refuge in the country districts explain the deserted appearance of the stricken city. Ludicrous indeed is his remark that "great numbers of workmen have gone home, carrying with them the ideas of the revolution." What a commentary upon this careless assertion is the letter of Lopushkin, the old revolutionary and Bolshevik, the head of a soviet in the province of Tambov, which he addressed to the National Soviet in Moscow before committing suicide! After pointing out that in the country districts the Bolshevik militia and the members of the Soviet are tired of the position of outcasts and lepers which service with the Bolsheviks imposes on them, this disillusioned Bolshevik states that no member of the Red Guard dares to risk his life by returning to his native village, where his father would be the first to kill him, and if the guard falls singly or even in couples into the hands of the villagers, they are always murdered. One wonders how Mr. Ransome can have the presumption to make statements the utter falsity of which must soon become patent to all.

His observations on the military are likewise not without interest as showing the slant of his mind and the character of his information. For example, he remarks that some of the officers and soldiers are as well equipped nowadays as they were at the beginning of the war, but he fails to add that this is due to the fact that they have donned the resplendent peace-time uniforms of pre-war days, some supplies of which they managed to find stored away. But what is more interesting and important is his tale concerning the famous Semenovskiy regiment. Speaking of his interview with Zinoviev, he writes:

I told him I was surprised to find him here and not at Kronstadt, and asked about the mutiny and the treachery of the Semenovskiy regiment. There was a shout of laughter, and Pozern explained that there was no Semenovskiy regiment in existence, and that the manufacturers of the story, every word of which was a lie, had no doubt tried to give realism to it by putting in the name of the regiment which had taken a chief part in putting down the Moscow insurrection of fourteen years ago.

The fact is that the Semenovskiy regiment did mutiny, went over to the anti-Bolsheviks, and is now fighting against the Bolsheviks on the Esthonian front.

When he arrived at Moscow, Mr. Ransome was much impressed with the nationalization of trade. He found that the number of closed shops was depressing, but it appeared that the Moscow Soviet had opened national shops in order to prevent speculation and profiteering. He explains, for example, if a man needs a new suit, he has to go in his rags to his House Committee and there make it clear that the suit is really needed for himself. He then receives permission to buy. What Mr. Ransome omits to say is that in order to obtain such a permit a man has to pay a bribe of several hundred rubles to a Commissar and then take pot-luck of what happens to be in the Soviet stores, paying an exorbitant price.

He is equally disingenuous in dealing with the sale of food. He points out that, besides the food obtainable by cards, it was possible to buy, at ruinous prices, food from speculators, and to give an idea of the difference in the prices cites the examples of bread at 1.20 rubles per pound by card as against 15 rubles per pound from the speculator, and sugar at 12 rubles per pound by card as against over 50 rubles in the open market. What he fails to report is that people stand in long queues with their cards and, if they are fortunate, obtain an infinitesimal amount (of sugar one ounce), and are perforce driven to the speculators to avert starvation.

But this is enough to indicate the utter untrustworthiness as well as the deliberate misrepresentation of his personal observations. It is unnecessary to multiply examples. A considerable portion of the volume is taken up with accounts of his interviews with Bolshevik leaders concerning their revolutionary views and the activities of their various Commissariats. Were he a less intelligent man, one would say that he was an easy dupe, for it is hard to believe that any man could be taken in by the stories told him. Of the operations of the Bolshevik Government a recent arrival from Petrograd remarked: "They would constitute the greatest of all comedies, if they were not written in human blood."

Mr. Ransome relates that on his way to a meeting of the Soviet Executive Committee a little, hairy, energetic man came up and with great delight showed him the new matches invented in the Soviet laboratories. In these new Bolshevik matches neither wood nor paraffin is used. Waste paper is a substitute for one and the grease that is left after cleaning wool is a substitute for the other! To be sure, no one else ever saw any of these marvelous matches, and the only matches that human beings can obtain are brought in from Sweden and sell at 5 rubles a box. He devotes a chapter to the Commissariat of State Constructions, but fails to say anything about construction. The director talks at length on general conditions and weaves a fairy story about the improvement of canals and the building of railways. He tells Mr. Ransome that more than 11,000 versts of railway are under construction, as well as 1,200 versts of highway. When one considers that rails are practically unobtainable and that, in a stretch of some 30 versts—about the only piece of actual construction undertaken—they had to use five different weights of rails, the director's statement appears a trifle exaggerated.

Another remarkable story, which Lincoln Steffens also brought out with him, concerns the grandiose plan to furnish Petrograd with a vast amount of cheap electricity developed by water power. Of course Petrograd is located on a level plain and for thousands of miles in Russia there is no fall of water to give power. An examination of the plans, however, which Mr. Ransome did not make, discloses the fact that they were based upon the seizure of Finland and utilization of its water power.

For absolute naïveté, however, the report upon the progress of education quite takes the prize. The Bolsheviks have established numerous universities and attendance has increased enormously. All education is free and there are no entrance requirements, as it is hoped to get as many workmen in the universities as possible. It does not require much imagination to judge of the kind of education that is acquired. But the most absurd comedy—or perhaps one might better say tragedy—is that of the lower schools. A billion rubles has been assigned to feeding children in the schools, and those who most need them are supplied with clothes and footgear. These schools have increased greatly in numbers and in attendance. The explanation is simple. It is contained in the remark of an old porter concerning his children. "Yes," he said, "they go there, sing the Marseillaise twice through, have dinner and come home." When Mr. Ransome questioned the Assistant Commissioner of Education about this he said: "It is perfectly true. We have not enough transport to feed the armies, let alone to bring food and warmth for ourselves. And if, under these conditions, we forced children to go through all their lessons, we should have corpses to teach, not children. But by making them come for their meals we do two things, keep them alive, and keep them in the habit of coming, so that when the warm weather arrives we can do better." What a sham was Lunacharsky's report on Soviet education; the report whose rosy pictures were made so much of by our parlor Bolsheviks. No instruction given; children allowed to do whatever they please; and the inducement of free food held out to them on the chance that they may get the habit of coming to school!

It may appear that undue space and attention have been given to a book so manifestly untrustworthy, but it should be remembered that the public is eagerly devouring all that purport to be first-hand and eye-witness accounts of what is happening behind the veil that hides Soviet Russia from our gaze. Precisely such false reports are being used to foment in our own country industrial and social unrest and provoke revolution, and many well-intentioned people are deceived thereby. Only by the energetic spreading of the truth and the contradiction of falsehood can the poison be removed. The mask must be torn from the ghastly farce that is being played out in Moscow upon the prostrate body of the Russian people, lest we be forced to see the curtain rung up on a similar bloody drama in our own land.

Blasco Ibáñez and "Mare Nostrum"

MARE NOSTRUM (Our Sea). By Vicente Blasco Ibáñez. Authorized Translation from the Spanish by Charlotte Brewster Jordan. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

A CHILIAN critic has just accounted for the amazing popularity of Blasco Ibáñez among us by "the lucky choice of 'The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse' for introducing him to American readers." But in fact an earlier choice had been made. "The Cabin" (La Barraca) was the first of the "Borzoi Spanish Translations" issued by Alfred A. Knopf. Another publisher was to make the lucky second choice and apparently to bag the rights in all subsequent American versions of the now fairly "best-selling" author's work. "The Cabin," as a regional novel of narrow scene and sombre realism, was not the kind of thing to catch a big audience. Some of us praised it, no doubt a fair number of copies were sold, and Blasco Ibáñez remained as little known, or as little famed among us, as he had been before Mr. Knopf made his experiment.

"The Four Horsemen" also received at once that dubious meed, the praise of critics. Here, we said, is a piece of fiction which has great merit but will be altogether too much for the populace. It will never "get across." It is too long, too diffuse, too this and that: pity but true that there is no big public among us for this kind of big book. And there was the title: fancy such a title for a work by Mr. R. W. Chambers or Mr. Booth Tarkington! But the book caught on, marched steadily to the front, and has stayed there for close upon a year. How did it happen? Nobody knows. Even the title may have helped. Horsemen are always a good card for romance, and Apocalypse might well enough be the name of a castle or ranch! For those who recognized the phrase, there was a certain religious or mystical appeal. The world was ripe for a big religious novel, and ready to welcome a novel which had a biblical label and plainly saw the world war, and life in general, as a spiritual conflict. Add that we were quite ignorant of the literature of modern Spain, and that such a source for the latest "Have you read" gave a pleasant fillip to our curiosity, and you have helped to account for its very large sale, in the first instance. But the book is still at the top of our booksellers' and librarians' lists. It has taken hold and kept hold, as a fact not to be disposed of on mechanical or fortuitous grounds. Its broad panoramic effect at a moment when the world at war seemed more than ever a jumble of hopelessly unrelated fragments and tiny episodes, was nerve-steadying; as its faith in the triumph of good over evil was reassuring. And perhaps we felt, subconsciously, that if a mad Latin could speak so sanely, in time of crisis, we others, with our God-given margin of common sense and principle, must be safe enough!

One of the benefits of the war, however, has lain in the shaking up of this sort of racial self-complacency. For a time, at least, we have been really more than willing to emphasize the points of likeness in the races who were fighting together for a common cause—or at least a common object. We have been surprised and charmed to discover how "like folks" these Latins are when you get over the barrier of speech. The great increase in translations from the French and the Spanish has both borne witness to and assisted this process of discovery. That the most popular of them all should be from the Spanish rather than the French may be referable to a closer kinship between the Spanish and the "Anglo-Saxon" temperament and genius. Rabelais remains the exclusive treasure of the few among us, but who would ever think of a Cervantes Club? Don Quixote simply "belongs"; he is as naturally our property as Mark Twain. Partly, in consequence, we have thought about him, or felt about him, as a kind of unique and accidental product of Spain. As our South American commentator complains, "From Cervantes down to Blasco Ibáñez there is here, as in Europe, a blank ignorance of the intermediary literary generations. As a matter of fact, to suppose that the present novelists and poets of Spain have no other spiritual ancestors than the masters of the Golden Century is as absurd as it would be to affirm that the leaves of this spring have sprung from the fossilized roots of the trees of a prehistoric age."

In short, Blasco Ibáñez belongs to an unbroken line, and is but one of a family of contemporary Spanish story-tellers. The regional novel and the novel of social or religious or industrial reform have especially flourished among them. Most of the novels by Ibáñez we have in English belong to one or both of these categories: "The Cabin," "The Shadow of the Cathedral," "Blood and Sand," "The Fruit of the Vine" are all compounded of realistic detail and moral indignation. Only in "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" and "Mare Nostrum" do we find ourselves concerned with larger scenes and forces or, one may say, with the same forces working upon a vastly broader scene and scale. Both novels were written during the earlier part of the war, while the author was living in Paris. "Mare Nostrum," one may guess, came first. In its larger way it also is both regional novel and novel of protest; a tale of the meridional, and an attack (so much more vigorously pushed in the later novel) upon Prussian diabolism. It is of generous, almost Hugoesque proportions. It tells a dramatic story about persons of strong human interest, but is not to be tyrannized over by the exigencies of rapid action. It is extremely copious in dialogue and especially in description. The love affair of Captain Ulysses Ferragut and the siren Freya reaches its first point of crisis in a chapter of thirty-six pages entitled "The Aquarium of Naples." Quite thirty of these pages are given to the detailed description of the creatures of the aquarium, scientific names and all—a remorseless piece of reporting hardly to be surpassed by Zola. Meanwhile our crisis waits until with her terrific kiss (the Young Person of yesterday would not have been permitted to read about that kiss) Freya seals the helpless Ulysses for her own. Will the hundreds of thousands who bid fair to buy this book (which ran to nine printings within a few days of its publication) dutifully peruse those thirty pages, or skilfully skip them and so all the sooner win to the spectacle of that almost unspeakable kiss?

It is clear, at all events, that this writer's prolixity is no bar to acceptance, a fresh disproof of the theory that the day of the three-decker is over. In truth, if the scope of a story be large enough, there is no visible limit to its bulk. This tale of the modern Ulysses, the far-wanderer who adventures on many seas, is beguiled by Circe, and plays his part for good and ill in the greatest of all wars, is but the glittering focus of a larger action. The publishers are justified in calling the book "the epic of the Mediterranean." Mare nostrum, ancient realm of Amphitrite, watery arena of so many combats, mother and survivor of so many civilizations—of thee we sing! Her our Ulysses betrays, in helping the entrance of German submarines to her sacred waters. Her he thereafter defends; and into her arms he gratefully sinks, when his time comes, as into his own place. A torpedo at last takes his ship, far from shore, where the lastiest swimmer is doomed: the doughty Ulysses is doomed. The closing page or two, in which a man is drowned naturalistically and a hero romantically finds his true beloved, well illustrates the method of Ibáñez. At the height of his physical anguish our Ulysses is rescued and made welcome by the cause of that anguish, the goddess of his sea whom he has dimly worshiped from childhood: "She stretched her pearly arms around him, pressing him close against her life-giving and eternally virginal bosom. A dense and greenish atmosphere was giving her whiteness a reflection like that of the light of the caves of the sea. . . . His eyes had closed, never to open again; a bitter river of salt was running down his throat. . . . Nevertheless he continued looking at her,—more luminous, pressed closer and closer, with a sad expression of love in his glassy eyes. . . . And thus he went down and down the infinite levels of the abyss, inert and without volition, while a voice within him was crying, as though just recognizing her: 'Amphitrite! . . . Amphitrite!'"

H. W. BOYNTON

Moore's History of Religions

HISTORY OF RELIGIONS. By George Foot Moore. Vol. II. Judaism, Christianity, Mohammedanism. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

IF there is a suggestive little touch of shock in finding Judaism and Christianity, even in the more or less awakened International Theological Library, figuring side by side with the "ethnic religions"—once so called—there can be no question that the experiment has amply justified itself. The quiet objectivity thus reached helps to steady both thought and imagination, and these two volumes go far to give the unified background for the whole series to which they belong. They do not give philosophy of religion, or history of doctrines however broad, or contemporary history of Judaism or of Christianity; still less do they give apologetics, but their aim is to be a picture of religion as man in multitudinous ways has shaped it and thought it and found it. It was most fitting, also, that Mohammedanism should be added as a third, similar in essential kind to the religions of Moses and Jesus. The wheel has come full circle, and it is now recognized, not only by historical scholars but by theologians and missionaries, that, on the one hand, Mohammed was the last in the line of Old Testament prophets and, on the other, that his Faith is a Christian heresy that has broken away from the parent stem but may again be grafted into it. And some most devout Christians even hold that we, in the crude materialism of our age, shall have to learn anew from Islam the naturally religious attitude to life and the spirit of reverence for God's actual presence in the acts of men.

In his admirable objectifying of ideas and their connections Dr. Moore gives few dates and as few crude facts as he can. He approaches every change and development on what might be called the biological side if metaphors from natural science were not so often misleading in matters of mind and emotion. Yet the little sketches of systems are never permitted to become abstract or diffuse; they are most concrete and direct in phrasing. The balance of importance, too, is excellently preserved throughout. Very much, of course, in such a book as this must be second-hand—even the proportioning is much indebted to Loofs, Troeltsch, Walker and Goldziher—but it is second-hand of the best, verified, weighed, and tested. To and fro, also, between the three religions parallels of idea and development are briefly noticed; a method of illumining and vivifying which could easily have been carried farther in the case of the last two.

In all this a high standard of accuracy and impartiality has been reached. But besides such qualities Dr. Moore in his preface desiderates, in the historian of religion, imagination to think men's thoughts after them and sympathy to enter into their feelings. Writing in so compressed a style it has naturally been difficult to make these evident, and an essential coldness of brain, admirable otherwise for the purpose of such a history, has to appearance somewhat stood in the way of sympathy—at least in expression. We have a most clear picture of certain religions with great historic exactness as they looked—certainly as they now look—from the outside, but religion seems somehow to have evaporated from them. We are conscious of a sub-ironic attitude, never reaching the clumsiness of Gibbon's solemn sneer but rising to clearness in the last paragraph of page 379, the culmination of an admirable description of the modern tendencies of Protestantism.

This apparent lack of feeling for the emotional side of religion has in one or two cases affected the historical picture itself. A single paragraph is given to the "seers," the ecstatic and emotional "prophets" of early Israel, and in consequence the rise and development of the so-called "ethical prophets" are left unconditioned and inexplicable. Similarly in Islam the dervish organizations which carried the soul of the religion not only of the masses but of the theologians, while they are mentioned, are not stressed as they deserve. And it may safely be said that in these last is to be found the clue to the otherwise inexplicable appearance of the prophets of the eighth century in Israel. The part played also in the development by the writers of the Wisdom literature is not brought out. Ecclesiastes, a "human document" of the first value with an emotional experience behind its studied suppression, is not even mentioned. Yet it is evident that it had made a deep impression upon Paul and conditioned part of his system. Job is mentioned, but the mingled elements in it, full of significance for the drifts of thought of the time, are not recognized. Even the idea of Wisdom itself does not have its due, and the relation, now becoming clear, between it and the Logos doctrine has (p. 171) only a dubious allusion. Yet it must have been fundamental for the thinking and the faith of Hebrews for centuries. The truth is that Dr. Moore is still under the spell of the Old Testament school which was fascinated by the prophets and could see nothing else of life in Israel.

In the treatment of Mohammedanism the statement of the principle of the Agreement is not sufficiently detailed or emphatic; it has been formative throughout the whole development and is the hope at the present day of a large school of Moslem reformers. Curiously enough, reform of Islam seems to be silently excluded. Judaism and Christianity are left in a rationally possible development, but the last chapter on Islam is headed, "Extravagant sects and derivative religions." This is hardly fair, for Moslem theology has shown as great capacity as any other for transforming itself while yet remaining orthodox. The Agreement has furnished an unassailable method. Again, the treatment of Ghazali, detailed as it is, does not do justice to his philosophical originality or to the wide influence of his system. The first Pragmatist, the anticipator of Hume and the neo-Hamiltonians and the teacher, if indirectly, of Aquinas, he played a more formative part in the thought of the world than Averroes or any other of the Arabic-writing Aristotelians. And may Dr. Moore be entreated not to speak of "Arab Aristotelians"? After the dubious case of al-Kindi they were no more Arabs than a mediæval Irish monk writing in Latin was a Roman.

D. B. MACDONALD

The Higher Law

THE RECKONING: A Discussion of the Moral Aspects of the Peace Problem, and of Retributive Justice vs. an Indispensable Element. By James M. Beck. London: Hodder and Stoughton.

THIS volume, published in America under one title, "The Higher Law," seeks to emphasize certain moral conceptions and from them to draw conclusions which the author would have applied by the victorious Allies when fixing the terms of peace to be imposed upon the Germans. As these terms have now been determined, the volume has lost its immediate value, but to the moralist is of some interest because of the type of its argument.

In the first chapter Mr. Beck had no difficulty in showing that from earliest times there have been recognized moral laws to which have been ascribed a sanctity and binding force superior to either national enactments or the established conventions of international law. "Such laws are higher, in the sense that they are primal and fundamental laws. They constitute the great unwritten constitution of human society. They are antecedent to all laws of the State, and, indeed, the latter are but the imperfect and partial expression of the higher law of morality."

In this Higher Law Mr. Beck finds embodied the principle of retribution. "When the great reckoning comes, if the demands of the Higher Law are forgotten in the exclusive consideration of purely ethnological and economic questions, then this war, no matter what the result, will have been fought to some extent in vain. The chief of these demands is retributive justice, and unless that ideal can be constantly borne in mind to the very end, the cause of justice will be compromised." "The Higher Law demands the destruction of the Prussianized Empire. To permit that predatory Government to continue would be to imperil the peace of the world afresh, for who can foresee what alliances that Empire, whether it calls itself a monarchy or a republic, by its iniquitous methods of intrigue, bribery, and bullying may not bring about in future years."

Without denying the correctness of this last practical conclusion—and also without admitting it—two objections lie against Mr. Beck's mode of argument. In the first place, it is impossible successfully to defend retribution as a moral principle, that is, to justify the infliction of injury solely for the sake of causing suffering upon the part of the persons against whom it is directed; and, in the second place, the appeal to a Law higher than that found stated in the established national and international laws of mankind is one that needs to be more carefully qualified than Mr. Beck has qualified it. In truth, Mr. Beck's use of a Higher Law does not differ in kind from that of the Prussians in their political philosophy. They posit a Higher Law that has regard for the prestige and greatness of their state, and to it subordinate all other human laws. Their mode of argument is no more illegitimate than is that of Mr. Beck. Both are absolutist in character. They differ only as to what they conceive to be the summum bonum.

In fact, however, Mr. Beck, like most other writers who begin upon the heights of absolute principles, soon descends to the plains of the relative, and argues upon the basis of specific facts. Thus, in the sentence which has been quoted, he urges that the Prussianized Empire be destroyed because of the iniquitous methods of intrigue, bribery, and bullying it has employed in the past. This is proper argument because it is rational to expect that what a people has done in the past it will continue to do in the future. But it is not a conclusive argument, for it is conceivable that a people may come to see the error of its past ways whether judged from the standpoint of morality or of material expediency.

Still dwelling in the realm of the absolute and transcendental, Mr. Beck appears to believe that there is in human history a Nemesis which with certainty visits retribution upon those who condone wrong. Thus he argues that, had the other neutral nations not permitted Frederick the Great to commit the crime of seizing Silesia, or if they had refused to allow the Germans to annex Alsace-Lorraine in 1871, or if, on August 1, 1914, they, including the United States, had at once declared their indignation at the invasion of Belgium which the Germans were about to begin, the colossal catastrophe of the world war might have been prevented. The reviewer does not believe that there is any Higher Law or historical avenging force which inevitably brings retribution to those who commit or condone or otherwise acquiesce in the commission by others of wrongs, but he is strongly convinced that, as a matter of practice, nations as well as persons often store up for themselves future evil by a failure to act with energy when they see developing a situation which, unless checked in time, must lead not only to danger to themselves, but to results that are morally iniquitous. All the other nations of the world knew that a moral wrong was being committed when Germany tore from the side of France her two provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, but they were then unwilling to take steps to prevent the deed. Few in America will now deny that it would have been far better for the world if, in deed as well as in thought, America had at once shown its official indignation at the invasion of Belgium. Many there were at the time who wanted this done, and President Wilson must for all time bear the heavy responsibility of having urged otherwise. But if mistakes of the past can not now be corrected, they can at least teach their lessons to the present. In an earlier contribution to the Review, the present writer described the situation that has developed in the Far East, since 1905, from the determination of Japan to obtain a dominant control in China, and she is now demanding that the Western Powers give their sanction to an act of aggression which will go far towards enabling her to realize this ambition. If considerations of justice and morality are not alone sufficiently impelling, are the nations of the West to give no heed to the lessons of the past?

In later chapters of his volume Mr. Beck views the world war as a drama and likens it especially to Shakespeare's "Hamlet"—the United States being the Prince Hamlet of the literary analogy. The comparison is worked out in an interesting and ingenious manner but is not of sufficient importance to be here summarized.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

The Run of the Shelves

The Paris "Figaro" for July 19 contains a declaration of faith on the part of fifty-four leaders of French thought headed by M. Paul Bourget. It seems worth while to reproduce, in rough English translation, a paragraph from this address in which the majority of Americans might find pleasure and the minority profit:

If we feel the need of a philosophical, moral, and political thought which shall organize our experiences, if we aim to oppose to liberal and anarchical disorder, to the revolt of instinct, an intellectual method which discriminates (hiérarchise) and classifies, if in a word, we know what we want and what we do not want, we do not intend, on the other hand, to remain mere doctrinaires and critics. The methods to which we adhere require us to understand and engage us to act; they are essentially creative. But there exists a thought which blocks the way of thought, an art which is the end of art, a politics which destroys politics; it is these alone that we are determined to proscribe.

In this hour of unspeakable confusion, when the future of civilization is at stake, our safety is in the spirit. By combining against all the powers that oppose the spirit, we shall achieve victory. The human race will share the profits with us.

One must envy the character that in war time and on short leave from active service can write such a book as Romilly Fedden's "Golden Days from the Fishing Log of a Painter in Brittany" (Houghton Mifflin). It is in the great tradition of British angling literature—seriously fishy throughout, yet sensitive to all impressions of nature and rural man. The background of Breton legend is novel and entrancing. Captain Fedden is an eclectic, using the wet fly when occasion demands, or even bait; nor too fastidious to save a big fellow from the weeds by overhauling the line by hand. He has original views about the colors of artificial flies and believes in tying one's own. Of form and color we must take a trout's-eye view, which may be done with the aid of a finger bowl. The hero of the book is the local sportsman, Jean-Pierre, now buried before Verdun. His fishing of an impenetrably brush-grown stream with the natural fly is unforgettable. First with the pruning clippers he cuts holes in the thicket for his line and his landing net, then he begins operations with a bluebottle fly impaled on the smallest of hooks with only three feet of gut.

"He is now rhythmically tapping his rod-butt, and one expects that at any minute he may break into an incantation, some Breton equivalent of the Abracadabra that thrilled us in the golden days of picture books. But he only keeps on tapping, while through the leafy screen of twigs the dead bluebottle is seen to be keeping even time, forever dancing on the face of the waters." A dark fin appears. "Then comes a second splash in the water, a good two feet nearer the fly, who is now dancing furiously, while our old friend's mouth grows tight, and curiously tremulous lines appear at its corners. Then on a sudden his rod bends. There is a short, sharp fight, till a net is dexterously inserted in a lower cave, previously cut close above the bank . . . Through this opening a fat pound trout emerges and is plumped upon the grass."

Our somewhat abridged quotation gives only one side of a thoroughly delightful book which many literary anglers, and some who are not fishermen at all, will promptly promote to a position alongside their Izaak Walton.

The Lyman Beecher lectures on preaching, delivered in 1918-1919 at the Yale School of Religion by Dr. John Kelman of St. George's United Free Church at Edinburgh, have been published in book form by the Yale University Press under the title "The War and Preaching."

Unlimited suffering, like that produced by the Great War, might have acted in either of two ways on religion. It might have chilled religion by making God less probable, or quickened it by making Him more necessary. The soldier might have been forgiven if present-day Calvaries had reduced the prominence of Golgotha, if he found himself questioning the effectiveness of a ransom which left its arrears of payment to be met nineteen centuries afterwards by the sacrifice of seven million lives. These views would be natural; on their soundness we need not pass. On the other hand, if God is a help to man, four and a half years of unexampled tribulation should have made that help well-nigh indispensable. Canning called the New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old. It might have seemed that the demand of our own day was to call or recall the spiritual world into existence to redress the balance of the temporal. What could warrant the unbounded outlay of generous life except the confidence in spiritual reserves, the prospect of immortal compensations? Which of these paths would the world choose? Is there any evidence that it chose either?

Dr. John Kelman spent much time at the British front with the Y. M. C. A. He touched the war; he saw the soldiers. If the war spiritualized the hearts of clergymen, his book should furnish an example of that fact; if it spiritualized the hearts of soldiers, the worth of his book as testimony should be considerable. Dr. Kelman unquestionably brought to the front in Flanders a liberal, amiable, and gentlemanly temper. That he brought back just that temper, without material addition in the form of profundity or fervor, is the supposition most agreeable to the contents of this book. Dr. Kelman comports himself unimpeachably; fire is duly stressed, heart throbs are suitably commended; the emphasis bestowed on feeling and vitality is an emphasis which no intelligent lover of the proprieties would diminish or increase.

We come next to Dr. Kelman as witness to the awakening of religion in the minds of the soldiers. He holds that some such awakening took place. Its scope is reduced by various reservations made by Dr. Kelman himself which redound to the praise of his candor much more than to the welfare of his plea; and after the impartial secular reader has applied his own pruning-knife to the amended claims of Dr. Kelman, the residue is unexciting. The revival includes five elements or phases, which are called by these names: Fatalism, Mates, Sacrifice, Death, Resurrection. Fatalism means the belief that if a man's "number is up," he will be killed, and not otherwise. Resurrection means: "We don't want to sacrifice ourselves without some good coming to those we leave behind us." I think it would embarrass Dr. Kelman if he were asked in another world to submit these ideas as proofs of religion to John the Baptist, John Huss, John Knox, or John Wesley. It is not easy to see what would bar an agnostic or an atheist from the entertainment of these beliefs. The other three are slightly more religious in character, but the evidence is limited to a few generalities and a few anecdotes, and the dimness with which they are grasped by the soldierly mind is traceable in the honorable caution of Dr. Kelman's own statements.

Dr. Kelman's inadequacy as an affirmative witness is no demonstration of the falsity of his thesis. The establishment of a negative would be an extended and difficult process. The Review would be glad to think that the faculty of worship, which is surely one of the prerogatives and ornaments of human nature, had been rescued from its obscurity, or reclaimed from its obsolescence by the convulsion of a mighty war. Its mind and the case remain open.

Mr. E. A. Ross's little book, "What Is America?" (Century), a plain, but pointed record of timely facts, views the present situation with grave cheerfulness. In a world where cheerfulness is prone to be frisky and gravity to be sombre, grave cheerfulness in a book is a solace and a virtue. Mr. Ross thinks that the onset of new conditions has overtaxed for the moment our powers of self-adjustment, but our resources balance our liabilities, if time be granted us to collect them. To use a figure not taken from Mr. Ross, we can pay one hundred cents on the dollar, if Destiny will but renew our note. Mr. Ross himself has confidence in the moderation of Destiny.

Mr. Ross's title is scarcely precise. His real question is "Où en sommes-nous?" The phrase, "What is America?", might be taken in another sense. What does America mean? What is her calling, her significance, among nations? We imagine a reply on the following lines. America is the result of the union of four things, a powerful race, a favorable territory, sound political habits, and a cautious idealism. Her great material advantage lay in the fact that she could oppose energy in the race to opportunity in the location. Her great moral advantage lay in the fact that the comparative righteousness of English traditional practice and the comparative sobriety of American ideals, with their strong double roots in the egotisms and the generousities of mankind, enabled ideals and traditions to blend as they have rarely blended in the history of nations. The American problem of to-day arises from the practical termination of the material advantage. The race, in the sense of the purity of the race, has disappeared from our land; an amalgam of all peoples is henceforth to be trusted with the stewardship of that tradition which was once the property of the English stock. The place, in a very real sense, has disappeared. The land and water, the plains and mountains, remain; but the room, which was the primary virtue of the place, has gone, and the distance, which was its secondary virtue, has been practically done away with—rolled up as it were by the contractile force of steam and electricity. The question that now faces us is the extent to which the fortune and the character of America will survive the removal of the material aids to which their debt has been so mighty. Time alone can solve that question; we may be certain, however, that its solution will be furthered by that spirit of vigilance, endeavor, and hope which is the animus of Mr. Ross's wholesome volume.

Denmark's popular authors, to judge from the demand at public libraries, of which the country, with its population of two million and a half, has over seven hundred, are in order Holger Drachmann, George Brandes, Zacharias Nielsen, Sophus Banditz, Hendrix Pontopidan, Johannes Jörgensen, Wilhelm Bergsø, and Johannes V. Jensen.

The Joy of Possession

WHEN Bela Kun was in power and Hungary was used as a laboratory for communist experiments, the chemical process of socialization included, among other elements, the appropriation by the state of all treasures of art. Private collections and galleries were confiscated and declared the sole possession of the sovereign proletariat. To the Bela Kuns of Hungary this sort of robbery may have been nothing more than one of the many contrivances to torture the possessing classes into despair, but, strange as it may seem, it was possible to hear this raid on private property praised by such among us as, had they lived in Hungary under Kunian dictatorship, would have been classed by him and his red guards as suspect bourgeois. I met an artist, not long ago, who had been in Munich during the Spartacist riots and had witnessed the excesses to which demagogues are driven by the intoxication of power. That man, in spite of his recent experience, was full of admiration for the Buda-Pest raid on private art.

"I'll tell you why I approve of it," he condescended to explain. "I possess a costly picture myself, a genuine Johannes Vermeer, a wonderful piece of work worth a capital, and, to tell you the honest truth, I feel guilty in keeping it all to myself. I have no right to exclude others from its enjoyment. The artist gave it to the world, and the world is robbed by me who lock it up in my studio. On the interest of the money I could get for it, a poor family I know in Munich could live and be happy."

"To whom would you sell it if you sold it, to a private individual or to the state?"

"To the state, of course, for by selling it to a collector I should persuade a fellow-creature to take my crime upon his conscience."

"But why not give it to the state? The community, you say, was robbed by your possession of the picture; is it fair that you should make the rightful owner pay for the thing you stole from him?"

"It would not be fair, I admit, if I kept the money for myself. But I should give it away to that poor family I told you of."

"You said just now that the rich collector, by taking your picture for his money, would burden himself with your crime of robbing society. Would that poor family not fall into the same trap by accepting the money that you won by theft?"

"True, but those poor wretches must live. They need not know how I got the money. If I gave the picture away to the state, neither the state nor those poor people would be the richer for my honesty."

"I don't understand. The state would not be richer? Would it not have got your valuable picture?"

"Don't try to be funny. The state can not feed them on that."

"But the state could lay aside as much money as the picture is worth, and give it to those poor."

"No, it could not. Why should the state single out one poor family; there are thousands of homes that have just as good a claim on the state's support. Besides, the picture, once given to the state, has no longer any market value. It would not be worth what I could have got for it."

"This is a queer puzzle: If you sell your stolen picture to a private collector, three will be better off for your dishonesty: the collector, whose pride and sense of beauty will be gratified by the new acquisition; the poor family, which, thanks to your money, will be saved from want; and the state, which will be relieved of the care of one destitute home. If, on the other hand, you restore the stolen treasure to whom you consider to be its rightful owner, none will benefit by your honesty: the collector will be disappointed, the starving home will go on starving, and the state will possess a picture which, by its gift to the state, will have lost its market value? If I were you, I should abide by dishonesty. It can not be such a very wicked sort of dishonesty that has such beneficent effects."

"You cynical scoffer! Does it not occur to your materialized mind that market value is an infinitely inferior quality to the imponderable value of beauty? By the gift of that picture I should enrich the nation with an inexhaustible fund of pure enjoyment. Hundreds of thousands would come and look at my Vermeer and go away purified in soul by the emotion that its beauty evokes."

"Those poor starving wretches, would they also come and feed their eyes on its beauty?"

"Not they; physical hunger makes them insensitive to any higher craving."

"You said there are thousands of homes in just the same straits. Would it not be better if the state let your and other people's pictures retain their market value and, instead of feeding the eyes of the susceptible on their higher beauties, devoted special care to the physical feeding of the unæsthetic poor? Besides, if all private collections were nationalized, the beauty of each individual picture would suffer from the overwhelming multitude in which they were hung. Artists never painted their works for wholesale exhibition. Common ownership not only decreases a picture's market value, it also lessens its æsthetic worth. Think of the portrait that Rembrandt painted of his mother hanging in the living-room of his parents' simple home. Would it not be far more impressive in those surroundings, for which it was destined by the artist, a manifestation in color of a great man's devotion, than on the wall of a picture gallery, where, among the crowd of other scenes, the essence of its intimate beauty would be lost?"

"So you look upon public collections as the burial-places of art?"

"I do not mean that. Without them a people's life would be infinitely poorer. I do not curse the sun for shining upon all and every one, although I love it most for the beauty it adds to my garden. I do not curse the state for the claim it lays to the devotion of all its children, although I love my son best not as a prospective citizen, but simply because he is my own child. Even so I love the picture best that I possess myself. I count it mine not because I obtained it at the sacrifice of my hard-earned money, but because of my love for its beauty which made me capable of the sacrifice. There are hundreds of thousands who feel what I feel, and the sum of their individual loves for the treasures that they own is an essential part of social contentment."

"Can I add to your private contentment by selling you my Johannes Vermeer?"

"Sorry, I have not the money. Otherwise I should gladly take your crime upon myself."

A. J. BARNOUW

Bolshevist Propaganda Ninety Years Ago

BOLSHEVISM may appear strikingly new to this generation. But it is an old story in the annals of American history. The only new thing about its present revival is its name. The essentials of it are antique. Ninety and more years ago they were widely urged in the United States. The American workmen were not only pressed to rise and create a system based upon them, but a deliberate attempt was made to manipulate the workers' organizations in favor of the plan. The American workingmen rejected the programme, and did so after giving it the fullest consideration.

If practically all of our American histories are uninforming as to the agitation of that period, excuse can be found for the ignorance of Bolshevist promoters, many of whom are aliens. To obtain the full details of the extreme social and industrial innovations then proposed it is necessary to explore not only the newspapers but the pamphlets of that time. Both sides rather profusely campaigned by means of pamphlets. Of these but a few copies have survived, and they are discoverable only after extended search in old archives where, more by chance than by design, they found safe lodgment. The pamphlets are the more interesting, for in them the proposals, arguments, and counter arguments are set forth. And it may be noted, by the way, that the age of pamphlets into which we seem to be entering is a repetition of the prevalent practice in by-gone times.

Industrial communism, free and easy marriage and divorce, children the property of the state, abolition of religious instruction—all of these and other changes decreed by the Bolshevik régime in Russia were proposed in the United States during the years 1826-1834. Lenin and Trotsky are fond of referring to Karl Marx as the great creator of ideas and as the monumental theoretical authority. But in many respects Marx only repeated theories that others had already advocated, and with singular ability, too.

The Bolshevism of nearly a hundred years ago, like that of to-day, became an acute public question with astonishing suddenness. But the approaches were gradual and may be clearly traced. The French Revolution and the anti-religious campaign headed by Thomas Paine had left their impression. Then came Robert Dale Owen with his gospel of perfect social and industrial equality. The story of the New Harmony Community of Equality that he established at New Harmony, Indiana, is tolerably well known—how all property was to be held in common and there were to be no idlers; how the greed of some members led to bitter disputes over property; how in 1826 the community was dissolved; and how Owen, disillusioned and weary, withdrew from the enterprise.

What followed this disruption forms the untold part of the story. A number of Owen's followers were "bright and ardent intellects"—exhibiting the qualities which are seen to-day in the leading agitators for Bolshevism. They refused to believe that human factors had any effect in causing the failure, just as the Bolshevik enthusiasts of to-day when confronted with facts decline to admit or even consider them. The parallel goes even further. Owen's chief followers stoutly objected to any charge that the experiment was a failure and insisted that their theory was unassailably correct; if tried on an extended scale it would, they declared, infallibly succeed. Similarly the Bolshevist leaders of the present, when faced by proofs that their theory hasn't at all worked out as planned, hold that nothing is wrong with the theory; all that it needs for complete success, they assure us, is trial on an international basis.

Those who clung with tenacious confidence to Owen's theories resolved upon a national agitation, making New York City their headquarters. One of these was Frances E. Wright, a British woman who claimed America as her adopted country. Miss Wright started on a lecture tour throughout the United States, speaking in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, Cincinnati, and in other cities. In her lecture on "Morals" she contended for free sex unions; for the separation of children from their parents; and for the establishment of state institutions in which the children were to be placed and reared. She also demanded the abolition of churches and Sunday schools. In another of her lectures she demanded the abolition of all class distinctions and declared that her goal was so to change the social body that "the American people shall present in another generation but one class, and, as it were, but one family." She denounced "the intellectual and moral inefficiencies of our professional classes," and appealed to the working classes to change the whole social order.

Commenting on her lectures the New York Evening Post, of January 10, 1829, said in part: "Of those who have attended her lectures in this city, the greater number have gone for mere curiosity, and as soon as this curiosity is gratified, her audience will be confined to the few free-thinkers who have sufficient zeal for their doctrines to attend a regular public exposition and defense of them. . . . In the meantime Miss Wright is at least entitled to courteous treatment as long as her errors are merely speculative, and are not attended with any practical immoralities." "A Mother," writing to the Evening Post, January 27, 1829, declared of Miss Wright: "She is an echo of Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, whose writings had at one period so baleful an influence upon female society in England."

At that period a woman agitator was a distinct novelty. The excitement was increased by the ultra-radicalism of the doctrines preached by Miss Wright. But she was by no means alone. Seeing advantage in the sensation that she was creating, the group of men radicals clustered about her formed a movement to agitate for industrial communism, and set about to try to capture control of the workingmen's organizations, particularly the Workingmen's Party, formed in New York City in 1829. The leading spirit in the formation of this party was Owen of the New Harmony experiment. The workingmen were not at all anxious for any sweeping social changes. They were strongly individualistic, although willing to join in unions for the betterment of their economic status. They were specifically desirous of such reforms as a better school system, a mechanics' lien law, the abolition of imprisonment for debt, shorter work hours, and a stoppage of the promiscuous granting of bank charters, which often had the effect of imposing depreciated paper money upon them as wages. In the election of 1829 the Workingmen's Party polled 6,000 votes, a large vote in the comparatively small New York City of that time.

How the Bolsheviks of 1830 went about getting the control of the workingmen's organization was related in an Address issued in 1830 by the "Majority of the General Executive Committee of The Mechanics and Other Workingmen of the City of New York." This Address opened by denouncing the propaganda to separate children entirely from their parents and deprive them of all books of a religious nature. It told how some of the New Harmony Community leaders had, after the failure of that experiment, settled in New York City. "In this city," the Address went on, "they managed rather adroitly than otherwise;—taking advantage of public feeling, which had strongly and almost universally expressed itself in favor of a more republican system of education, they endeavored to unite with it their New Harmony Community and State Guardianship plan." A number of these propagandists, the Manifesto said, had got on the Workingmen's Committee. "It was in vain," the Address further announced, "they were informed of the determination of the majority never to engage in, nor sanction so visionary a project. . . . But while we advocate a republican system of education, as the main pillar on which our political liberties are to rest, we stand unalterably opposed to the State Guardianship or Community system; we are not yet prepared to attempt the subversion of the order of nature, or to believe that this community will ever sanction the connexion of Agrarianism and Infidelity with our political concerns; we are too well acquainted with the character of the workingmen of this city; we have too high an opinion of the American people to believe for a moment that they will ever sanction such principles, or engage in so fanatical a crusade." The Address concluded by saying that the Communists promulgated principles "calculated, as we believe, totally to subvert our civil and social institutions, and to introduce anarchy, confusion and immorality into our country."

Defeated in their efforts to get control of the workingmen's organizations from within, the Communists tried the process of attempting to win converts by outside propaganda. They obtained control of two newspapers—the Free Enquirer, and the Workingmen's Advocate. They tried very hard to get control of a third—the Evening Journal—but they failed. Organizing "The New York Association for the Gratuitous Distribution of Discussions on Political Economy" they issued a series of pamphlets preaching industrial communism. One of these pamphlets, published in 1831, urged:

Would it be wrong that every business that can not be carried on by a single person should be conducted by associations in which all the members put equal property, and from which all drew equal profit or such proportion as they all agree upon? Would it be wrong that sailors under such circumstances . . . should own the ship they navigate? Would it be wrong that a hundred or other number of ship carpenters should in like manner possess their shipyard with its materials, and thus in mutual benefit build ships for those who want them? Would it be wrong that those who by hundreds and thousands spend their miserable lives in manufactories, should own those establishments and work them on their own account?

All of these and other pleadings of the same purport were unavailing; the workingmen remained unconvinced. The Communist movement collapsed. A little later came Fourierism, and that movement, too, passed away.

The details here given show many obvious resemblances between the Communist agitation of 1826-1834 and the Bolshevism of to-day. Both denounce the professional class, although, like the Bolshevism of these days, the movement of nearly a century ago was led exclusively by professional theorists. The project of dispensing with technical or administrative skill in the industries was then clearly implied, and the supremacy of manual labor then preached is the precise dogma upon which modern Bolshevism bases the fierce demand for "a dictatorship of the proletariat." In these respects, and obviously in many others, the Communism of ninety years ago bore striking resemblances to the Bolshevik programme, but the world in which it found itself was a very different one from ours, and we have yet to learn how speedily the present movement will spend itself or find new forms of expression.

GUSTAVUS MYERS

Books and the News

[Under this heading there will be presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little farther into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt will be made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available without much trouble, through publisher, book-seller, or public library. Books obscure or out of print will be avoided, and books in English will be preferred to those in other languages. These articles will not include bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles will be written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

Strikes

AS with all sociological and industrial questions, one can keep accurately informed about strikes only by reading the most recent sources of information—newspapers, government reports, and articles in periodicals. An excellent textbook in some respects becomes soon out of date, with no reference to the latest developments. A view of the historical background, however, a correct account of the causes and results of notable strikes, as well as a discussion of certain unchanging characteristics of all labor disputes, may better be obtained from the book of five, ten, or twenty years ago than from the columns of today's paper.

Carroll D. Wright's "The Battles of Labor" (Jacobs, 1906) gives brief and readable chapters on the history of strikes in ancient and mediæval times, descriptions of great American strikes with their conduct and effects. In "Industrial Arbitration," by Carl H. Mote (Bobbs-Merrill, 1916), the author discusses labor legislation and experiments in England, France, Germany, and Australasia, as well as industrial legislation in America, and the terms of settlement of famous strikes in this country. The investigator who becomes cheered by the roseate title of Henry D. Lloyd's "A Country Without Strikes" (Doubleday, Page, 1902) is later saddened to read, in other works, of strikes in New Zealand, the country which Mr. Lloyd describes. The book is valuable, nevertheless, for the account of the Compulsory Arbitration Court. Oscar T. Crosby's "Strikes: When to Strike, How to Strike" (Putnam, 1910) includes some interesting, though somewhat paternal, discussion of the morality and legality of strikes, questioning: do they pay? "Boycotts and the Labor Struggle," by Harry W. Laidler (Lane, 1913), is a valuable and thorough history of the boycott from the first employment of the term in Ireland in 1880, with accounts of such events in America as the railroad boycotts in the 1890's, the Buck's Stove and Danbury Hatters' cases, the legal aspects of the boycott, and the attitude of foreign and American courts towards this kind of weapon. Julius H. Cohen, in "Law and Order in Industry" (Macmillan, 1916), describes the strikes in the clothing industry in New York, the "protocols" and settlements, while the strikes of coal miners are given a careful, historical study in Arthur E. Suffern's "Conciliation and Arbitration in the Coal Industry of America" (Houghton, 1915).

Books about the labor question in general usually contain sections devoted to strikes. Thus, there is an important chapter on strikes and boycotts in "Labor Problems," by Thomas S. Adams and Helen L. Sumner (Macmillan, 1913). The chapter includes tables showing the causes of certain strikes, the percentage of them ordered by organizations, (Continued on page 372)

Textiles

“The Individual Motor Drive is the logical drive for the Textile Industry and we will prove it!”

This was the challenge made by C-W engineers in 1901. To-day, America's greatest textile mills are the strongest exponents of the Individual Drive.

The C-W Start and Stop Loom Motor is recognized as the most economical and satisfactory method of driving looms.

Here again, the C-W Company foresaw a vital need of industry and met it successfully.

Alb Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

- NEW YORK
- BOSTON
- SYRACUSE
- CHICAGO
- CLEVELAND
- BIRMINGHAM

- PITTSBURGH
- NEWARK
- NEW HAVEN
- PHILADELPHIA
- BALTIMORE
- SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

AN INCOMPARABLE STOCK

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

SITE for a SCHOOL

OR FOR A

Private Country Place

With a Group of Substantial Buildings

In one of the most beautiful and healthful locations in Berkshire County, Massachusetts, in the Lenox and Stockbridge neighborhood, an estate of about 570 acres is offered for sale at a very reasonable price. About 250 acres are under cultivation and the rest is timber land and pasturage.

There are fourteen buildings on the property, substantially built at a cost far exceeding the present price of the entire property.

If the purchaser desired to sell the timber, (recently estimated at a high value by the State Forester,) a very considerable reduction in the net price of the property could be effected.

It is suggested that anyone who is interested would profit by addressing the undersigned at an early date.

Herbert E. Moore, Lee, Mass.

(Continued from page 370)
 and their success or failure. George G. Groat's "Introduction to the Study of Organized Labor in America" (Macmillan, 1916) devotes about one hundred and eighty pages to a scholarly study of strikes and lockouts, and is strong on tables of statistics. There is a briefer but useful chapter on strikes, lockouts, blacklists, etc., in Frank T. Carlton's "History and Problems of Organized Labor" (Heath). A. J. Portenar, author of "Organized Labor" (Macmillan, 1912), is a firm believer in labor organizations, who defends the strike as "our last, dread resource."

Railroad strikes are of such supreme importance that the reader may care to look at Edward Hungerford's "The Railroad Problem" (McClurg, 1917). Five of its readable chapters discuss the labor situation and the railroads. Another book on a related topic is "Violence and the Labor Movement" by Robert Hunter (Macmillan, 1914). This is a history of the birth of terrorism and of the use of violence in the spread of socialism and in labor troubles, with an account of the conflict between those who favor "political action" and those who are for "direct action" or violence. Finally, the reader who wishes to know of still more references about strikes—especially articles and books antedating those mentioned here—should consult A. P. C.

Griffin's "Select List of Books (with References to Periodicals) on Labor, particularly Relating to Strikes." This was first published in 1903 by the Library of Congress.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

- Cannan, Gilbert. Mummery. Doran. $1.50 net.
- Ibañez, V. Blasco. Mare Nostrum. Dutton. $1.90.
- Johnston, Sir Harry. The Gay Dombey's. Macmillan. $2.00.
- Lyons, A. U. A London Lot. Lane. Short Stories of the New America. Selected and edited by M. A. Laselle. Holt. $1.35 net.
- Street, Julian. After Thirty. Century. $1.50.
- Wodehouse, P. G. Their Mutual Child. Boni & Liveright. $1.60 net.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

- Repington, Charles à Court. Vestigia: Records of an Active Life. Houghton Mifflin. $5.00.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

- The Man Versus the State. A Collection of Essays by Herbert Spencer. Edited by Truxton Beale. Mitchell Kennerley. $2.00 net.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

- Bevan, Edwyn. German Social Democracy during the War. Dutton. $2.50 net.
- Coleman, Frederic. The Far East Unveiled. Houghton Mifflin. $3.00.
- Frost, Stanley. Germany's New War Against America. Dutton. $2.00 net.

JUVENILE

- The Children's Fairyland. Translated and adapted from the Fairy Tales of the Countess D'Aulnoy. Holt. $1.50.

POETRY

- Deutsch, Babbette. Banners. Doran. $1.25 net.

POETRY AND DRAMA

- Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling. Doubleday, Page. $2.00 net.
- Watts, H. W. Jehovah: God of Battles Up-to-Date. Winston. $1.00 net.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

- Harris, Rendel. The Origin of the Doctrine of the Trinity. Longmans, Green. $1.00 net.
- Hopkins, E. W. The History of Religions. Macmillan. $3.00.
- Jastrow, Morris, Jr. A Gentle Cynic. Lippincott. $2.00 net.

THE ARTS

- Herford, M. A. B. A Handbook of Greek Vase Painting. Longmans, Green. $3.75 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

- De Carlo, C. The Flying Spy. Dutton. $2.00 net.
- Gaines, Ruth. Helping France. Dutton. $2.00 net.
- Galsworthy, John. Addresses in America, 1919. Scribner. $1.75 net.
- Hamm, E. C. In White Armour: Life of Captain A. E. Hamm. Putnam. $1.50 net.
- Harris, J. R. Origin and Meaning of Apple Cults. Longmans, Green. 60 cents.
- Man, Henry de. The Remaking of a Mind. Scribner.
- Mr. Dooley on Making a Will and Other Necessary Evils. Scribner. $1.35 net.
- Smith, R. W. The Sober World. Marshall Jones Co. $2.00 net.

The Review is Established

as an organ of sane American opinion; it has found a definite place in American journalism; it is read in more than 600 libraries in every state in the Union; it is quoted every week by newspapers throughout the country.

Can you afford to be without THE REVIEW?

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

SEP 15 1919
LIBRARY
373

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 18

New York, Saturday, September 13, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	373
Editorial Articles:
Mr. Wilson on the Stump	376
The Committee's Proposal	377
The Peace Treaty with Austria	377
Our Duty in Siberia	378
The College Back Again	378
Lenin's Lying Legion. By Jerome Landfield	380
The Birthday of the Constitution. By David Jayne Hill	381
Because the French Call Water "Lo." By Stoddard Dewey	383
O. Henry. By O. W. Firkins	384
Correspondence	386
Book Reviews:
Herbert Spencer's Value To-day	388
The New "Laissez Faire"	389
A Historian in the Field	390
The West, Inc.	390
The Run of the Shelves	391
Intensive Vacationing. By Harry Ayres	391
Books and the News: Mexico. By Edmund Lester Pearson	392

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $3.00 a year.

GENERAL PERSHING is entitled to a deep sense of satisfaction that such honors as he receives at the hands of the American people are not a bit more than he richly deserves. He does not get an earldom and a fortune, but he is made free of the small and distinguished company of America's great military leaders, and it will occur to no one that he is not perfectly in place there. Picked for his job, in the first instance, very much in the manner that a corporation would set about choosing the best available salesman to open a new and difficult territory, he has done his job, one of tremendous scope and beset at every turn with possibilities of going wrong, in a thoroughly workman-like manner. It was a soldier's job, and he discharged it like a soldier. The one thing needful, without which a potential American army endowed already with so many excellent qualities would never have become a real army and a victorious army, was discipline. This indispensable thing he supplied, and supplied successfully because he was himself the perfect embodiment of it. If the history of the war had been different, if we had been called upon to face, like the European nations or like the North in our own Civil War, long periods of depression approaching discouragement, then General Pershing would have been called on to display other qualities than those of the master organizer. But military men have enough to worry about without considering the "might have beens." As a matter of fact, the war ended as it did largely because General Pershing from the start saw the necessity of building up a distinctively American army and never lost sight of the means essential to that end. What he achieved was perfectly adjusted to the object proposed. There was in his performance of the task a clear-sightedness, a tenacity of purpose, and a fine economy of effort which a grateful and admiring people would like to compliment themselves by calling American.

I AM in favor of and would gladly vote for the treaty and the League covenant as it was originally presented to the Senate by the President without amendment or reservation. . . . I also believe it is of the highest importance to this country and to the world that it be ratified without further delay.

What conclusion does Senator Simmons, Democrat, of North Carolina, draw from these premises, and from the additional fact that ratification "without amendment or reservation" is not attainable? He draws the common-sense conclusion that the only thing to do is to reach "some compromise between those who favor the treaty and covenant without reservation and those who are in favor of it with conservative reservations of interpretative character." It is safe to say that this is the actual state of mind of at least three-fourths of the whole membership of the Senate, Republican and Democrat. Why not act upon it? Why not speak out now, and thus hasten—and make sure—the only solution of the problem that has the merit both of being attainable and of being reasonably satisfactory to the country as a whole?

IT is no ordinary desire to celebrate, but a profound sense of public need, that has led to the organized effort to make this year's anniversary of the birth of the United States Constitution a day of special observance. Eight national patriotic associations have united in this effort, and have enlisted in behalf of it the interest of a large number of eminent public men and civic organizations throughout the country. It is most earnestly to be hoped that the impulse thus given will result in a genuine revival of interest in the momentous instrument which has been the cornerstone of American liberty, security, and greatness. Beyond the eloquence and the patriotic appeal of the celebration itself, there should come well-devised plans of public enlightenment on the essential elements of the Constitution. That these have long been lost sight of by the great mass of our people—not to speak of the utter ignorance of them prevailing in a large section of the population—is one of the primary reasons for the movement, the other being that undermining of respect for the Constitution which has so long been deliberately promoted by certain "advanced" thinkers, with little check from its supporters. Our readers will find, in the article contributed by David Jayne Hill to this issue of the Review, an impressive account of the situation with which the lovers of our country's institutions find themselves confronted.

THERE was real life and feeling in the honor done last Saturday to the memory of Lafayette, in New York and in many other American cities. The enthusiasm that Lafayette's generous service to the cause of freedom awakened at the time, and again on his visit to America in his old age, can never be reproduced. The busy life of a later age will never sufficiently acquaint itself with the facts, or get near enough in spirit to feel their deeper significance. But the Lafayette tradition lives nevertheless, and holds no minor place among the ties that keep France and America at heart together. And every new stirring into active expression of this sentiment, as on last Saturday, is heartily to be welcomed. Before the genuine fire of such manifestations, petty misunderstandings and infelicities must wither away. It is a singularly fortunate chance that Lafayette day coincides with the anniversary of the First Battle of the Marne, which, says Admiral von Tirpitz, "was a terrible blow to the [German] army leaders, and left them stunned and baffled as to the future." With this added reason for celebrating, so nicely in harmony with Lafayette's life-work and character, our youth will not soon be allowed to forget just why our forefathers left us so many Lafayette Avenues, Lafayette Squares, and other forms of Lafayette memorials. But the greatest gain in the present situation is the fact that Englishmen and Americans can to-day join in the two-fold celebration, honoring without reservation not only the skill and courage that beat back the first mad lunge of Prussianism at the Marne, but also the memory of Lafayette, in whose legacy of the generous spirit of liberty modern Britain stands as co-heir with modern America, and with every true devotee of human freedom, whatever be his country or his race.

LYNCHINGS, and truculent expressions of the lynching spirit, are deplorably prominent in recent news from the South. We have no idea that the disturbances that have occurred in Washington, Chicago, and elsewhere presage anything like a race war. But it is quite within the possibilities that troubles between whites and blacks may, in the present time of widespread unrest and unsettlement, attain dimensions far beyond anything that has been experienced in the past. The South ought to feel that the least it can do for the general welfare, in this situation, is to put a stop to the lynching savagery, which has done more than anything else to create bitterness and ill-will among the negroes. Never has the duty resting upon Southern men in places of authority or influence, to do their very utmost to stamp out this disgrace, been so imperative as it is to-day.

ELIHU ROOT spoke like the wise man he is when he expressed himself in favor of wiping out the business of attempting to bring about justice by a multiplicity of statutes. A statute too often represents merely what some bright young man thinks would remedy his own particular grievance, or else it may merely embody that particular stage of the muddle at which collective ignorance, through press of other business, decides to abandon it, to the confusion alike of the courts that try to interpret it and the people who try to live under it. But the source of the trouble is with the people themselves: as a people our confidence in the efficiency of laws has quite obscured our fundamental respect for law. Laws are many and complex, law is comparatively simple. Formulas and short-cuts and "happy thoughts" are countless and alluring; common sense is perhaps only apparently growing less common and less like sense.

THE various bills before Congress providing a bonus to all soldiers enrolled in our armies are not called for by existing conditions or by any sound theory of military service. Our armies have been compensated more liberally than in any previous instance in history. For all cases of disability incurred in service, and for dependents of the slain, more ample provision has been made than ever before. In these proposals for a cash bonus, regardless of need and based simply on the fact of enrollment, it is difficult to see anything else than a bid for the favor of the "soldier vote." Let us hope that there is to be no soldier vote to bid for in the sense which such a bid suggests.

THE idea that nations possess an individuality as clearly definable as that of separate human beings is a tenet of modern thought inextricably interwoven with the new conceptions of international law and a League of Nations. The war has revealed to us the truth of the old lesson taught to an unheeding world by Grotius three hundred years ago that a nation should be held responsible for the crimes of its government; but responsibility presupposes a consciousness of self which is the hall-mark of individuality. Language gave expression to this notion long before statesmen and diplomatists could be brought to admit that Grotius was right: a brave people, a young, a mature, an old, a dying nation are commonplaces of speech investing the conception of national entity with the distinctives of individual existence.

It is in keeping with this conception that the Great Powers, the wise grown-up nations, have begun to bring up and educate the children in the nursery of Europe. But the training of children is an art which only the gifted can master by dint of long and devoted study. To suppose that the diplomats and statesmen of the Entente could have wakened from the nightmare of the war fully accomplished pedagogues is an insult to the teaching profession. A man who was trained so to use his words as to conceal his thoughts is not, at a moment's notice, converted into a mentor of children, for whom the first commandment should be: Be straightforward with them. And if the children are given in charge of more than one teacher, these should take good care to agree on their methods and programme, and not to bring their wranglings into the class-room. It is a dangerous mistake to let little Aristides and Cyrillus know that the masters are not unanimous as to which of them deserves the prize. And to punish Rumanos for his greed, the natural vice, after all, of his barbarous age, without, at the same time, rewarding him for his bravery which holds a promise for the future, will undo the good of a year's training by the poison of resentment instilled into his proud little mind.

The nurses of the Norland Institute in London, they say, are taught never to tell their charges, "Don't do this, don't do that." To be forbidden is hateful to children, but they will readily obey a command if it is explained to them why it is given. But the fewer one gives the better, for the less they are made to feel the tutor's guidance the better chance their individual qualities will have of developing their possibilities to the full.

M. CLEMENCEAU is terribly at ease in the Academy. He does not propose to let immortality bore him. He will wear no livery of green and gilt, he will make no speeches, he will pay no dues—in short, he will live a mortal among mortals and visit Olympus only when and as he pleases. The world will relish this gesture of his in something the same spirit that it treasures Dr. Johnson's letter to Lord Chesterfield. If he refused altogether, the world would like him still better. The Academy needs M. Clémenceau, but having extended its invitation it could manage to get along without him. M. Clémenceau does not in the least need the Academy. But if he accepts its invitation, once having in effect expressed his opinion of the tardiness of it, he should be willing to play the game.

THE report is current that Mr. H. G. Wells has turned his attention away from fiction for the present and is engaged in the composition of a 350,000-word history of the world. That Mr. Wells should write a history of the world, as he sees it, is not at all unlikely. Such a work would perform a useful function as underpinning for his ideas, expressed in his novels, as to what the world is to-day and what it ought to do with itself for the future. But why the assumption that in doing this Mr. Wells has turned his attention away from fiction?

ARCHÆOLOGISTS of the future will have a merry time of it when some fortunate among them uncovers the graceful and appropriate tablet which the New York World dedicated the other day to the memory of its staff who served in the war. PRO PATRIA ET ARMA they will read, doubtless with some difficulty and misgiving, and then the fun will start. What language is it? Esperanto, in which all cases are alike? No, a monograph will prove conclusively that, in the early years of the twentieth century, memorial inscriptions, whether they meant anything or not, were always in Latin. A necessary hypothesis, but a difficult one on which to work. Professor Müllenowitz-Willemdorf of the Republican-Democratic University of Berlin will publish a brochure establishing, to his own satisfaction, that in the vulgar Latinity of that day arma was a feminine noun meaning exercitus, or army. "For the fatherland and the army—a very beautiful and becoming thought (dulce et decorum) and an interesting case of the climax of ideas." A more daring school of conjectural emendators will advocate the substitution for the offending arma, or even the grammatically less whimsical armis, of the excellently appropriate mundo; "for the fatherland, and, may I not add, for the world, or World." The contention which will eventually carry the day, however, will deftly throw it out that, with a view to enhancing the delicacy of the tribute, the task of preparing the motto was entrusted to the unaided ingenuity of the composing room. And composing rooms, we all know, are everywhere inhabited by descendants of the prophet Habakkuk, who in his day, as they in ours, was capable de tout.

"THERE is no difficulty in demonstrating," says a writer in the Dial, "that a unit of human effort and skill can produce to-day at least a hundred times as much as was possible a hundred years ago." If the writer had said that there are certain articles of which a unit of human effort, aided by modern inventions and discoveries, can produce a hundred times as much as was possible a hundred years ago, a careful reader could accept the statement as at least probably true. But the words quoted are pointless, in their context, unless they are taken to mean that the power of production per unit of human effort as a whole has been multiplied one hundred times within a century. So stated, the assertion melts into mere absurdity to any one who stops to think. But perhaps that is no serious injury to its value as an argument for those to whom it is addressed.

DEPAUW UNIVERSITY is suffering a bit of unpleasant notoriety from lack of due caution, it would seem, in the selection of a new Professor of Sociology. President Grose had chosen Arthur W. Calhoun for the position, to begin service in September, the permanency of the appointment being conditioned upon approval by the board of trustees, to whom the matter would be referred on the occasion of their next regular meeting. Tentative appointments of this kind are, of course, of everyday occurrence in college administration. In the meantime, however, United States District Attorney Clyne, of Chicago, has given to the press a letter by Professor Calhoun in which radical socialistic views are expressed, with unmistakable indication of his disposition to use his professorship for the active propagation of such views. He is not sure of the possibility of "the immediately revolution," but is convinced that it can be hastened by spreading the notion that it can come soon. To that end, he believes in "keeping ultimates everlastingly in the centre of attention, to the exclusion of mere puttering reforms." Confiscation is one of the measures to which he declares his firm adherence. Incidentally, he mentions a visit from a representative of the Nation, who assured him that its circulation had greatly increased since it "became Bolshevik." Greencastle dispatches state that the publication of his letter has caused much indignation in DePauw University circles, and it seems doubtful whether his appointment, not yet passed upon by the trustees, will be allowed to stand. No doubt certain organs of radical agitation will see in this a violent assault upon freedom of thought, and a grave peril to democracy. But the common sense of the American people revolts against the idea of turning our colleges into tools for the destruction of the very civilization to which they owe their existence. The claim that freedom of thought and utterance requires any such policy is absurd.

STODDARD DEWEY, in another column of the Review, gives an interesting discussion of the causes underlying the constant attempts to stir up prejudice in America against the French. Doubtless all the causes suggested are at work, but one can not believe that all combined will be able to produce any widely spread or deeply rooted ill-feeling. Too large a portion of our people are aware of their shallowness and interested in counteracting them.

There is one source of irritation, however, not mentioned in Mr. Dewey's article, which France herself can and should remove. We refer to the condition unfortunately existing in the Paris police office, to which American civilians must go for the requisite endorsement upon their passports before sailing for home. The tiresome waiting there seems at first a mere matter of inefficiency, but a man with eyes and ears alert can soon detect that the apparent inefficiency is only a rather clumsy cover for a detestable system of petty graft. The slow of perception, and the honest, tire themselves out with waiting—five hours in a case personally known to us—while others, by the deft use of a little money, purchase their way through in a few minutes. Persons who had used this method did not hesitate to come out into the corridor where others were waiting and tell the secret of their success. The numbers handed out to applicants on entrance to the corridor were not successive, but in utter confusion, thus making it a little less easy to detect the fact that the holders were not regularly called to the inner office in the order in which their numbers had been assigned. A careful scrutiny of what was going on, both in the corridor and in the inner office, gave ample evidence that the force at hand could easily have taken care of every applicant with no tiresome waiting, if such had been its purpose. The trouble was organized graft, not confusion due to the overcrowding of an undermanned office. An emphatic statement and denunciation of this dishonesty, made to one of the officials most clearly involved, drew only a cynical smile in reply. It is a pity that hosts of American travelers must carry back to their homes so exasperating a memory of their departure from France. In the interest of that good feeling which we all desire, the passport division of the Paris police office should be subjected to a severe overhauling.

THE Circulation Department of the New York Public Library is asking the Board of Estimate and Apportionment for increased support. The request is entirely reasonable, and we hope that it will meet with a prompt and generous response. The endowment of the Library is sufficient to support only the great Reference Department of the Central Building, and the Circulating Library housed under the same roof. The forty-two branches and six sub-branches located elsewhere depend upon the city for their maintenance. These branches carry almost the entire burden of circulation work of the Library, lending an average of over ten million books each year to readers in all parts of Manhattan, Bronx, and Richmond boroughs. The educational influence of such a work is beyond measure; and yet the allowance for its support during the present year was only $765,000, as compared with $837,000 for 1918. And this reduction has taken place at a time when books cost more than ever before, and when the salaries of librarians and assistants should in simple justice be substantially increased. Branch librarians are receiving from $115 to $150 per month, while the different grades of assistants run at $55 to $65, $70 to $85, $80 to $95, and $90 to $110. It is evident that a suitably trained force can not be held together for such meagre compensation. The pay must be materially increased, or the work must suffer inevitable and serious deterioration. The higher interests of New York are too closely bound up with this work to permit of the latter alternative. The library budget made up for 1920 calls, we understand, for a little over one million dollars. This contemplates no great advance, questionable in these times of stress, but only a necessary adjustment of salaries and a modest increase in the purchase of new books.

Mr. Wilson on the Stump

IF ALL of the President's speeches had been like the opening speech of the series at Columbus, they would have called for but one comment. The speech was everything that an appeal to a great Constitutional democracy, addressed to it by the head of the nation at a time of momentous parliamentary crisis, should not be. "The only people I owe any report to are you and the other citizens of the United States," was its opening declaration. Near its close, he said: "I have not come to debate the treaty. It speaks for itself if you will let it. . . . I am not going anywhere to debate the treaty. I am going to expound it." And nowhere between this beginning and this ending did he come to grapple with the situation confronting him and the country in the actual division of sentiment so long and so seriously manifested in the Senate.

The President is within his rights in "reporting to the people." It is not absolutely beyond the bounds of possibility that a speech-making tour of the kind he has undertaken might evoke a popular response so unmistakable that all men would recognize in it the authentic voice of the nation. But against the attainment of such a result there is in any case an almost overwhelming presumption; something infinitely more conclusive than the mere assembling of great crowds, or their enthusiastic plaudits under the speaker's spell, is required for it. But in the present instance the possibility is incomparably more remote than in the case of an ordinary question of politics or government. The issue in the Senate is not the simple issue of acceptance or rejection of the peace treaty; not even the simple issue of establishment or non-establishment of the League of Nations. The question is whether, in a transaction which its advocates would be the last to deny is of supreme importance for the whole future of the nation and of the world, we are bound to forgo any effective precaution against what many men of the highest intelligence and the most sincere patriotism regard as grave dangers for the long future, upon the plea that recourse to such precautions would involve insuperable difficulties or bring on unbearable evils in the immediate present. To suppose that a question of this kind can be authoritatively answered by the apparent popular response to a series of campaign speeches is to suppose something very like a miracle.

In the speeches subsequent to the opening one at Columbus, there is far more substantial matter than in that first utterance; but there is no attempt to accomplish the one thing needful. Mr. Wilson does, indeed, expound many aspects of the treaty, sometimes in very effective language; but he proceeds upon the curious hypothesis that to dwell upon its merits is to answer all charges of demerit, and the still more curious hypothesis that any opponent of the treaty as it stands who does not couple with his criticism an exposition of its virtues is a deliberate misleader of the people. In almost every speech he makes such thrusts as this:

The Covenant of the League of Nations is a covenant of arbitration and discussion. Had anybody ever told you that before? I dare say that everybody you have heard about this document discusses Article X. Well, there are twenty-five other articles in it and all of them are about something else.

If Mr. Wilson's audiences are so lacking in intelligence as this kind of talk implies, it matters little what they think about the treaty. Of course, as a matter of fact, they are not; and if for the moment such a remark may make an impression, surely the slightest reflection will remove it. Everybody knows that a man engaged in making objections to Article X is under no obligation to rehearse the content of the other twenty-four articles; and furthermore, the fact that the Covenant is "a covenant of arbitration and discussion" is as familiar to the entire public, and has from the beginning been as familiar to the entire public, as the fact that a League of Nations is under consideration at all.

Let us consider one of the few instances in which Mr. Wilson does take up a specific point of objection. In his speech at St. Louis, speaking of our obligations under Article X, he says:

What these gentlemen are afraid of is that we will get into trouble. If we are a party [to the quarrel in question] we are in trouble already. And if we are not a party, we control the advice of the Council by our own vote. And, my friends, that is a little like an open and shut game, and I am not afraid of advice which we give ourselves. And yet that is the whole of the bugaboo which these gentlemen have been parading before you.

The first part of this facile disposal of a big question we may pass over; the President is right in saying, as he did, that it is practically certain that we shall not ourselves be a party to any act of territorial aggression. But Mr. Wilson must certainly know, and the more intelligent part of his audience must also know, the plain answer—a perfectly obvious one—that has been given to what he says on the second point. If we are to preserve the right of Congress to decide whether the country shall or shall not follow the advice of the Council, the presence of an American member in the Council would, in circumstances easily possible, not be an aid but a detriment. The American member of the Council might not reflect in his action either the sentiment of the country or the judgment of Congress; and one of the reasons most strongly urged in favor of the reservation expressly reciting the prerogative of Congress in the matter is that the decision of the one man who happened to represent us in the Council could not be regarded as definitely binding the country. Upon what theory of intelligent public discussion can a shallow bit of campaign oratory like this be regarded as a sufficient answer to the serious arguments of Senators and publicists?

Nowhere does the President put himself more clearly on the plane of the stump-speaker than in his repeated challenges to opponents to offer a substitute. He taunts them with having nothing to propose; he defies them to draft a treaty better than the one made at Versailles. This is wild talk; it would be wild even if it were true that no proposal were before the country except that of unconditional acceptance or absolute rejection. It takes away from the force of the many effective things which the President says in favor of the general ideas of the treaty and the League; for such loose talk—and there is an abundance of it on a dozen other phases of the treaty—can not fail to engender suspicion of the soundness of those parts which really are sound. And to sum up his challenge to the Senate in the phrase "put up or shut up" is to add to the poverty of the thought and the inaccuracy of the statement an exhibition of bad taste for which nothing less than a triumphant completeness in the argument could furnish excuse.

We regret to have to say these things. We have been hoping, these many weeks, that a common ground could be found upon which the President and the advocates of reservations which would not imperil the speedy completion of the world-settlement would get together. We still entertain that hope. It is even possible that the President is looking forward to such an end, and imagines that his speeches will promote its attainment. If so, we can only say that he has, in our judgment, adopted a course calculated to produce quite the contrary effect. A genuine discussion of the actual points of difference, a discussion that would put the controversy on a higher, not on a lower, plane, is what the situation demanded. Whatever the crowds may say or do, from Columbus to San Francisco, certainly no Senator is going to be moved to better thought or to higher action, no Senator is going to be won over or conciliated, and no Senator is going to be intimidated, by such speeches as these. Let us hope, at least, that if they will do no good, they will do no harm—that Senators who have all along felt the full solemnity of their duty upon this great question will hold fast their purpose. If they do—if they act upon the clear perception that it is of the utmost importance both that the treaty be promptly ratified and that the future of our country be guarded by reasonable reservations—they have it in their power to bring about a sound settlement, regardless of any aberrations of speech which either the President on the one hand or extremist Senators on the other may have permitted themselves.

The Committee's Proposal

THE reservations drafted by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, together with the outright amendments previously adopted by the committee, make perfectly clear the lines of division in the Senate. On the one side are the unqualified supporters of the President, comprising probably nearly the whole of the Democratic membership of the Senate. On the opposite side are a large proportion—but no one knows exactly how large—of the Republican members, standing for a course sufficiently indicated by the Foreign Relations Committee's position. Between these two extremes there is a group of moderate reservationists, certainly of sufficient dimensions to command the situation so far as majority votes are concerned, and very probably capable of determining a two-thirds vote if only it asserts its position with sufficient impressiveness and determination. The few extremists, like Borah and Reed, who are uncompromising and undisguised opponents of the treaty, we are leaving out of account.

In this situation, it is of the utmost importance to realize just what are the essential differences between these three elements. As regards the President's position on the one hand and that of the moderate reservationists on the other, it is safe to adhere to the view, heretofore expressed in these columns, that the difference between these has virtually become narrowed down to the question whether the reservations proposed by the moderates shall be adopted as part of the act of ratification or shall be separately passed as a mere record of the Senate's understanding. The President himself has stated that the substance of them meets his approval—that they are a mere expression of what is sufficiently understood without them, and that, therefore, the only objection to their embodiment in the act of ratification is that such embodiment would require the reassembling of the Peace Conference, with the delays and uncertainties that such reassembling would entail. To this the advocates of the reservations have replied that the matter contained in them is of such inoffensive character as to make the assent of the other leading Powers, either tacit or by a simple exchange of notes, practically certain; and that the vital purpose for which the reservations are designed would not be served by separate resolutions, since these would be of no binding effect on our international relations.

The Foreign Relations Committee's proposals carry us into an altogether different atmosphere. Among them are included explicit amendments of the treaty—amendments demanding for the United States six votes in the Assembly of the League, almost completely excluding the United States from participation in the commissions created under the League, substituting China for Japan in the Shantung provision of the treaty. Obviously the adoption of these amendments by the Senate would be a rejection of the treaty, and would necessitate a re-convening of the Conference if the United States is to be a party to the treaty at all. But even if the amendments be rejected by the Senate, the reservations drafted by the Foreign Relations Committee would of themselves suffice to bring about this result. Instead of the careful language of the moderate reservationists, the Committee has deliberately chosen to formulate what it calls reservations in terms that can be understood in no other way than as outright nullification of the provisions to which they relate. This is especially true as regards Article X. Nothing could be more sweeping than the statement that "the United States declines to assume, under the provisions of Article X, or under any other article, any obligation" to do any of the things called for in that article; and the curious and obscure limitation, "except by action of Congress," with which the reservation winds up, does little or nothing to break the force of this comprehensive disclaimer. The reservation amounts to an annulment of Article X, and even more; and it would have been more honest to formulate it as such. Manifestly, the adoption of it would wreck the treaty.

To prevent this calamity—for in the present state of the world it would be a calamity whose extent no man can foretell—it is urgently necessary that sober and right-minded men, without distinction of party, should, from this moment forth, use their utmost endeavors. No treaty can be passed without a two-thirds vote of the Senate. There is no reason to believe that a two-thirds vote can be obtained either for the treaty without effective reservations, or for the treaty changed as the Foreign Relations Committee proposes. The only standing-ground on which a two-thirds vote can possibly be assembled is that of the moderate reservationists. Is it possible that, through obstinacy, or partisanship, or even bad judgment, the one way to bring about the settlement for which all the world is pining, the one way to avoid incalculable losses and perils, will not be availed of?

The Peace Treaty with Austria

AUSTRIA, in pre-Napoleonic days, used to be called the stronghold which protected civilized Europe from the inroads of Ottoman barbarism. On her strength the safety of Europe was felt to depend. When, in 1683, Vienna was besieged by the Turks, pessimists prophesied the impending catastrophe of the civilized world, and at the news of their repulse by John Sobieski western culture realized that Austria's martyrdom had worked its salvation.

Present-day Europe is no longer conscious of any debt of gratitude to Austria. The rulers at Paris find more safety for France in her weakness than in her strength. They do not want her to be strong so as to be a formidable opponent of the Turks, they want her to be weak that she may seem a less eligible candidate for incorporation in the German "Reich." No positive task is henceforth assigned to her; she will gain the approval of Paris by the negative merit of renouncing any claim of relationship with Germany. The right of self-determination seems, in her case, to have been defined as a negative right only, allowing the Austrian people to decide under what rule they will not be placed. But the right to determine of what state they wish to form a part is denied to the ten millions who now constitute the population of German Austria.

The disintegration of the old Dual Monarchy, though it precipitated the military collapse of the Central Powers, is hardly a success for the Entente from the political point of view. Racial jealousies will hinder the non-German states from ever forming a close-knit anti-German union, and the greater the discord among them the stronger will be Germany's position as the only integrate political Power of Central Europe. The Council at Versailles sees no better solution of the vexed problem than by crippling Austria to such an extent as to make her worthless as an ally of the German Empire. The demand of the Entente that the clause in the German Constitution providing for the representation of German Austria in the National Assembly be excised amounts to little more than a formality which will make surety doubly sure. Being burdened with a national debt far exceeding her solvency, cut off from her cognates by a ring of Slav states, and depending for her coal supplies on the doubtful good will of Poland and Czechoslovakia, Austria is a bankrupt state, deprived of the means by which she might recover from her fall.

According to the Associated Press correspondent "there seems to be a general feeling of dissatisfaction in Peace Conference circles with the Austrian treaty, which was adapted from the German treaty and does not fit such a small Power very well. The Council, however, agreed on virtually all sections of the treaty because there was a general weariness over the prolonged discussion." The words of M. Clémenceau's note contradict this accusation of cynical indifference on the part of the Council as to the fate of the Austrian people. It may be true that, owing to the initial mistake of using the German peace treaty as the mannikin on which the treaty with Austria was to be modeled, the discussions became of wearisome length, but the Council certainly did not turn this result of a wrong start into a reason for making a worse finish. Not weariness of the supreme judges in council, but their conviction that only a disabled Austria can safeguard the world from a renewal of the late German danger, accounts for their crushing verdict.

The credulity of bygone days attached prophetic significance to this Latin expansion of the five vowels: Austria Erit In Orbi Ultima. Thus pride has its fall: she who dreamt to outlast all, will be, not the last, but among the least of the nations.

Our Duty in Siberia

THE press dispatches from Washington of the past fortnight have led us to expect the recognition of the Kolchak Government and the announcement of a positive Russian policy. At the same time, however, these reports have been extremely pessimistic as to the situation at Omsk and there is implied a connection between these latter reports and the delay in recognition. In other words, the impression is given that the question of whether we shall support Admiral Kolchak depends upon the strength and efficiency of the Government of which he is the head. On the face of it, this seems like a sensible proceeding and a means of assuring ourselves that we are not backing a losing cause. Such a statement of the case, however, ignores what has gone before, and indicates an opportunist attitude that reflects upon our good faith.

Men of vision have seen clearly that the attainment of durable peace depends upon a solution of the Russian problem, and that all other European adjustments are secondary to it. For a time, there appeared to be a certain confusion of mind as to the issue between the Bolshevik power and those groups of Russians who were carrying on the struggle to recover and restore their country as a national Russian state. But this confusion, which was exemplified in the Prinkipo Conference proposal and the Bullitt and Steffens Mission, finally passed, and the allied and associated Powers at the Paris Conference realized the imperative necessity of supporting the general movement of all the anti-Bolshevik forces.

Wishing to reassure themselves as to the democratic intentions of the Omsk Government, to which the anti-Bolshevik movements on all fronts had pledged allegiance, they addressed, on May 26, a dispatch to Admiral Kolchak, asking certain definite questions and laying down specifically the conditions of recognition. On June 4, Admiral Kolchak sent a frank and unequivocal reply. The Paris conference found this satisfactory, and in consequence declared, on June 12, that they were "willing to extend to Admiral Kolchak and his associates the support set forth in their original letter." This promise was "to assist the Government of Admiral Kolchak and his associates with munitions, supplies, and food, to establish themselves as the Government of All-Russia." This, of course, constituted a pledge on the part of the Powers and was signed by Lloyd George, Clémenceau, Orlando, Makino, and President Wilson.

Nearly three months have elapsed since this pledge was given and there has been an inexplicable delay in fulfilling our part of the obligation. Apparently, we sent Ambassador Morris to Omsk to make further investigations and there seems to be a disposition to condition the fulfillment of our pledge upon his report. In other words, if he finds that, as a result of the three months' delay, the Omsk Government is in a desperate situation, we are to consider ourselves absolved from our promise of support.

Such an opportunist policy would not reflect credit upon America or improve our reputation for good faith. The present difficulties of Admiral Kolchak and his associates constitute the greater reason for the immediate fulfillment of our pledge lest we be justly held responsible for a lamentable catastrophe. It is of the utmost importance that the unity of the national Russian movement represented by Admiral Kolchak's Government, and its legal continuity, be maintained. The Russians have had all too little political experience and there is grave danger that if the present Government should fall, it would result in uncoördinated attempts to set up governments in other liberated regions of Russia, attempts that would set loose rival political ambitions and partisan aims, happily composed by the general allegiance given to Kolchak. The collapse of the Omsk Government has further a very immediate significance for America, as it would result directly in the triumph of the reactionary element in Siberia, working in coöperation with Japan and subservient to her Siberian aims. The failure to keep our pledge of support and assistance can not but have a far-reaching effect upon our future relations with Russia and the Russian people.

The College Back Again

A TWELVEMONTH ago our colleges and universities were bending every energy to adapt their teaching force and material equipment to the hastily devised Students' Army Training Corps. Some imagined in this situation a wholly beneficial wrenching of college wheels out of long-worn ruts. Education was now to have direct application, practicality, punch, if you will. A few saw nothing but confusion, fatal to real educational progress at the start and made worse by rapidly succeeding inconsistent directions from the governing committee at Washington. Others, more judicious, regarded the movement as a fairly workable method of providing for certain war necessities which, in a rough way, would have accomplished its end if the war had not ceased just as the system was getting into action. But no college man will now deny that it caused a year of wearisome confusion from which all immediately involved were glad to escape. As college men and women come together again, during the next three weeks, thankfulness that the war itself is over will not find more frequent and heartfelt expression than gratitude that the troubled days of the S. A. T. C. are no more.

But now that both war and S. A. T. C. are over, will American college life go back substantially to its former content and method? The indications are that the answer must be, "Substantially, yes." The pillars of the educational temple have not been pulled down. One college may have dropped a specific entrance requirement; in another, certain language prerequisites to certain degrees may have been set aside; still another may have introduced new technical courses suggested by war experience; and many have made tentative provision for the voluntary organization of a Reserve Officers' Training Corps. But changes such as these have marked our college life every year now for a whole generation. When one looks for some sign that the war has really revolutionized that life, one looks in vain. And thinking men and women, the parents of the students now assembling, may rejoice that this is so. If the devoted thought and toil of educators during ages past had led us to results fit only for the pedagogical wrecking-engine and junk-heap, one could have little faith that the intellect of to-day, the product of so miserable a failure, could devise any wholly new system, demonstrably better, to take its place. No, our colleges will suffer no cataclysmic revolution. Holding firmly to many good things wrought out in the past, they will go on as usual in their search for improvement, at whatever point the need and possibility may be shown. New growth will come as the normal evolution of a live organism already existing.

It was, of course, to be foreseen that educational radicals would interpret the war as a herald of the immediate realization of their particular ideals. To one, the eclipse of Latin and Greek was now to become total and permanent; to another, current events were to take the place of the history of the past; to a third, applied science, in the narrowest sense of the term, was to have the field virtually to itself. But all such narrow visions are doomed to disappointment. The world of to-day must have the specialist, that of to-morrow doubtless still more; but civilization will never survive on a diet of specialism alone. The more numerous the varying lines of minute specialization become, the greater must be the need for minds broadly enough trained to grasp these divergent interests in their relations to one another and keep them in harmonious movement towards a unified end. Through lack of an adequate broadening element in his education, the specialist himself is often so blind to important interrelations of his subject as seriously to limit his own advancement and the value of his work.

Greek and Latin will still have their part to play, because they have for ages constituted a vital element in the fibre of civilization as it stands to-day, among the greatest forward-moving races of mankind. To Greek traits of intellect and character we owe enormously more than is indicated by a mere count of the small number among us who attain any really extensive accomplishments in first-hand Greek scholarship. The Greek spirit is too vital, too penetrating, to stop within the limits of this small circle. If the study of the Greek language, of Greek song and oratory and drama and philosophy, of Greek life in general, were permitted wholly to die, we should lose not merely the sprinkling of Greek scholars that we now possess, but one of the most pervasive intellectual and spiritual influences of the past twenty-five centuries.

The study of Latin, if any heed is to be given to thoroughness in educational methods, stands to gain as a result of the war. The over-attention given to German in the public schools was naturally followed by extreme reaction as a consequence of the war. A proper balance will slowly be restored, bringing a due amount of German back into the High Schools as an elective, but international readjustments of the past five years make it certain that modern-language instruction in our High Schools, for a long time to come, will be devoted chiefly to French, Spanish, and Italian. Cultural, material, and sentimental interests are now drawing unitedly in that direction. But French, Spanish, and Italian are alike daughters of the Latin, and a considerable knowledge of the latter is essential to comprehensive scholarship in any one of them. So far as our new interest in the Romance tongues, then, is to go deeper than a mere superficial conversational facility, it will carry with it an increased attention to Latin. And colleges preparing young men and women to teach the languages directly descended from the Latin can not fail to recommend the study of Latin to candidates of this class without impeaching their own standards of scholarship. Nor will thoughtful superintendents and boards of education be disposed, in building up their Romance language departments, to place the teaching of these tongues in charge of instructors who have neglected this important part of their preparation. Thus a clearly discernible vocational interest, touching thousands among the millions in our public schools, has been added to the motives for the study of Latin.

We can not foresee, then, any imminent danger that such important subjects as Greek and Latin will be permitted to drop entirely out of our educational system, or to wither to the point at which they would cease to be a vital element in our life and progress. It is merely a question of more or less; and we believe that the deeper insight and broader outlook alike called for as a result of the war require more rather than less. This is not to say that there can be no broadly and soundly educated man without some direct knowledge of Latin and Greek, nor is it to depreciate the necessity and the essential value of any other line of study. The claim is merely that experience has demonstrated the immeasurable worth to the world of a type of education in which these subjects do form a vital part. And that worth has declared itself not merely in perpetuating a certain type of genteel "culture," the importance of which many would question, but in giving to the world countless examples of the readiest versatility, and the most virile and profound administrative ability, in handling the complex problems of modern social and political life. Whether this discipline of classical studies can be "transferred" or not, one need not stop to inquire, either of the young specialist in the pedagogical research laboratory or of the New York Transfer Company. The laboratory of the ages has demonstrated that we get from the more broadly trained mind a broader and saner grasp of the more intricate problems of life, and in this fact not merely Latin and Greek, but all genuinely cultural studies, have their complete justification.

In spite of occasional sensational suggestions to the contrary, the American college is essentially a sanely conservative institution. In its willingness to preserve a due freedom of speech in the class-room, it often tolerates utterances from ill-trained and indiscreet instructors which, presented in startling form by the sensational press, lead to the mistaken opinion that it is a very hotbed of destructive radicalism. And when, now and then, it drops from its faculty roster—possibly without adequate justification—some member who has identified himself with radical agitation, it is denounced by doctrinaire extremists as the foe of all progress and the hired tool of vested interests from which its endowments have been derived. But through it all, the balance has been so maintained as to win increasing respect from the mass of thinking people, who want neither stagnation on the one hand nor revolution on the other, but an orderly progress on the upward path of civilization. It is from this element, in large predominance, that our college halls are again filling, fuller, apparently, than ever before. And the college is to be congratulated that, in coming out of the distracting vicissitudes of the war with unimpaired power and purpose to resume its traditional service, it is exercising a potent influence in steadying the supports of society at other points of possible danger.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION

140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Lenin's Lying Legion

THERE is no doubt that the German Foreign Office reached a high degree of efficiency in the manipulation of propaganda in foreign countries, both enemy and neutral. In diabolical plans this organization ranked in importance with any branch of the military machine, and unlike the military did not suspend its operations with the signing of the armistice. It is, in fact, probably more active to-day than ever.

But efficient as they are, the Germans can give no points to Lenin and Chicherin. With them propaganda is the very basis of military as well as political strategy, and they have developed it into a science. They have established schools for the training of propagandists in all languages, and with each military expedition goes a complete outfit for the printing of handbills and pamphlets. Agents, plentifully supplied with money, are sent across the lines to corrupt soldiers, and especially to appeal to the cupidity of the criminal elements in the rear.

At the present time their chief enemy is the All-Russian Government at Omsk, whose efforts to recover and restore the national Russian state threaten the overthrow of the tyranny at Moscow. The Bolsheviks concentrated the pick of their forces on the Ural front and for a time achieved noteworthy successes over the army of Admiral Kolchak, greatly inferior in numbers and almost destitute of supplies. Now, however, their advance has been stopped, the Siberians have again taken the offensive, and Denikin is pushing up from South Russia. So the Soviet Government has redoubled its propaganda activities, especially in America.

These activities are manifold and cover many fields. In many cases the German partnership is evident. Everywhere there is a remarkable coördination of effort, as if directed by an efficient General Staff. Take, for example, the Y. M. C. A. Last year they managed to infiltrate this worthy organization with numerous agents in the persons of Russian Jews of Bolshevik sympathies. The fact that they spoke Russian was a great argument for employing them in Siberia, and it was easy to secure credentials for them. At the front they got in their deadly propaganda work, and finally the whole organization had to be removed, and America's reputation suffered greatly in Siberia. They were no less active among the American troops at Vladivostok, breeding dissatisfaction and discontent.

In America their agents, chiefly Russian Jews, have been busy circulating the most absurd lies concerning Kolchak and his government, in the endeavor to discredit it in the eyes of the public and prevent its recognition. To one who knows the real conditions in Siberia the purpose of this campaign of falsehood and slander is evident and the motives that actuate our pro-Bolshevik press are manifest. Publicly they disclaim any connection with or friendship for Bolshevism; they are not Bolsheviks, but—they wish to see the Soviet Government given a fair deal; they are true democrats and consider Kolchak a reactionary, bent on a restoration of Tsarism; they demand an immediate Constituent Assembly, so that the Russian people may choose their own government; they call for "hands off Russia" and the withdrawal of American troops; but they are all working for one and the same end: the defeat of the Russian national movement and the success of Lenin and Trotsky.

The latest vicious attack upon Admiral Kolchak and his associates comes from a female pro-Bolshevik, which was given exceptional prominence in the columns of the New York Globe. The woman in question is Mrs. Gregory Yarros, a Russian Jewess, formerly known as Marie Sukloff, and reported to have gone by the name of Shkolnik during her recent sojourn in Siberia. Some years ago, under the name of Sukloff, she wrote what claimed to be an autobiographical account of her life as a terrorist in Russia, entitled "The Life Story of a Russian Exile." It is a weird book of fiction in which the author, self-hypnotized, related a series of stories of revolutionary adventure adopted as her own.

She and her husband went to Siberia some two years ago, the latter ostensibly as a correspondent for the Associated Press. Strangely enough, they went on Russian passports. He went through to Petrograd, while she remained in Siberia to carry on Bolshevik propaganda. During the seven months that the Bolsheviks had possession of Siberia, she was in her element, and afterwards, under Avksentiev, the Socialist Revolutionary, and the Directory, she met with no difficulties. It must have been rather dull for her, however, until the Kolchak Government started to bring order out of chaos and gave her a fresh opportunity to exercise her talents as an agitator and conspirator. At one time she tried to return to America and made a fraudulent passport application as an American citizen, but was found out. More recently she apparently has succeeded in tricking the passport authorities, probably with the assistance of Bolshevik friends in the United States.

It is a weird mass of falsehoods that she relates concerning the Kolchak Government, and her observations of its activities are so palpably untrue that it seems unnecessary to take the trouble to refute them. Her whole story is a piece of Bolshevik propaganda. Her tale of the murder of thirty-six members of the Constituent Assembly is a sample. After the Bolshevik rising of December 21, 1918, was put down, some three Constituent Assembly members were taken from the prison by an officer who presented a forged order, conveyed outside the town, and shot. Their bodies were not displayed in the public square. The Omsk Government had nothing to do with this lynching, and the guilty officer was tried and executed. Yet she relates that Kolchak had thirty-six members of the Constituent Assembly killed and that she saw their bodies lying in the public square! She was probably not within two hundred miles of Omsk at the time. Her tale is simply another of the hysterical hallucinations that were to be noted in her book.

On her way east from Omsk she saw three Bolsheviks hanged from telegraph poles, and she makes up a fine story that would have us believe that these cutthroats were innocent martyrs to liberty. Of this Consul John A. Embry relates:

By a curious coincidence Mrs. Yarros and I were fellow-passengers on the express from Omsk to Vladivostok. I saw everything that Mrs. Yarros saw on the trip which she described so graphically in the Globe. It is a fact that there were three Bolsheviks hanged to telegraph poles near a little way-station between Krasnoiarsk and Irkutsk, but Mrs. Yarros failed to add, in describing this scene, that throughout this region there were to be seen a dozen or more trains, wrecked by Bolshevik bandits. Mrs. Yarros also failed to state that she, like myself, barely escaped being in a railway wreck that would undoubtedly have cost us our lives.

We were warned, after leaving Krasnoiarsk, that these bandits were making so many attempts to wreck the express that we could travel only by daylight. I personally photographed several of the trains they had wrecked. Naturally the passengers were nervous. We reached the little station of Taishet about dusk, and some thought that this would be a comfortable place to spend the night in view of what had been said about travel after dark. Someone, however, must have given valuable information to the conductor, for the train did not stop at Taishet, but two stations farther on.

A couple of days later, when we reached Harbin, we learned that the night which we spent near Taishet, May 6, 1919, a band of 1,200 Bolsheviks attacked the station at Taishet, expecting to capture the express there, burnt down the station, and killed all the railroad officials they found there. A hot battle ensued with the little detachment of Czecho-Slovaks located there, in which 18 of the latter were killed. The Bolsheviks left 108 dead on the ground. It is curious that Mrs. Yarros has nothing to say about her narrow escape from these murderous outlaws.

The comments of Mrs. Yarros on the political situation in Siberia are so ludicrously false and so manifestly malicious that they do not deserve attention.

There is, however, a tragic side to this organized propaganda campaign, apart from its political significance. The men and women chiefly engaged in it, Mr. and Mrs. Gregory Yarros, Joshua Rosett, Louis D. Kornfield, Gregory Zilboorg, are Russian Jews. The peasants of Siberia believe the Bolshevik régime to be a Jewish movement. Admiral Kolchak, loyal to his convictions of religious toleration and to his pledge of protection to the Jews, is to-day standing between the Jew and destruction. His overthrow will be the signal for horrible pogroms, in vengeance for the devil's work these propagandists are carrying on. What a tragedy it is that the very men who should be supporting the honorable and high-minded head of the Omsk Government are doing everything in their power to undermine and discredit him.

JEROME LANDFIELD

The Birthday of the Constitution

THE anniversary of the signing of the Constitution of the United States will be celebrated on Wednesday, the seventeenth of September—one hundred and thirty-two years after the event—as it has never been observed before. This is not, however, the first time that the Constitution has been honored with a public celebration of an impressive character. In 1887 its one-hundredth anniversary was made the occasion of a brilliant popular festival in Philadelphia, its birthplace, when great processions thronged the streets, led by troops sent from each of the thirteen original States, headed by those of little Delaware, the first State to adopt the Constitution. President Cleveland dignified the occasion with his presence and made a brief address. Two years later, in 1889, the one-hundredth anniversary of the inauguration of the Union under the Constitution was celebrated with equal ceremony in New York, where the new Government was first located under the Presidency of Washington; and on this occasion President Harrison was present and voiced the unanimous sentiments of the country, as his Democratic predecessor had expressed them two years before.

A century of experience had left the people of the United States proud and happy in the possession of a form of government which all rejoiced in believing the most perfect that had ever been enjoyed by any nation. The dangers of the critical period between the Peace of 1783 and the era of the Constitution were almost forgotten and the still more trying time of the Civil War had been safely passed. Respect for the Constitution had survived the struggle regarding its meaning. The curse of slavery, which had threatened to destroy the Union and create two hostile nations, had been abolished. The principles upon which the Government had been founded had been tested, and had been found to be sound and practicable. Other countries, the most advanced and liberal in the world, had followed the example of the United States in adopting written constitutions, and it was universally conceded that wherever the character of the people was sufficiently established to be capable of self-government the problem of organized liberty had been solved. No voice in the whole population, which had grown from less than four millions in thirteen States to seventy-five millions in forty States, was lifted in criticism of the nature of the government which had given the people an unexampled growth in prosperity and contentment. The reason for these celebrations was, therefore, simple and universal—the Constitution had brought to the whole people unity, security, and happiness.

During the first decade after those celebrations, the general reverence for the Constitution continued unabated. But new influences were creeping in from other countries. The marvelous industrial and commercial development of the German Empire became an object of admiration. The fashion had already set in of considering Germany the centre of modern civilization, and her schools were thronged by young men from America eager to hear the last word in every branch of science. Already we were importing not only German ideas but even German professors. One of them will be recalled as describing the attitude of the American mind towards the Constitution as one of "ruinous idolatry," while in his books he condemned the Constitution as a "fetish." He, with his colleagues and disciples, represented a different political system—the doctrine of the omnipotent state. Its industrial and commercial triumphs seemed convincing. Nowhere had "efficiency" attained such apparent perfection. Our so-called "individualism" was represented as weak and wasteful. Germany was organic, and hence true to biologic law. America was atomic, and therefore on a lower plane of development. We were lacking in authoritative leadership. Politics and economics must be based no longer upon the individual, who is of slight importance, but upon society as a whole; that is, upon the state as the efficient and authoritative organization of society. The destiny of the individual is, in future, it was said, to accept the commands of the state, which rules by right of superiority. To the disciples of the German school of politics and economics our system, or lack of system, appeared provincial, and was denounced as almost an anachronism. What was needed, they said, was administration. This depended upon the increase of power in the hands of the executive. The division of the public powers, the localism of the legislative bodies, but especially the restrictions of the fundamental law as interpreted by the judiciary, were all regarded as obstructive of the ends in view. Not being in the German manner, they were not considered scientific. Legislation should be free from all prescriptive control, and it should always emanate from "higher up." In short, the true principle of government is centralized authority; as in Prussia, for example. To this the Constitution, they considered, was an impediment. Unable, on account of its restrictions, to put into operation the innovations of ingenious minds, the intellectuals began to repeat the derogatory comments of the German professors, with the result that in our higher educational institutions, to a greater extent than the general public is aware, men of influence had ceased to be interested in native Americanism and had lost faith in our political institutions.

Another influence, not less potent and emanating from the same original source, has been imported into our country in the persons of a wholly different class, having the same general conception of the state, but regarding it from another angle of vision. To them, as to the imperialists, the state is power and the authoritative shaper of society; but their experience of it has been that of an expropriating agency. Coming to this Republic, they observe that the people control the state. They look upon democracy, which they do not understand in the American sense, as a means, not of changing the essential character of the state as they have known it in its omnipotent form, but merely, so to speak, of changing the ruling dynasty. In their experience with government they had seen the prince and the possessors of wealth who shared his authority sitting alone in the seats of power. To those who had thus come to view the state as an instrument of class interests, under which they were oppressed, the change needed appeared to be, not a movement towards individual personal liberty, for which they cared but little, but the control of the state by the class to which they belonged. The change to be instituted must be a change of masters, but masters there were still to be. The doctrines of Marx, which saw the real enemy in capital, pointed to the state as the sole proprietor and to the proletariat as the ruling class in the state. Where the intellectuals were merely academic and negative, these men were revolutionary. What the natural defenders of American political conceptions had not only ceased to defend but were prone to treat with supercilious indifference, these theorists, often fired by the fanaticism of intense sentiments which narrow lives and imperfect education rendered bitter and aggressive, began planning to overthrow completely.

The first objective of this class, now become dangerously numerous in this country, is to destroy the system of Constitutional government altogether. Its vulnerable point is the provision for Constitutional amendment. When the barriers to facile change are once swept away, the process of demolition will be very simple and very rapid. As a paper seized in one of the schools of communism reads: "It is hoped that the proletariat will conquer his enemy, the capitalist class, with as little bloodshed as possible." If the guarantees of the Constitution can be gradually destroyed, the revolution will be readily accomplished whenever an active and persistent minority chooses to impose it. If there are not in the American people enough perception of these designs and courage to resist them in their beginnings, the last acts of intimidation promise to be very summary.

It is impossible in the space that can be accorded to this article to specify the ramifications of the social, economic, and political theories that constitute the volume of this portentous movement to destroy the Constitutional system in this country. Happily, for the readers of the Review this is unnecessary. The signs of the times are at present too numerous, too varied, and too foreboding to require a detailed enumeration. In ordinary times, the propaganda of the irresponsible persons who are engaged in this work of social disruption and who make of it a profession, would receive little attention. Busy and contented men and women would not listen to them. But at the present moment the soil of the public mind is peculiarly susceptible to the growth of ideas distinctly revolutionary. That most of the radical doctrines propagated are reactionary, anti-social, and utterly incompatible with any true understanding of society as a harmonious and prosperous whole, makes little difference. The vision of immediate change comes as a relief to many minds, quite apart from the ultimate consequences which it would involve. Two conditions favor sudden and untried experiments: a general feeling of discontent, and the absence of those deep settled convictions and moral certainties that characterized a period when life was less complicated, when time for reflection was more common, and when faith in higher things was more firmly fixed. We at present have occasion, therefore, to regard the anniversary of the fundamental law upon which our whole system of American legal rights and social security is founded, quite otherwise than in the years of the centenary celebrations when there was no note of fear for the future. Those celebrations sprang spontaneously from the minds and hearts of a grateful people, who were filled with contentment and rejoicing that their heritage of freedom was so ample and so sure. To-day, we see the whole structure of organized liberty menaced on every side, at a moment when we have undertaken international responsibilities such as we had never before contemplated as even possible. We have conquered the enemy in Europe; but, unless held in restraint, we have to deal with a more dangerous enemy in our own population. Our only imminent peril at this time, unless we commit the fault of incurring enmities which we might wisely avoid, is from the foes of our own household.

More than ever before in the history of this Republic, the duty is forced upon us to reëxamine our foundations and to see that they are adequately protected. We all recognize that the Great War in which we have successfully participated has in many respects unsettled our national life. Millions of men ordinarily devoted to the pursuits of peace have been called to consecrate their time and energies to the exigencies of sanguinary strife. They have fought the battle of freedom abroad, and we believe that they will, if necessary, fight for it at home. But what we require at this time is not preparation for battle, but the understanding and the moral strength to uphold our national honor and character in case a conflict should demand our action.

We have a new cause for satisfaction in our American institutions in the fact that they enabled us materially to win the war and Constitutionally to undertake and carry it to a conclusion; for we must not overlook the provisions for the "common defense" in that great document which enable us legally to protect our national rights even on foreign soil. But the conditions of peace are not the conditions of war; and we must now, unless we are to change our form of government, come back to the Constitutional provisions for peace.

It would be an error, however, to imagine that the present dangers to the Constitution have been wholly produced by the exigencies of war. Before our participation in the war was dreamed of by any one in this country, even before the war began in Europe, the assaults upon the Constitution were begun. Considerable numbers of organized bodies, of large membership, had passed resolutions against judges being permitted to declare certain legislative acts unconstitutional. The recall of judges by popular vote, and also the recall of their decisions, have had large following in this country. The courts have been attacked in a voluminous literature because they enforced the guarantees of the Constitution regarding "due process of law." In 1913, a situation had been created that was considered alarming by close students of public sentiment.

It was in that year, to arouse interest in such questions in the light of principles and experience, that "The National Association for Constitutional Government" was established at Washington by a group of patriotic men who were anxious regarding the tendencies of that time. It was discovered that a whole generation had grown up in almost abject ignorance of what is distinctively American in our system, that the higher institutions were under the influence of German doctrines regarding the ideals of government, and that in the secondary schools the instruction regarding government was mostly perfunctory. To remedy as far as possible this deplorable situation, a quarterly review of a serious character was established under the editorship of a highly trained and experienced scholar and writer. Accessions came slowly, but with increasing interest as the need of this work became apparent, until now this movement has become an established institution, to which all who have an interest in the subject may rally with the assurance that it will continue as long as there is a Constitution to expound and defend; and yet it needs and desires a wider influence, a larger membership, and a more liberal support as a permanent influence for the preservation of Constitutional government in the American sense of the word.

Events which it is needless here to enumerate have tended to revive the interest of thoughtful men and women—it is gratifying to know that thoughtful women are enlisted in this cause—in bringing home to honest minds throughout the country the meaning and value of our great inheritance of legally organized liberty. A few months ago, eight of our leading patriotic societies united, under the lead of The National Security League, in a campaign to make the one hundred and thirty-second anniversary of the signing of the Constitution of the United States an occasion for a nation-wide educational movement. An organizing committee, composed of prominent citizens and an honorary committee including the Governors of nearly all the States, mayors of cities, bar associations, and boards of education, covering the whole country, has been formed. Almost all of the forty-eight States are now organized for the celebration of that day in a manner appropriate to its importance. In thousands of cities, towns, and villages capable speakers will present to the people and to the schools brief expositions of the meaning and value of our fundamental law, based on a carefully prepared collection of literature which has been freely distributed under the direction of Dr. Robert M. McElroy, educational director of the League. The purpose is to impress upon the mind of the public that true Americanism does not consist in a mere sentimental attachment to the land where one happened to be born, but in devotion to the principles and institutions which have made this a great, free, and prosperous nation. It is this that gives meaning to our flag, which is its visible symbol.

It is not merely the fifteen millions of foreign-born persons now living in the United States who need instruction upon this subject. The majority of our native voters do not realize the distinctive character of our political institutions. The prevailing idea is that the people's will is absolute; and that, therefore, whatever a majority, or in case of a divided vote even a minority, determines to do or demand, irrespective of its character, it is free to ordain.

It is precisely this domination of arbitrary power which the Constitution was designed to prevent. As Madison declared, "Wherever the real power of government lies, there is danger of oppression. In our Government," he continues, "the real power lies in the majority of the community, and the invasion of private rights is chiefly to be apprehended not from acts of government contrary to the sense of the constituents, but from acts in which the government is the mere instrument of the major number of constituents. . . . Where there is an interest and a power to do wrong, wrong will generally be done, and not the less readily by a powerful and interested party than by a powerful and interested prince."

How profoundly discerning this comment is, we have abundant contemporary opportunity to know. Since changes have already been made in our laws which give a majority, and might give a minority party in power, control over the whole private income of the nation, to be expended for any kind of purpose, we realize that Madison had a clear prevision of the dangers of an absolute democracy.

The Constitutional theory is, in brief: 1. that government should consist in limited and specifically delegated powers; 2. that these powers should be so separated and divided that no individual or group should control all of them; 3. that the exercise of them should be confided to responsible representatives of the whole people; 4. that legislation should be limited by the provisions of a fundamental law; 5. that this law should contain guarantees of personal rights and liberties that should never be taken away by legislation; 6. that this charter of liberty may be amplified, but never be changed by a mere majority of the people, and only by the deliberate act of a plurality so preponderant as to prevent any group-interest from exercising its arbitrary will in violation of the inherent rights and liberties of an otherwise defenseless minority; and 7. the establishment of a Supreme Judiciary charged with the duty of seeing that the fundamental law is not violated by any State or Federal legislation.

That is, in essence, the American theory of Constitutional government. That is what is now attacked; and what we have to consider is whether or not it is worth while to defend it, and by what means.

DAVID JAYNE HILL

Because the French Call Water "Lo"

THE Frenchman who was in business in the United States began: "Can any one tell me why attempts are being made all the time to prejudice Americans against the French people?"

"Be sure they do not come from our soldiers arriving home from France," said the American officer who is waiting to embark. "You will find it is the same old German propaganda at work."

"I doubt if such appeals to prejudice are always due to organized propaganda. They are certainly not recognized as German. Often they only continue prejudices felt before the war," was the opinion of the American who lives in Paris.

"I realize that when I am in America," assented the Frenchman. "But why are so many of you ready to judge unfavorably of the French?"

The American of Paris went on from a long experience of reasons and causes. "Some look on you unfavorably because you are Catholics and some because you are atheists; because your books and plays are not Puritan and because your immorality does not come up to expectations; because you are gay and light-headed and because you take so much care of your money; because people were sure your fighting courage in the war would be a flash in the pan and because you fought and died to the end without theatricals; because you Frenchmen have no word for home and because you guard your family life so closely from outsiders; because your women dress so well and because your men do not dress well—and because you are French and call water 'lo'!"

"That last is the real reason," said the Frenchman. "I was passing through the Hôtel Crillon last week when news that the Rumanian army had occupied Budapest was exciting the members of the American Peace Delegation. One who was passing said openly—"The French have been dealing double with us!" I recognized him as one who does not speak French. When I began doing business in the United States nothing provoked me more than not understanding what American business men were saying. I, too, felt they were double-dealing."

"I have felt that way when making army contracts with the French authorities," said the American officer. "Even your military men seemed to me far too sharp."

"They have no such reputation among our own people," observed the Frenchman. "What struck me most in this Rumanian muddle was how easily Americans think Frenchmen are acting underhand. They never stop to think—the terrible idea has occurred to me they do not know—that we Frenchmen are much more interested than they can be in protecting Hungarians, for we wish them to be able to pay the money they owe us. Has either of you any notion of the sums lent by Frenchmen in Hungary to Government and municipalities and private industries?"

"There you are again with your money," answered the American officer. "We came over to fight on your side. How can you expect us to know your bookkeeping accounts?"

"We have a right to expect you not to jump at conclusions that make us out damned fools," retorted the Frenchman. "Surely the Peace Delegation ought to know as much as that."

"Peace-making with us is a sort of school-mastering," remarked the American of Paris. "Half our public men have taught school at the beginning of their career. It engenders in them a peculiar habit of mind which the old-time diplomats did not have. They reason out that certain general policies are good for humanity and they are impatient when the particular human victims of their policies make difficulties."

The speaker recovered himself a moment and went on: "This habit of mind is common to us with British Nonconformists, from whom we may also have inherited it. They reason out that there ought not to be a State Church established by law and then try to make individual citizens nonconform by legislation. It is the same with many political reformers of the Continent. The republican agitator Lerroux has just been talking again in Barcelona. At the time of the Ferrer Affair, in his first speech after he came back from exile, he assured his fellow-citizens, 'We bring you Liberty—we shall begin by suppressing the religious communities!' So the Manchester Guardian sees that England needs Ireland territorially for her own independence and feels nothing but distrust when France asks like guarantees against German invasion."

The American officer broke in: "Your comparisons are curious to us Americans."

"Gently," protested the American of Paris. "My examples may seem grotesque, but they show what habits of mind can do."

"You have still to explain the habit of mind which makes Americans listen to accusations against the French," persisted the Frenchman. "They do not come from your soldiers who have been in France, although many of them are very hot against French profiteering. I have heard from some that it was quite as bad around camps at home while they were waiting to come over to France. Opportunity makes the thief everywhere. And then such profiteers are no respecters of persons—French Poilus and French civilians complained first and are complaining last of French profiteers."

The American officer spoke up: "Private Stover, of Ohio, is a railway engineer who has been going from one side of France to the other for two years. He said to me lately, 'None of us has anything against France. The only trouble is that, except in the front line, we never get a chance to meet the right kind of French.'"

"I understand," answered the Frenchman. "He meant that soldiers in towns like himself did not get a very good idea of French society from what his General called 'painted dolls.' For those who understand French a great many of our stage performances give about as bad an idea. Your two million soldiers may have been unsophisticated, but they have shown themselves full of common sense. They must have reflected sometimes that so many French towns with streets upon streets of well-kept family apartments and carefully tended children could not belong to a people in a state of dissolution. It is unfortunate they could not have seen more of French families. They would have learned that the average Frenchman is what he has been for a thousand years—the lifelong slave of one of three women, his mother, his wife, and his daughter."

"After five years in the limelight as no people ever were before, you Frenchmen need not fear disparagement," said the American officer, coming back to the question. "These continuous campaigns to excite prejudice against you in the United States tend all to one thing only—to persuade Americans that France is getting too much out of Germany by the Peace Treaty."

"So far," replied the Frenchman, "France is not in sight of getting any money out of Germany for no one knows how long. Then what a noise has been made about the Sarre Basin because we are supposed to work it for fifteen years! Our new populations of Alsace and Lorraine have to be furnished from it as they were under Germany, and we have to help out Switzerland and Italy with whatever may be left. And meanwhile we are left ourselves to our coal famine, which the Germans have deliberately inflicted on us by destroying, without any military reason, one-third of our own coal-fields."

"Listen to what Jules Sauerwein has been writing from Berlin," said the American officer, picking up the Matin of August 16:

"A systematic campaign is being carried on to make people here believe that France alone is responsible for all that happens to them. Do they lack coal? France has our locomotives. Do they lack food? France takes for herself all that America can export. Have they got to give up Poland? It is Clémenceau and Foch that exact it against Lloyd George's judgment. Is there a Separatist movement along the Rhine? General Mangin is at the bottom of it. Is Austria forbidden to incorporate herself with Germany? That's Pichon's doings."

"Have you thought what the end will be of all these campaigns in Germany and England and America?" asked the Frenchman. "They will end in obliging France to keep a standing army facing the Rhine with all our young men forced to give up the best years of their life in compulsory military service. Let me read you something genuine from our side," he added taking the Liberté of the same day. "A peasant recalls how his brother-in-law came home and died in a month, gas-poisoned and with his lungs eaten away:

"For days and days we could not put our heads out of our dug-out without being burned up by the gases. What reflections we made! Men could use things like that against men! And they call themselves civilized! And now you hear citizens complain that we are too hard on Germany! Where were they in the war? In their beds!"

Paris, August 20 STODDARD DEWEY

O. Henry

THERE are two opinions concerning O. Henry. The middle class views him as the impersonation of vigor and brilliancy; part of the higher criticism sees in him little but sensation and persiflage. Between these views there is a natural relation; the gods of the heathens are ipso facto the demons of Christianity. Unmixed assertions, however, are commonly mixtures of truth and falsehood; there is room to-day for an estimate which shall respect both opinions and adopt neither.

There is one literary trait in which I am unable to name any writer of tales in any literature who surpasses O. Henry.* It is not primary or even secondary among literary merits; it is less a value per se than the condition or foundation of values. But its utility is manifest, and it is rare among men: Chaucer and Shakespeare prove the possibility of its absence in masters of that very branch of art in which its presence would seem to be imperative. I refer to the designing of stories—not to the primary intuition or to skill in development, in both of which finer phases of invention O. Henry has been largely and frequently surpassed, but to the disposition of masses, to the blocking-out of plots. That a half-educated American provincial should have been original in a field in which original men have been copyists is enough of itself to make his personality observable.

Illustration, even of conceded truths, is rarely superfluous. I supply two instances. Two lads, parting in New York, agree to meet "After Twenty Years" at a specified hour, date, and corner. Both are faithful; but the years in which their relation has slept in mutual silence and ignorance have turned the one into a dashing criminal, the other into a sober officer of the law. Behind the picturesque and captivating rendezvous lurks a powerful dramatic situation and a moral problem of arresting gravity. This is dealt with in six pages of the "Four Million." The "Furnished Room," two stories further on, occupies twelve pages. Through the wilderness of apartments on the lower West Side a man trails a woman. Chance leads him to the very room in which the woman ended her life the week before. Between him and the truth the avarice of a sordid landlady interposes the curtain of a lie. In the bed in which the girl slept and died, the man sleeps and dies, and the entrance of the deadly fumes into his nostrils shuts the sinister and mournful coincidence forever from the knowledge of mankind. O. Henry gave these tales neither extension nor prominence; so far as I know, they were received without bravos or salvos. The distinction of a body of work in which such specimens are undistinguished hardly requires comment.

*William Sidney Porter, 1862-1910, son of Algernon Sidney Porter, physician, was born, bred, and meagrely educated in Greensboro, North Carolina. In Greensboro he was drug clerk; in Texas he was amateur ranchman, land-office clerk, editor, and bank teller. Convicted of misuse of bank funds on insufficient evidence (which he supplemented by the insanity of flight), he passed three years and three months in the Ohio State Penitentiary at Columbus. Release was the prelude to life in New York, to story-writing, to rapid and widespread fame. Latterly, his stories, published in New York journals and in book form, were consumed by the public with an avidity which his premature death, in 1910, scarcely checked. The pen-name, O. Henry, is almost certainly borrowed from a French chemist, Etienne-Ossian Henry, whose abridged name he fell upon in his pharmaceutical researches. See the interesting "O. Henry Biography" by C. Alphonso Smith and the Greensboro Daily News for July 2, 1919.

A few types among these stories may be specified. There are the Sydney Cartonisms, defined in the name; love-stories in which divided hearts, or simply divided persons, are brought together by the strategy of chance; hoax stories—deft pictures of smiling roguery; "prince and pauper" stories, in which wealth and poverty face each other, sometimes enact each other; disguise stories, in which the wrong clothes often draw the wrong bullets; complementary stories, in which Jim sacrifices his beloved watch to buy combs for Della, who, meanwhile, has sacrificed her beloved hair to buy a chain for Jim.

This imperfect list is eloquent in its way; it smooths our path to the assertion that O. Henry's specialty is the enlistment of original method in the service of traditional appeals. The ends are the ends of fifty years ago; O. Henry transports us by aeroplane to the old homestead.*

Criticism of O. Henry falls into those superlatives and antitheses in which his own faculty delighted. In mechanical invention he is almost the leader of his race. In a related quality—a defect—his leadership is even more conspicuous. I doubt if the sense of the probable, or, more precisely, of the available in the improbable, ever became equally weakened or deadened in a man who made his living by its exercise. The improbable, even the impossible, has its place in art, though that place is relatively low; and it is curious that works such as the "Arabian Nights" and Grimm's fairy tales, whose stock-in-trade is the incredible, are the works which give almost no trouble on the score of verisimilitude. The truth is that we reject not what it is impossible to prove, or even what it is possible to disprove, but what it is impossible to imagine. O. Henry asks us to imagine the unimaginable—that is his crime.

The right and wrong improbabilities may be illustrated from two burglar stories. "Sixes and Sevens" contains an excellent tale of a burglar and a citizen who fraternize, in a comic midnight interview, on the score of their common sufferings from rheumatism. This feeling in practice would not triumph over fear and greed; but the feeling is natural, and everybody with a grain of nature in him can imagine its triumph. Nature tends towards that impossibility, and art, lifting, so to speak, the lid which fact drops upon nature, reveals nature in belying fact. In another story, in "Whirligigs," a nocturnal interview takes place in which a burglar and a small boy discuss the etiquette of their mutual relation by formulas derived from short stories with which both are amazingly conversant. This is the wrong use of the improbable. Even an imagination inured to the virtues of burglars and the maturity of small boys will have naught to do with this insanity.

*O. Henry's stories have been known to coincide with earlier work in a fashion which dims the novelty of the tale without clouding the originality of the author. I thought the brilliant "Harlem Tragedy" (in the "Trimmed Lamp") unique through sheer audacity, but the other day I found its motive repeated with singular exactness in Montesquieu's "Lettres Persanes" (Letter LI).

But O. Henry can go further yet. There are inventions in his tales the very utterance of which—not the mere substance but the utterance—on the part of a man not writing from Bedlam or for Bedlam impresses the reader as incredible. In a "Comedy in Rubber," two persons become so used to spectatorship at transactions in the street that they drift into the part of spectators when the transaction is their own wedding. Can human daring or human folly go further? O. Henry is on the spot to prove that they can. In the "Romance of a Busy Broker," a busy and forgetful man, in a freak of absent-mindedness, offers his hand to the stenographer whom he had married the night before.

The other day, in the journal of the Goncourts, I came upon the following sentence: "Never will the imagination approach the improbabilities and the antitheses of truth" (II, 9). This is dated February 21, 1862. Truth had still the advantage. O. Henry was not born till September of the same year.

Passing on to style, we are still in the land of antithesis. The style is gross—and fine. Of the plenitude of its stimulus, there can be no question. In "Sixes and Sevens," a young man sinking under accidental morphia, is kept awake and alive by shouts, kicks, and blows. O. Henry's public seems imaged in that young man. But I draw a sharp distinction between the tone of the style and its pattern. The tone is brazen, or, better perhaps, brassy; its self-advertisement is incorrigible; it reeks with that air of performance which is opposed to real efficiency. But the pattern is another matter. The South rounds its periods like its vowels; O. Henry has read, not widely, but wisely, in his boyhood. His sentences are built—a rare thing in the best writers of to-day. In conciseness, that Spartan virtue, he was strong, though it must be confessed that the tale-teller was now and then hustled from the rostrum by his rival and enemy, the talker. He can introduce a felicity with a noiselessness that numbers him for a flying second among the sovereigns of English. "In one of the second-floor front windows Mrs. McCaskey awaited her husband. Supper was cooling on the table. Its heat went into Mrs. McCaskey."

I regret the tomfoolery; I wince at the slang. Yet even for these levities with which his pages are so liberally besprinkled or bedaubed, some half-apology may be circumspectly urged. In nonsense his ease is consummate. A horseman who should dismount to pick up a bauble would be childish; O. Henry picks it up without dismounting. Slang, again, is most pardonable in the man with whom its use is least exclusive and least necessary. There are men who, going for a walk, take their dogs with them; there are other men who give a walk to their dogs. Substitute slang for the dog, and the superiority of the first class to the second will exactly illustrate the superiority of O. Henry to the abject traffickers in slang.

In the "Pendulum" Katy has a new patch in her crazy quilt which the ice man cut from the end of his four-in-hand. In the "Day We Celebrate," threading the mazes of a banana grove is compared to "paging the palm room of a New York hotel for a man named Smith." O. Henry's is the type of mind to which images like this four-in-hand and this palm room are presented in exhaustless abundance and unflagging continuity. There was hardly an object in the merry-go-round of civilized life that had not offered at least an end or an edge to the avidity of his consuming eyes. Nothing escapes from the besom of his allusiveness, and the style is streaked and pied, almost to monotony, by the accumulation of lively details.

If O. Henry's style was crude, it was also rare; but it is part of the grimness of the bargain that destiny drives with us that the mixture of the crude and the rare should be a crude mixture, as the sons of whites and negroes are numbered with the blacks. In the kingdom of style O. Henry's estates were princely, but, to pay his debts, he must have sold them all.

Thus far in our inquiry extraordinary merits have been offset by extraordinary defects. To lift our author out of the class of brilliant and skillful entertainers, more is needed. Is more forthcoming? I should answer, yes. In O. Henry, above the knowledge of setting, which is clear and first-hand, but subsidiary, above the order of events, which is, generally speaking, fantastic, above the emotions, which are sound and warm, but almost purely derivative, there is a rather small, but impressive body of first-hand perspicacities and reactions. On these his endurance may hinge.

I name, first of all, O. Henry's feeling for New York. With the exception of his New Orleans, I care little for his South and West, which are a boyish South and West, and as little, or even less, for his Spanish-American communities. My objection to his opera-bouffe republics is, not that they are inadequate as republics (for that we were entirely prepared), but that they are inadequate as opera. He lets us see his show from the coulisses. The pretense lacks standing even among pretenses, and a faith must be induced before its removal can enliven us. But his New York has quality. It is of the family of Dickens's London and Hugo's Paris, though it is plainly a cadet in the family. Mr. Howells, in his profound and valuable study of the metropolis in a "Hazard of New Fortunes," is penetrating; O. Henry, on the other hand, is penetrated. His New York is intimate and clinging; it is caught in the mesh of the imagination.

O. Henry had rare but precious insights into human destiny and human nature. In these pictures he is not formally accurate; he could never or seldom set his truth before us in that moderation and proportion which truths acquire in the stringencies of actuality. He was apt to present his insight in a sort of parable or allegory, to upraise it before the eyes of mankind on the mast or flagpole of some vehement exaggeration. Epigram shows us truth in the embrace of a lie, and tales which are dramatized epigrams are subject to a like constraint. The force, however, is real. I could scarcely name anywhere a more powerful exposition of fatality than "Roads of Destiny," the initial story in the volume which appropriates its title. It wanted only the skilled romantic touch of a Gautier or Stevenson to enroll this tale among the masterpieces of its kind in contemporary letters.

Now and then the ingredient of parable is hardly perceptible; we draw close to the bare fact. O. Henry, fortunate in plots, is peculiarly fortunate in his renunciation of plot. If contrivance is lucrative, it is also costly. There is an admirable little story called the "Pendulum" (in the "Trimmed Lamp"), the simplicity of whose fable would have satisfied Coppée or Hawthorne. A man in a flat, by force of custom, has come to regard his wife as a piece of furniture. She departs for a few hours, and, by the break in usage, is restored, in his consciousness, to womanhood. She comes back, and relapses into furniture. That is all. O. Henry could not have given us less—or more. Farcical, clownish, if you will, the story resembles those clowns who carry daggers under their motley. When John Perkins takes up that inauspicious hat, the reader smiles, and quails. I will mention a few other examples of insights with the proviso that they are not specially commended to the man whose quest in the short story is the electrifying or the calorific. They include the "Social Triangle," the "Making of a New Yorker," and the "Foreign Policy of Company 99," all in the "Trimmed Lamp," the "Brief Début of Tildy" in the "Four Million," and the "Complete Life of John Hopkins" in the "Voice of the City." I can not close this summary of good points without a passing reference to the not unsuggestive portrayal of humane and cheerful scoundrels in the "Gentle Grafter." The picture, if false to species, is faithful to genus.

O. Henry's egregiousness, on the superficial side, both in merits and defects, reminds us of those park benches so characteristic of his tales which are occupied by a millionaire at one end and a mendicant at the other. But, to complete the image, we must add as a casual visitor to that bench a seer or a student, who, sitting down between the previous comers and suspending the flamboyancies of their dialogue, should gaze with the pensive eye of Goldsmith or Addison upon the passing crowd.

In O. Henry American journalism and the Victorian tradition meet. His mind, quick to don the guise of modernity, was impervious to its spirit. The specifically modern movements, the scientific awakening, the religious upheaval and subsidence, the socialistic gospel, the enfranchisement of women—these never interfered with his artless and joyous pursuit of the old romantic motives of love, hate, wealth, poverty, gentility, disguise, and crime. On two points a moral record which, in his literature, is everywhere sound and stainless, rises almost to nobility. In an age when sexual excitement had become available and permissible, this worshiper of stimulus never touched with so much as a fingertip that insidious and meretricious fruit. The second point is his feeling for underpaid working-girls. His passionate concern for this wrong derives a peculiar emphasis from the general refusal of his books to bestow countenance or notice on philanthropy in its collective forms. When, in his dream of Heaven, he is asked: "Are you one of the bunch?" (meaning one of the bunch of grasping and grinding employers), the response, through all its slang, is soul-stirring. "'Not on your immortality,' said I. 'I'm only the fellow that set fire to an orphan asylum and murdered a blind man for his pennies.'" The author of that retort may have some difficulty with the sentries that watch the entrance of Parnassus; he will have none with the gatekeeper of the New Jerusalem.

O. W. FIRKINS

Correspondence

Educating the Capitalist

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Ever since the Unpopular (now the Unpartizan) Review made editorial mention of your publication as one "based on rational ideas of what constitutes human progress and how to promote it" I have been enjoying its weekly "signs of thinking things through." Of especially high and timely merit have been your recent articles, "Is There a Huge 'Social Surplus'?", "Hungary's Communist Experiment," and "Production, Distribution, Happiness."

The claim of socialism is that capital (the surplus goods produced above immediate living requirements and the margin between our present existence and the hand-to-mouth existence of savage tribes) should be administered by the state for the greater welfare of the people instead of by private or individual interests as at present.

As a matter of fact the test of experience shows and is showing that greater efficiency (as measured by the results obtained from a given amount of human resource and effort) in "grub-staking" enterprises involving risk and time for their realization is obtained through private administration of capital than through governmental direction. However, the latter offers a direct appeal to the people in the apparently greater stability it would offer to industry and thereby to employment.

Private administrators of capital ("capitalists" so called) acquire their positions of power through their gradually demonstrated ability to produce results, and no equally effective means for selecting governmental officials has ever been devised. From them and others we are hearing a great deal about the necessity of educating the common people to a due appreciation of economics, and of natural law in general, that they may not kill the goose that lays the golden egg, as is the case in Russia. And no one will care to deny this pressing necessity.

But what of the education of capitalists? Why do we hear so little of this need? Why don't we hear of a more widespread emulation of Mr. Carnegie and his building of the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad in 1894, when industry was at a standstill; of Mr. Harriman, who made it a practice to proceed with railroad extensions when times were poor, and labor and material cheap, and when he had a minimum interference with the ordinary course of traffic to contend with?

Why do the most efficient applications of capital in the way of extensions, betterments, research, "hang up" so persistently between the devil of a dearth of immediate demand for commodities and the deep blue sea of unfilled orders? Either the times are too poor and the capitalistic "nerve" is lacking in its apparent view that the bottom of things has dropped out for all time, or the plant is too busy to be bothered with directing capital into the multiplying channels of production, with the result that this is rarely done. Were this done more often industry would be less spasmodic; the situation would arise less frequently in which labor is denied the opportunity to produce the commodities it needs for its existence. And not only would labor and society in general profit in this way, but the gain to the capitalist is well illustrated by the experience of men like Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Hariman.

In short, the present capitalistic mechanism is far superior to any the state gives promise of devising, but nevertheless it is highly deficient and unstable. As a result there is a widespread unrest which enjoys baiting the capitalist as a sport and has for its motto "anything but the present order of things—anything so long as it is different."

It is clearly up to the capitalist to give an account of his stewardship and to improve it, or he may find his opportunity even more hampered by regulation than at present; or else, he may find it removed entirely, which would be a calamity indeed.

The foregoing is submitted by way of leading up to this request: Can not you have an article prepared to answer some of these questions, and to point out to our managers of capital how much they stand in need of removing the beam in their own eyes while they continue to point out the mote in the eyes of their laboring brethren?

W. E. DEAN

Wilmerding, Pa., July 24

Concerning "Obligations and Reservations"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I trust you will not think me hypercritical if I take exception to one point brought out in your most excellent, well-considered, and in the main carefully reasoned out editorial in the current issue of the Review, entitled "Obligations and Reservations."

In the paragraph I refer to you use the following language:

There are those who strenuously contend that the Covenant violates the Constitution by depriving Congress of its right to determine the question of peace and war. That this contention is not sound has been amply shown, and was brought out with particular conclusiveness in Senator Kellogg's able speech a few weeks ago. It is not a question of Constitutional legitimacy, but of far reaching national policy, that is at issue. It is precisely because the obligation assumed in the treaty is not different in kind from what many former treaties have embodied that the reservations are called for.

To my thinking, the speech of Senator Kellogg you refer to was exceedingly faulty in that it contained the same fallacious reasoning which you have fallen into in the paragraph just quoted. From the practical standpoint, it seems to me to be wholly indefensible to say that the obligations incurred by signing the proposed covenant are similar to those incurred by signing an ordinary treaty. An analysis of the two acts will show this to be true. When a nation signs a treaty the amount of sovereignty or independence of action surrendered is so small that it is for all practical purposes negligible. As a matter of fact, treaties are entered into for the purpose of covering a certain set of facts, which have been thoroughly considered in advance.

The agreement relates to certain given facts and to contingencies which may arise therefrom, all of which have been carefully considered in advance. The obligations and commitments of the nation in connection therewith are in terms limited and prescribed. After the signing of an ordinary treaty a nation is still free and independent to pursue its own course and to control its own destiny in the field of international affairs. Clearly this would not be the case should a nation subscribe to the proposed covenant. Such a step would not relate to a given set of facts and to a particular situation, but it would be a surrender in advance to the Council of the League of the right and power to determine what course a constituent nation must pursue in connection with all disputes and issues which arise in the field of international affairs. When this is done, a nation is no longer the master of its own destiny. The situation is like that which arises when a corporation, formerly free and independent, has decided to merge its organization with a number of other corporations for the purpose of forming what is commonly called a Trust.

Prior to entering such a combination, the constituent corporations were free and independent to enter into contracts. After the combination is formed, the right and power to do this has been surrendered and lodged in the merger. Furthermore, it seems to me to be loose reasoning to say that should we enter this League and agree to be morally or legally bound by the recommendations of the Council, that Congress would still be free to determine on its own initiative when we should enter war, how we should conduct our wars and under what circumstances they should be ended. Of course in this instance, as under an ordinary treaty, war can not be declared unless Congress does so, but it is also clear that should Congress decline to declare war upon the recommendation of the Executive Council, such an act would constitute a breach of faith, and this is quite manifestly the point of the whole matter.

Under our Constitutional régime, Congress is absolutely free and independent to determine on its own initiative when war shall be declared, and how it shall be carried on. It is one thing for Congress to declare war under a special treaty, where the facts and circumstances relating to the obligation have all been thoroughly considered in advance and where our rights and duties have been limited and prescribed by special agreement, and quite another thing for it to be called upon to declare war at the behest of a Council in regard to matters which could not possibly have entered into the contemplation of the representatives of the nation at the time the covenant was executed. It is a well-known fact that strychnia is calculated to kill the one who takes it in a short time, but it does not follow that an exceedingly small dose is fatal or even harmful. The fact is, as well known, that in many instances small doses of strychnia, far from being harmful, are actually beneficial. From the standpoint of practical statesmanship it seems to me that this illustration is a perfectly fair one.

From my viewpoint, it is absurd to contend that a corporation surrenders its independence and freedom of action when it enters into a contract. On the other hand, the proposition is too clear for argument, that when such a corporation decides to join a merger and submit to a Board of Directors of that merger, its independence of action disappears.

J. R. WILFLEY

New York, August 29

[The point intended by the remark to which Judge Wilfley objects was that the mere fact of the treaty committing the country to peace or war in certain contingencies does not in itself make the treaty violative of the Constitution. Hence the practical consequence that mere unconstitutionality can not be relied on to relieve us of the extraordinarily far-reaching obligations involved in Article X; and consequently, as we stated in the sentence following the passage quoted by Judge Wilfley, it is necessary that the acceptance of the treaty be bound up with "a plain statement of the limitations which the considered judgment of the nation recognizes as necessary."—Eds. Review.]

Book Reviews

Herbert Spencer's Value To-day

THE MAN VERSUS THE STATE. By Herbert Spencer. Edited by TRISTRAM BEALE, with Critical and Interpretative Comments by W. H. Taft, C. W. Eliot, Elmer Root, H. C. Lodge, D. J. Hill, N. M. Butler, A. P. Gardner, E. H. Gary, and H. F. Scone. New York: Mitchell Kennerley.

IT has been something over half a century since Herbert Spencer published the first of his essays, which were later brought together into a volume under the title "The Man Versus the State;" and it is perhaps a matter of interest to inquire if the arguments then employed and the views then expressed have any value at the present time. That the opinion of very respectable authorities affirms that they do have value is shown by the reissuance of the essays under the auspices indicated above. Unfortunately the critical and interpretative comments that have been added are of very little value. Most of them appear to have been made in a perfunctory manner, and attempt little serious criticism of the doctrines declared by Spencer. The publishers in a note assert that the original essays established the foundations of our modern social thinking, but there is little to support such a statement. On the contrary, it has been generally recognized that Spencer's reasoning was defective, and certainly the trend of actual political practice in England, as well as in other countries, has given no evidence that his counsels have been heeded.

Spencer was much impressed as well as distressed by the fact that while in earlier times the Liberals, or their predecessors, the Whigs, had sought to repeal the restraints which former Parliaments had imposed upon trade and private conduct, the Liberals of his day were urging the enactment of new measures in limitations of individual freedom. And yet the explanation was a simple one, and carried with it no implication of logical inconsistency. Both the earlier and later Liberals strove to improve the conditions of life of the masses as distinguished from the aristocratic classes, and it was, therefore, as proper that they should seek upon utilitarian and humanitarian grounds to obtain the benefit of laws limiting the powers of the propertied or employing classes, as it was that the repeal should be effected of the many statutes which aimed to prevent free competition and the right of the laborers to take collective action for their own economic advantage. The same motive impelled them to support proposals that the state itself should supply certain services to the whole community.

All these extensions of the state's regulatory powers seemed highly objectionable to Spencer, not because of any lack of sympathy on his part with the interests of the masses, but because he had a fixed conviction that political government is of such a nature that good results can not be obtained from an extension of its activities beyond those necessary for the protection of the community against foreign aggression and the maintenance of conditions under which the freedom of the individual is limited only as far as is necessary to prevent him from interfering with the equal freedom of other individuals. This principle Spencer lays down in such absolute terms that only the fact that he claims to deduce it from universal evolutionary principles saves him from being ranked among the a priori individuals who found their political philosophies upon natural rights declared to be inherent in men. In the result, it is seen that Spencer arrives at the conclusion that it is futile to attempt so to reconstruct governments and so to reform their administrative processes that they will be efficient instruments for the performance of other than negative police functions.

There can be little question that these political views could be pernicious if accepted without qualification at the present time. A greater social content must be given to individual rights and interests than Spencer was willing to accord to them, and the problem of securing governmental systems that will operate justly, impartially, and efficiently must not be abandoned as a hopeless one.

With changing conditions the centre of political effort has shifted from point to point. When personal government prevailed the great necessity was to introduce a reign of law under which those in authority, including the monarch himself, would have their powers and the manner of their exercises defined by law, and that legal processes would exist for enforcing the legal responsibilities thus created. This constitutional status having been secured, the centre of political interest shifted to obtaining for the governed a greater influence in determining the policies of their governments. Political and civil or constitutional liberty having been secured to a reasonable extent, the chief political problems have now come to be the improvement of the administrative processes of governments, and the education of their electorates so that the injustice and disutility of class legislation will be perceived and public policies favored which rest upon sound economic and social principles. Speaking generally, then, the problem of government has become one of operative efficiency rather than of political rights. The constitutional privileges, and the guarantees to the individual that he shall not be proceeded against as to his personal freedom or his property except by due processes of law, must of course be preserved against curtailment, but the forward political steps should be in the direction of greater public administrative efficiency.

There can be no question that, especially in America, our governments are not properly organized from the administrative point of view, nor do they use, except in few instances, proper administrative methods. The fact that even our National Government does not employ the budgetary method of estimating its financial needs and determining and apportioning its expenditures shows how indifferent our statesmen and their constituencies have been to the problem of efficient operative principles. At the same time, then, that it is admitted that no absolute a priori principles should determine whether or not a given function should be exercised by the government; the fact should be recognized that it is imperative that the machinery of government should be so adjusted and so controlled as to be able to perform a task efficiently before an agitation is started to entrust that task to it.

One other point with regard to the problem which Spencer designates as "Man Versus the State" deserves mention. In a recent conversation President Goodnow of Johns Hopkins called the attention of the writer to a distinction which distinguishes the attitude of the average American towards governmental regulation of private conduct from that of the average European. The American is by no means as willing as the European to submit to public control or to other individual sacrifices for the sake of increasing the military power or political prestige of that abstract political entity or personality which is denominated the state, but he is fully as ready and possibly even more disposed to submit to political regimentation if he is convinced that the result will be to improve the moral or material condition of the community viewed simply as a collection of individual men and women. For example, only in a crisis such as was presented when America entered the great war, have Americans been willing to consent to compulsory military service, and scarcely had this crisis been passed when a widespread demand arose that the conscripted armies should be demobilized and the standing army again recruited by voluntary enlistments. At the very same time they have permitted the incorporation into their national Constitution of a prohibition with regard to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages that carries with it a more radical invasion of their sphere of individual liberty than would for a moment be tolerated in France or Great Britain or even in the German States. Thus Americans suffer from the excess of their political virtues. They are often unwilling to give to the enforcement of law and the maintenance of national power that disinterested support which should be given, and, on the other hand, they are willing to endure police control that is essentially oppressive if the claim is often enough reiterated that a moral principle is involved or that other individuals will thereby be protected against their own weaknesses or follies.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

The New "Laissez Faire"

THE POLITICS OF INDUSTRY. A Footnote to the Social Unrest. By Glenn Frank. New York: The Century Company.

IN this interesting and well-written little book—a reprint of a series of articles in the Century Magazine—we learn, what we have long suspected, that we are a nation of improvisers—muddlers, our English cousins would call it—and that we should be more forward-looking, in order that we may be forewarned and forearmed against coming trouble. We sadly need a school of prophets—foretellers and forthtellers—who shall make a scientific study of social meteorology and send out their forecasts a good while ahead of coming events; but still more do we need a people wise enough to listen—as no democracy has done since the days of Jonah. Unfortunately, prophecies are below par just now; for, while some of them may be as good as gold, others are not worth the paper they are written on. Certainly, a prophet should be able to show a sign, unless the people also have the inspiration and illumination.

Yet nearly all who study social problems agree with Mr. Frank in saying that we are living in a time of great unrest and discontent. The world is in a state of unstable equilibrium, yeasty, frothing, and bubbling with new ideas, suggestible, plastic, flexible, prepared for a speeding-up of evolution, ready to take on new forms, to make in ten years a leap over a social chasm which ordinarily would require a century to span. Now, if ever, great leaders should arise, men of vision and determination, men of broad and synthetic minds—real constructive statesmen, molders of human thought, organizers, builders, creators. If such leaders do not appear and rise to the occasion, presently things will stiffen up again and move in the old ruts, or else inexperienced men will take control, for when, in such times as these, society has had to choose between trained blind men and untrained men of vision, the latter have invariably been the people's choice.

Mr. Frank, at least, is not in doubt as to the men whom he would choose and call to this service. Not the ordinary run of politicians, for they represent artificial geographical divisions and have not been trained as executives and engineers. Not the ill-trained and amateur bureaucracy from which we have suffered during the war, nor even a trained bureaucracy, for that would be inefficient, unprogressive, and tyrannical. No, the natural leaders of the hour are the business men of the country, who, if they have the right spirit—the spirit of constructive liberalism—can lead the American people into the promised land. This repudiation of state socialism, with which most business men and labor leaders will sympathize, reminds one of the origin of the well-known and much discredited phrase: laissez-faire, laissez-passer, usually attributed to the Physiocrat, Gournay. It goes farther back, however, to the time of Colbert, when a deputation of merchants waited on the great finance minister to protest against protection and governmental interference with industry. "Laissez-nous faire," said Le Gendre—let us do it: let the people who know carry on business affairs, and let the Government interfere as little as possible. While the phrase has been perverted from its original meaning and made to stand for unrestricted individualism, it has still a value in our day as a warning against excessive governmental regulation and state socialism.

In taking up the task of reconstruction or reorganization, business statesmen should keep three large ends ever in view: first, greater efficiency in the production of wealth; second, greater justice in the distribution of wealth; third, greater wisdom in the consumption of wealth. Many efforts have been made in the past towards the attainment of these ends, but none sufficiently comprehensive nor altogether successful. Collective bargaining can never solve the labor problem, for it is merely a phase of the class struggle based on the old system of balance of power and increasing armaments. Conciliation in industrial disputes is apt to degenerate into industrial pacifism and attains only temporary results. Arbitration is essentially opportunistic and compromising in character, and its awards are often flouted by the losing side. Investigation is a mere antiseptic, negative in character. Social legislation may give security to the wage-earners, but that is not the goal of labor's aspiration. Welfare work savors of patronage and is irritating to labor. Profit sharing when most successful tends to break down the solidarity of labor. Scientific management tends to mechanize the worker, making him a better tool, but a poorer craftsman. All of these remedies, good in their way, fail to cure the trouble, as they do not touch the ultimate labor issue—the status of the worker in industry, and his relation to its control.

After reading this long list of futile attempts to solve the labor problems, one is inclined to think that, like the squaring of the circle, it is unsolvable. By the Industrial Revolution, as the author says, the workers lost control of the instruments of production, the raw materials for production, the conditions under which production is carried on, and the profits arising from production; and they will never be satisfied until control of all these things is regained. Of course, the author does not propose to give them complete control, such as they are supposed to have had in the good old handicraft days, but only partial control such as is provided for in England by the Whitley Councils; and it is very questionable whether the workers, if they are really determined to regain their ancient status, will be satisfied with this. Besides, as the author himself admits, such proposals are essentially conservative in character, and socialists like Mr. G. D. H. Cole, the belligerent young apostle of the Guild movement, are stoutly opposed to them, asserting that they will not involve any real conquest of economic power. Similarly, Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton candidly advises labor not to sell its rights of combining and striking for any plausible and partial participation in management, for, he says, "the triumph of capitalism has practically consisted in granting popular control in such small quantities that the control could be controlled."

For all that, Mr. Frank is very enthusiastic about the Whitley Councils, as well as such experiments in profit sharing and shop control as have been successfully tried by William Filene's Sons Company and other enterprising business men. He thinks that twenty of the outstanding leaders of American business could with dramatic suddenness draw up a plan for a new order of industry, even as the Constitutional Convention drafted the Constitution of the United States. It might be well to point out, in this connection, that the framers of the Constitution departed very slightly from British and Colonial precedent, and that the newest features of the Constitution have been, as many think, the least successful. It is rather odd, too, that Mr. Frank says nothing about ownership as giving a title to control, and does not suggest that the workers, before demanding the right to control, should make the efforts and sacrifices prerequisite to the acquisition of a property interest in the business concerned, without which any large measure of control might have most disastrous results.

A Historian in the Field

SCENES FROM ITALY'S WAR. By G. M. Trevelyan. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

FOR more than three years the distinguished biographer of Garibaldi commanded the First Ambulance Unit of the British Red Cross on the Italian front. The unit served from the Astico to the Carso, witnessed the sieges at Bainsizza and San Gabriele, and the capture of Gorizia; was whirled back, with the loss of its entire material, after Caporetto. Thus there passed under the eyes of one of the most accomplished of modern historians the main events of the most sensational fighting of the world war. All this Mr. Trevelyan treats with color and discretion and insight. His narrative is accompanied by maps, and despite the modest title of the book, it is for the non-technical reader a definitive bit of military history, and withal an engrossing personal narrative.

Mr. Trevelyan traces the mood of Italy from the outbreak of the war to the end. His analysis of the great debate which preceded intervention is masterly, as is the explanation of the moral débâcle at Caporetto. The wonder is, he thinks, not that the disaster came, but that it did not come sooner and that Italy so soon recovered morale. For the war was made in the towns, but fought by the peasants. These, unlike their French and English allies, hardly realized the moral scope of the war, were sustained by no instructed idealism, suffered terribly (the percentage of deaths was as great for Italy as for England), and so were readily affected by pacifist agitation and easily dismayed in disaster.

The portent of Caporetto is less than the marvel of the recovery. Certain units of the second army, strikers from the munition works ill-advisedly posted in a quiet sector, voluntarily surrendered to the Austrians on October 24, 1917. Widely rotted at the centre, the whole line had to withdraw. In twenty days the Italians were driven in about 150 miles from the East and North. Many of the troops were demoralized, most of the artillery taken, lost those Alpine positions which had cost months of ingenuity and sacrifice. Only the sturdiness of the Duke of Aosta's third army, which doggedly fought its way back from the Carso to the Piave, saved Italy and possibly the world.

The reintegration was conscious. Italy had suffered from what one of her own writers called "incomplete nationality." The disease being known, the remedy was forthcoming. Mutilated officers organized for propaganda, and often against opposition, stung the little villages to shame and valor. The nightmare of Caporetto silenced or even converted the Clerical and Socialist defeatists. In humiliation Italy built herself a new soul.

These processes of national psychology are traced and interpreted with sympathy and finesse. The gentlemanly restraint of the style befits the greatness of the theme. Although written so near the events it describes, it has the balance and detachment of Mr. Trevelyan's well-known histories, with a glamour of its own. Nobody who cares for Italy and wishes to be informed as to her gigantic sacrifice in the war can afford to leave this book unread.

The West, Inc.

THE BRANDING IRON. A Tale of East and West. By Katharine Newlin Burt. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

WOODEN SPOIL. By Victor Rousseau. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THE LADY OF THE CROSSING. By Frederick Niven. New York: George H. Doran Company.

MR. REX BEACH says he wishes he had written "The Branding Iron"; or rather in his enthusiasm he wires the publishers to that effect, adding that he "looks forward with confidence to its great success as a book and as a photoplay." Most cheering this must be to the writer of a "first" novel. Hers, indeed, is the stuff best-sellers are made on, and there seems to be nothing against her early inclusion in that band of Eminent Authors who, with Mr. Beach at their head, have just dedicated their genius to the Film. She has a full bag of tricks and a liberal hand. She has mastered at sight the rules of the game. Not even her ownership of a ranch in Wyoming and her familiarity with Broadway have been permitted to interfere with the thoroughly "practical" construction of her fabric. Whatever she may know of Wild West and Wild Ways is carefully subordinated to the standardized and tested conceptions of those parts upon which the authorities of screen and news-stand have set their final seal of approval. It is the West of Owen Wister and Rex Beach, and the East of R. W. Chambers and Gouverneur Morris that are brought together in these pages.

Joan, fierce virgin of the hills, is romantically wed by Pierre, lone rancher. They are happy enough till a young "sin-buster" Holliwel butts in (the right phrase), a fool (his author seems to think him rather noble) who, never mind how, succeeds in rousing Pierre's jealousy. Instead of shooting the parson, Pierre brands his wife between the shoulders with his branding iron. On the second, enter male number three, Prosper Gael, author and elegant man of the world: shoots Pierre, leaving him for dead, and carries off Joan. In his finely appointed cabin in "a secret fold of the hills," she is cared for and becomes, out of gratitude, his mistress. But the cabin has been built for another woman, who presently lifts a finger, and Joan is deserted. On the second, the young husband turns up alive in the offing and Joan flees stricken into the wilderness. Author makes stage-play out of their story, producer (husband of "other woman") picks up Joan in ranch kitchen and decides to star her in the new piece! Done. Author returns from Europe to see his latest success. My goodness, it's Joan—she must never know I wrote this!—the only woman, after all, I ever really loved. Bound in honor to the other woman, though. At this second, Pierre, the long-lost husband, arrives on Broadway. A fine fellow—he has had Joan's address for some years but has refrained from looking her up out of consideration for the author's plot. He is now rewarded, being, for all his little performance with the branding iron, the only man Joan ever really loved. End of the reel. It is all cleverly done, "well-written" in the verbal sense, and fulfills its subtitle. Most so-called wild-Western romance is in fact the romance of East and West. Broadway and Wyoming—what contrast more "sure-fire" than the setting against each other of our two romantic frontiers? Or New England and Montana—there you have the fillip also. Just now the Eastern school-marm of "The Virginian" and "The Great Divide" is, as the theatrical people say, resting, while the daughter of the rancho holds the scene.

In the Canadian Northwest the field of contrast is wider, with barriers of race and of social convention to be surmounted by the small god. The author of "Wooden Spoil" makes use of them all. Hilary Askew, a young American, inherits from an eccentric uncle a large tract of timber on the St. Lawrence. It turns out to be the land of an ancient seigneurie, sharply won by the uncle from its latest old-school incumbent. The chateau and a bit of land surrounding it remain to the Seigneur. He dwells there in pride and poverty with his young and beautiful and spirited daughter, Mademoiselle Madeleine, and a faithful old servitor whom we have met somewhere before. Naturally the Rosnys do not rejoice at the coming of Mr. Hilary. However, youth will be served, and the hearts of Hilary and Madeleine are presently inclined one to another. But there is a rich and villainous Canuck hard by, with designs on Madeleine and the remnants of the Rosny property; also an enemy to Hilary for business reasons. Now Hilary is a remarkably husky young man, and provides several scenes of distinguished activity in the way of fighting, Northern style. Things are against him, since the old Seigneur is determined, according to recipe, to marry his only child to the sufficiently patent rascal who has won his sacred promise, some time since. Later, the knave being exposed, and Hilary accepted as Madeleine's lover, a double abduction comes off, and the tale comes to a whirlwind finish with much play of fists and pistols, a shipwreck, and a providential disposition of escape for the heroic pair and death for the villain. Let us not ask too much: this is a yarn, and frankly so; only it contains bits of localism and hints at characterization to exasperate the reader who has reached his years, or moods, of discretion.

"The Lady of the Crossing" is an attempt to write a marketable romance, by a writer who knows and is interested in the real scenes and types of a certain Western country. His plot is too slight for the movie scenario. His people speak the colorless and grammatically sloppy "American language" of common use instead of that highly colored lingo invented by Bret Harte and since developed and standardized for the use of Western romancers. His title is a sort of joke on the expectant reader, since its "lady" turns out to be not the heroine but the adventuress of the piece. It is, as the author confesses at the end, "the story of Sam Haig and Nance Webster, though it all began with the lure of Mildred Henderson." Mildred is the "lady," the rather uncouth siren of Kootenay, while Nance is simply a nice girl with an honest heart worth winning. Sam Haig himself is no great figure of a hero. He makes a clever "deal" on one occasion, and we need not fear that he will fail to do well for Nance, in the wordly estimation of his time and place. The story even lacks a proper villain, since Marsden, who seems at first to be shaping for that rôle, is presently seen to be a good fellow at heart. Finally the minor characters, the Timkins and the elder Websters, commit that utter superfluity, from the movie point of view, of existing as persons tolerably amusing and "convincing" in themselves.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Run of the Shelves

THE readers of Mr. Galsworthy's brief "Addresses in America, 1919" (Houghton Mifflin) will be many, possibly very many; they will always be fewer than lovers of wisdom and humanity could wish. These speeches dwell upon the moral union of Great Britain and America in a spirit to which solemnity rather than festival has supplied the keynote. Great Britain and America have been ordained to fellowship through their joint assignment to an imperative and mighty task. Mankind is their ward; let them look to their stewardship. The second capital point in these ad-resses is the protest against "the increase of herd-life, based on machines, money-getting, and the dread of being dull," in other words, against the enslavement—not to say the extinction—of life by its own apparatus. On this ground Mr. Galsworthy is impregnable. The addresses suggest a man whom life has profoundly saddened, but neither embittered nor disheartened. The pitch of the voice is low. Mr. Galsworthy does not asseverate; he testifies. There is no insistence, scarcely any urgency, but the reader can hardly fail to be drawn to a side on which good sense, sanity, and fraternity have so clearly ranged themselves. Half the effectiveness of persuasion rests on the desire to be in good company.

The impressive point in these addresses is their evident disinterestedness. Here is a man profoundly anxious that certain things in the future of mankind shall come to be. Judging merely from this book, one might almost affirm that that desire is Mr. Galsworthy. Its effect in the marshaling of his thoughts is notable. Mr. Galsworthy utters an original thought without concern for its originality. He utters a commonplace thought without embarrassment for its commonness. In a world in which the importance of truths is not in the least affected by their early or retarded entrance into the consciousness of humanity, the absolute rightness of this attitude is undeniable. Exactly the same temper is visible in his style. Mr. Galsworthy utters a bright phrase without eagerness. He utters a tame phrase without misgiving. His preference of the bright phrase to the tame one may be conjectured; his preference of the apt phrase to either is unmistakable. He governs his route by the compass, not the scenery. The trend of the higher literature of our time (Ibsen, Tolstoi, Howells, Galsworthy) towards integrity in the amplest sense issues in a certain jealousy of style, or at least of the charms of style as distinguished from its utilities. Its attractions are viewed as distractions; the servitor of thought may become its competitor. Whether the doctrine and the resultant practice be sound or not, there can be no doubt that the self-denying attitude of literature, the sacrifice of its life to the transmission of its message, is a noble and touching spectacle. Kings have sometimes been most kinglike in the act of abdication.

"Sky Fighters of France," by Lieutenant Henry Farré (Houghton Mifflin), is valuable chiefly for its pictures. If it had only been possible to reproduce them in color the book would have been superb. Even as reproduced Lieutenant Farré's paintings are quite the most effective representations of war's last splendid adventure. To realize that there, at any rate, knighthood is still in flower, one has but to glance at the portraits of Guynemer and William Thaw. It would be hard to find a nobler picture of the warrior brought home triumphant in death than the "Tragic Return of Captain Albert Féquant."

Farré, no longer a young man, hastened from Buenos Ayres on the declaration of war, and after the usual difficulties found himself an aviator-painter. In this capacity he had all the flying experiences, which he does not so much tell us about as allow us to overhear in the form of snatches of conversation that are not without a flavor.

"Inventions of the Late War," by A. Russell Bond (Century Company), is a good, popular summary with a few plates, from which may be learned all that the layman needs to know about trench gear, poison gas, hydrophones, depth bombs, and the like. For an unreconstructed boy it would make a thrilling present.

Intensive Vacationing

NONE of the gentler excitements is quite like that evoked by moving into the hills; nothing else quite like the subdued thrill that grows as blue outlines begin to heave on the horizon. There, beyond, is a life apart, there lie concealed the beginnings of great rivers, there dwells the mystery of the forest. It is towards this that we are moving.

For a right setting there should be a heavy sky, with sharp, bracing dashes of rain, the hills, as we come nearer, rising flat and grey from a foreground not too distinctly seen. Presently, as we roll along, the farms grow hard and thin, dark masses of pine and hemlock fling themselves closer to the road; and the hills, just now ahead of us only, are suddenly on either hand. The sky to the west is rent with broad planes of light, and a universal greyness yields place to varied greens beneath peaks washed clean to elemental stone by every rain that has fallen since the world began.

Still we are expectant. We are not yet enfolded. Benediction has not yet breathed upon us. We wait. A backward glance shows the hills now closed in behind us. And then it comes; a gentle puff of air, cold with evening and late rain; and freighted with the pungent balm of ancient woods, unescapable, impelling, healing.

"The hills, my dear . . ."

To be sure, the abrupt eminence of the Catskills had long hung on our left, a region of mystery and romance, too, but this time unvisited of us. And perhaps these "fairy mountains" keep their charm freshest in the pages of the historian who has endowed them with an immortal folklore, "away to the west of the river, swelling up to a noble height and lording it over the surrounding country." In our day Kaatskill has become Catskill, and that is by way of measuring the difference. Likewise, at the foot of Lake George, to stand on the beautifully gardened slopes of the Fort William Henry Hotel and watch a hydroplane drop like a gull to the surface of the water, is to say: "Yes, this is fine, but the other, the old life—the steamer just putting out, you notice, is named 'Horicon'—lies transfigured, too, in secure immortality." And the piazzas of the avenue of hotels at Saratoga, where our grandmothers once billowed in stately "constitutional," what a human "zoo," caught, as it were, half-way between dinner and a Sunday afternoon nap in their thirty-dollar-a-day rooms.

And now we are bowling along over perfect roads in the deep heart of the Adirondack forest, or poised on the crest of the Wilmington Notch gazing across pleasant valleys to the rainbow-patched mountains beyond. What would "Adirondack" Murray deign to say of this sort of travel? What, even, the guides of not so long ago, when we counted it the best part of three days to "come in" by North Creek? What, too, the company of poets and naturalists who, seventy years since, ventured among the first a holiday in the wilderness, the party that Longfellow refused to join because he heard Emerson was going to carry a gun? Perhaps Longfellow, who felt he got quite enough exercise putting on and off his rubbers, would have been willing to commit himself to the new form of locomotion. There are almost as many automobiles in the street of Lake Placid village as line Saratoga's Broadway. In the leisurely days one went into the Adirondacks for at least a month. In these strenuous times, with perhaps a scant week of holiday, one perforce vacations it intensively. Let us not wholly despise the automobile. . . .

The Adirondack camp—I do not mean the sort of shack we had twenty-five years ago on Brown's Tract Pond a few feet from where the railroad now runs by to Raquette Lake—but the huge log living house on the lake shore, with its sleeping quarters scattered here and there through the enveloping woods, and its dining-room somewhere else witnessing the regular conjunction of copious meals and a company of hungry guests, such a camp has always been civilization's most splendid achievement of an urbs in rure. To dress as one pleases, to sleep out of doors, to find oneself, at the remove of but a few steps, lord of a pine-needle carpet which seemingly no man's foot had pressed before, to return to a fireplace capable of a whole Ætna of flame, and there knit up the broken and twisted strands of old-time friendships, does civilization offer a finer delight? To make one's own flapjacks of a cold morning; to bivouac in the dark and drizzle, stealthily to stalk the enemy under guise of deer or trout, that, too, is magnificent, but it is war. We are speaking now only of the pleasures of civilization. It takes a long time to go camping as we used to do it. But in the Adirondack camp, the camp that has perfectly learned to maintain its comfort, even its splendor, amid an envious and delightfully contrasting wilderness, here even forty-eight hours is not too scant to contain infinite riches. . . .

There is no missing the look on the face of a north country. Its marks are as unmistakable as signs of age or race, wisdom or folly in the human countenance. Perhaps it is the stone houses that bring home the sense of it; perhaps the touch of autumn where four days back on the road it was full summer. Huge poplar trees on the shores of Lake Champlain speak a word for the south. Arbor-vitæ hedges of noble lugunance proclaim winters that are not intolerable. And yet the feeling will not down that before long a cutting wind will sweep the mighty gorge between the reposeful Green Mountains across the lake and the tossing Adirondacks near at hand.

Chazy is true north, and for us farthest north. It is almost Canada, and in appearance Canada already. There we flag a broad but incredibly agile ferryboat and are soon set across the lake and left to thread our way over innumerable islands and endless causeways to the mainland of Vermont. It is amazing to see how unappalled these Vermont cars are by their roads. One is sure they would start boldly up the side of one of their own Green Mountains without remarking that the way was more than usually rough. When the good roads come, all the world will follow. To-day only those who are blest with very powerful springs, strong brakes, and sound tires can give deserved attention to an inexpressibly beautiful combination of hills near and far, of flashing waters, and of delightfully old-world towns. And when all the world does come, it is to be feared that a little inn on the shores of Champlain, in the face of which the sun tips the Adirondacks with his expiring flame, will lose something of its homely welcome, and Phyllis will no longer recommend to a bowl of apple sauce the addition of heaping whipped cream. . . .

It is a little anti-climactic to approach the Berkshires from the north. One has supped full on mountains. One begins to take an interest in lesser mountains of slate, refuse of great quarries, from which the farmers help themselves to material for their fences, just as, a little farther on, they build their fences of clean Dorset marble. One rejoices, too, in glimpses of well-kept estates, through the grounds of which the public no longer as of old wanders at its will. No doubt it is the automobile that has put an end to former hospitality. One rejoices, finally, in the good roads. From now on it is plain sailing. The North is far behind us. In the Connecticut fields they are harvesting tobacco, whole families working carefully and neatly at the delicate task of storing the leaf in the open-sided barns. The names on the sign posts grow familiar. The first house is recognized almost with a shout. Here is the utmost bourne of our tentative afternoon drives. Again a soft tremor of expectancy asserts itself. Home? Yes, but that always. Something else. The hills sink lower. A soft haze drops across the road ahead. We wait. And presently we move into a gentle air, touched with a salty coolness.

"My dear, the sea."

HARRY AYRES

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little farther into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available without much trouble, through publisher, book-seller, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles do not include bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

Mexico

MEXICO has been described in books from the point of view of the native Mexican partisan—adherent of this, that, or the other "Chief"—or by the American publicist whose bias may exist because he does not approve of President Wilson, or it may spring from the fact that he likes President Wilson very much indeed. There is the Anglo-Saxon writer who loves the spirit of the Latin races, and views the lands of mañana not only with sympathy, but through a haze of sentiment; there is his opposite, with no patience for people without a Yankee habit of "git up and git." There is the apologist for and defender of selfish commercial exploitation, ever desiring immediate intervention; and there is the one who can remain indifferent to the murder of his fellow-citizens rather than let anything

“The Congressional Record”

“The Government Printing Office at Washington, D. C., is the largest establishment in the world devoted to printing. The gigantic Hoe Press which prints the Congressional Record, in signatures of 8 pages at the rate of 80,000 per hour, is operated by a 30-H.P. Crocker-Wheeler Motor.

“C-W Motors are now applied to all types of machinery in printing and publishing houses with marked advantages and economies.”

Alb Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

AMERICAN AND SWISS WATCHES

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

UNIVERSITY OF BUFFALO STUDIES: No. 1 “Education and Autocracy in Russia.”

By DANIEL B. LEARY, Professor of Psychology
Offers a basis for a clear understanding of the past and present of Russian affairs with no effort at propaganda, particularly stressing the social and educational aspects. Full bibliographies and latest statistics are given.

Price, $1.00 Postpaid

UNIVERSITY OF BUFFALO - - - - - BUFFALO, N. Y.

A Bargain in Acreage

In one of the most beautiful and healthful locations in Berkshire County, Massachusetts, in the Lenox and Stockbridge neighborhood, an estate of about 570 acres is offered for sale at a very reasonable price. About 250 acres are under cultivation and the rest is timber land and pasturage.

There are fourteen buildings on the property, substantially built at a cost far exceeding the present price of the entire property.

If the purchaser desired to sell the timber, (recently estimated at a high value by the State Forester,) a very considerable reduction in the net price of the property could be effected.

It is suggested that anyone who is interested would profit by addressing the undersigned at an early date.

Herbert E. Moore, Lee, Mass.

be done which might directly or indirectly benefit the object of his pet hatred—his fellow-countryman who happens to be a "capitalist."

There are monumental works upon Mexico, like Prescott's "History of the Conquest of Mexico," and studies of the earlier relations of the United States with Mexico, scholarly and extensive, like G. L. Rives's "United States and Mexico, 1821 to 1848," and Manning's "Early Diplomatic Relations between the United States and Mexico." But the average reader does not wish to make historical researches, and if the early history of Mexico is sketched, and our earlier intercourse is briefly described, he is satisfied. In "Mexico, Today and Tomorrow" (Macmillan, 1919), Edward D. Trowbridge has written a book which has received almost unanimous praise. It contains historical chapters for the early days, but devotes the greater number of its pages to the men and events of the past five years. Mr. Trowbridge's book is certainly indicated for contemporary reading: it is recent, and it endeavors to be impartial. George J. Hagar's "Plain Facts about Mexico" (Harpers, 1916) is a brief handbook of economic information; while "Modern Mexico," by R. J. MacHugh (Methuen, 1914), gives an English correspondent's observations while Huerta was still in power. "The Awakening of a Nation," by Charles F. Lummis (Harpers, 1898), is still valuable, and certainly readable, though it deals with the days of Diaz. And Clarence W. Barron, in "The Mexican Problem" (Houghton, 1917), discusses economic questions,—heartlessly, says a socialist critic, sympathetically, say others. The production of oil is dwelt upon.

Caspar Whitney's "What's the Matter with Mexico?" (Macmillan, 1916) advocates "a strong man" to govern that country, and criticizes President Wilson's policy. Thomas E. Gibbon, who writes "Mexico under Carranza" (Doubleday, Page, 1919), arraigns the Carranza government. "The Political Shame of Mexico," by Edward I. Bell (McBride, Nast, 1914), is now five years old, but it gives the result of first-hand observation of political manoeuvres in Mexico City. Mrs. Nelson O'Shaughnessy, in "A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico" (Harpers, 1916), describes the period before the American bombardment of Vera Cruz in 1914; while John Reed, in a style as lively as fire-crackers, gives his impressions of "Insurgent Mexico" (Appleton, 1914).

Of the books of travel, Hopkinson Smith's "A White Umbrella in Mexico" (Houghton, 1889) is pleasant, if not informing. Every one reads Harry Franck, so his "Tramping through Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras" (Century Co., 1916) need just be mentioned. George F. Weeks's "Seen in a Mexican Plaza" (Revell, 1918) records the charming side of Mexican life. "Viva Mexico!" (Appleton, 1908) is both pleasing and valuable, and is the work of Charles Macomb Flandrau, one of the two American authors (the other is Arthur Cosslett Smith) whose books are too few in number.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Lane, Jeremy. Yellow Men Sleep. Century. $1.60 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Burton, C. P. The Trail Makers. Holt. $1.50 net.

Herron, G. D. The Greater War. Mitchell Kennerley.

Kelly, F. F. What America Did. Dutton. $2.00 net.

Raemaekers' Cartoon History of the War. Volume 3. Century. $1.75.

Ransome, Arthur. Russia in 1919. Huebsch. $1.50.

Reissenden, P. F. The I. W. W.: A Study of American Syndicalism. Longmans, Green.

Russell, C. E. After the Whirlwind. Doran. $1.50 net.

The America of Today. Edited by Gailard Lapsley. Putnam.

The League of Nations: The Principle and the Practice. Edited by S. P. Duggan. Atlantic Monthly Press.

Tuttle, F. G. Women and World Federation. McBride. $1.60 net.

The Review is Established

as an organ of sane American opinion; it has found a definite place in American journalism; it is read in more than 600 libraries in every state in the Union; it is quoted every week by newspapers throughout the country.

Can you afford to be without THE REVIEW?

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

THE REVIEW

395

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 19

New York, Saturday, September 20, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	395
Editorial Articles:
The Situation in the Senate	398
The Real Issue at Boston	398
Labor and Capital to Talk It Over	399
Cardinal Mercier	399
The Apologies of Ludendorff and von Tirpitz	400
A German Version of Archduke Joseph's Coup	401
The Demand for Withdrawal from Siberia. By Jerome Landfield	402
Italy's Point of View. By H. Nelson Gay	403
The Socialist Reaction. By W. J. Ghent	404
Correspondence	406
Book Reviews:
Philippine Independence	407
The Middle Distance	408
A Courageous Pessimist	409
Marriage Laws of the States	410
The Run of the Shelves	411
English Political Parties. By E. S. Roscoe	412
Post-Crisis Studies. By A. G. Keller	412
Books and the News: China. By Edmund Lester Pearson	414

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

VARIOUS interpretations will be put upon Mr. Bullitt's disclosures to the Foreign Relations Committee. Those opposed to the Covenant in its present form will naturally make the most of them. And in default of any denial or explanation by Mr. Lansing it is hard to belittle the statement that three of America's delegates to the Peace Conference are not at all satisfied with the President's programme. That the American Secretary of State should have expressed doubt, as he is alleged to have done, that the people of this country would ratify the treaty if they knew what it let them in for would in normal times put the success of the President's plans decidedly in question. But the moral which emerges most clearly from this extraordinary situation emphasizes again the President's unhappy choice of his advisers. To exalt a minor employee of the Peace Mission, who had had the most meagre experience in the State Department, to the position of a special delegate to Russia and to take him into confidence on other matters was rashness itself. But Mr. Wilson's fondness for the society of radicals, of no uncertain stripe, is of several years' standing. A number of these former friends have turned against him, as was almost certain to be the case, unless he went nearly the whole way with them. Mr. Bullitt's indiscretion is the latest reminder that the radical's notion of open diplomacy differs from the President's or that of any other gentleman.

THE President has long been expert in reforming the world with a phrase. "Underwriting civilization" is a phrase of such resonance as almost to make America's obligation seem complete. If Mr. Wilson's verbal facility were less, and if this phrase stood out almost unaccompanied, as though the inevitable expression of the utmost fervor and conviction, its value as an inducement to accept the Covenant unchanged would undoubtedly be very great. But it will require more than alluring phrases to convince a people now accustomed to them. In his tour about the country he has chosen to give little time to the "technicalities" which are worrying many Senators and to emphasize what he undoubtedly regards as the broad truths which underlie his policy. Strategically, this may be wise procedure. If he can stir the country by broad vistas into a better world, he may get a tumultuous response. But he will hardly succeed without the use of definite argument, even in this somewhat tenuous sphere of discussion.

When Mr. Wilson states glowingly that the League will reduce war to a minimum, why does he not take pains to answer the objection, felt by many, that such a concert of Powers, in which every represented nation will have a voice in every dispute, may magnify certain incidents, owing to cherished grudges, which might otherwise be easily settled? Will the League, while serving as a useful medium of discussion, lend itself too easily to the propaganda of strongly organized minorities? These, to go no farther, are large, vital questions which should be considered by the President in a calm judicial spirit.

Finally, Mr. Wilson is continually lashing at the politics going on in the Senate. Well, some of his ardent adherents are not above admitting that he set the example for partisan politics by refusing to take with him to Paris such a strong representative of the Republican party as, say, Mr. Root. The President chose to go it alone. Let him not complain unduly if he now finds the going somewhat rough.

PARTY politics should be silent in the present great crisis, and Senator McCumber has done a valuable service in lifting up his voice to this effect. "Such an attitude," he says, in referring to the indifference of the majority report to the lofty purposes of the League, "is most selfish, immoral, and dishonorable." Himself an old-line Republican, he speaks of tactics concerning which he undoubtedly knows much. Into the merits of Senator McCumber's argument for the League we shall not enter in detail. He does not keep himself within bounds when he says:

No statesman, no philosopher, has ever yet given a single reason why nations, which are but collections of individuals, should not be governed in their international relations by the same code of ethics that governs the peoples of communities or states in their internal relations.

This is a question with which political philosophers have, of course, wrestled for years, but the tone of Senator McCumber's argument is such as to convince the public of his sincerity and to help materially to bring the Senate to a sense of its duty.

NEW YORK CITY may well take pride in the character of its fire officials. The Uniformed Officers' Association of the Fire Department, in view of what has been happening in the Boston police service, has passed a series of resolutions defining its position. While recognizing that workers in ordinary lines of private employment may be justified in striking, as a last resort to better their condition, this association declares explicitly that men in the position of its own members, sworn guardians of the public safety, can not strike under any circumstances without incurring a guilt akin to that of mutiny and desertion by the soldiers. The resolutions close with a formal pledge to the people of the city "that we shall stand faithful to the trust imposed upon us, and to our oath of office, unswerving in our devotion to duty as members of the uniformed force of the Fire Department to protect and preserve our city and government, our department, and the lives and property of the community."

Here is genuine leadership, and we predict that fire and police forces all over the country will rapidly line up with these faithful firemen, not with the mutinous Boston policemen.

NO one who has observed the activities of the Bolshevik Government, or followed closely its policy, can be doubtful as to the close relationship which existed between it and the German General Staff. The positive character of this relationship was clearly set forth in the so-called Sisson Documents, which were published last year by the Committee on Public Information. Our radicals, however, in a frantic endeavor to free their friends, the Soviet authorities, from the charge of being German agents, declared these documents to be forgeries, and indeed brought forward evidence that threw doubt on the authenticity of several of them. Competent authorities are agreed that the major portion of these revelations are entirely genuine, and sufficiently establish the fact that Lenin and Trotsky were acting in accordance with German plans. If further evidence were needed, it is to be found in a telegram discovered in the files of the Soviet at Vladivostok. This telegram reads:

No. 00784.

Moscow, May 4, 1918.

To Sukhanov, President of the Vladivostok Soviet.

In accordance with agreement with German Ambassador Mirbach, all telegrams of military importance, issued by Allied Consuls or received by them from their Governments, before delivering or sending to addressees, must be sent to following address: Moscow, Metropole, Room 205, wherefrom [code from here on] Brest-Litovsk [more in code]. After such telegrams have been censored in Moscow and returned, they should be delivered as addressed. To see that these orders are carried out, appoint a special commission with full powers. Chicherin, Commissar of Foreign Affairs.

It is interesting to note that these instructions were sent out by the Soviet Government under the direction of the German Ambassador at a time when Colonel Raymond Robins and other deduced or disingenuous persons were urging our Government to recognize the Bolsheviks.

THE Jewish situation in Russia is exceedingly grave. There can be no question that there is a widespread feeling among the Russian peasants and intelligentsia that the Bolshevik régime which afflicts their country to-day has a Jewish character; and that this idea is to be found in the number of men of Jewish names and Jewish origin who occupy prominent posts in the Bolshevik organization and who took a leading part in its establishment. How unjust this is can be seen from the recent report of Dr. Pasmanik, who is a conspicuous worker in the Zionist movement in Russia and abroad, and who has been prominent in the Constitutional Democratic party in Russia. He points out that the Jews of Russia are suffering more from the Bolshevik régime than any one else, because they belong chiefly to the intelligentsia and small bourgeoisie, and he makes it clear how bitterly they are opposed to it. What the Russians fail to realize is that men like Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Larin, and their like do not consider themselves as Jews at all. They are renegades and apostates and have cast aside religion and nationality. Dr. Pasmanik has just made a tour of southern Russia, where he has had an opportunity to observe Denikin's army, and he testifies that in spite of the feeling against the Jews, which has been aroused by the hatred for the Bolshevik leaders of Jewish name, there has been no pogrom in the immense territory held by the Volunteer Army. He makes a stirring appeal to the Jews of Europe and America to support the anti-Bolshevik forces of Russia as a means of saving from ruin his co-religionists now under the heel of the soviet tyranny and expresses his strong belief that only in this way can there be brought about a harmonious collaboration in the interest of the Jewish people. This pronouncement of Dr. Pasmanik should be given heed in America, where loyal patriotic Jews are also faced with the problem of renegade supporters of Bolshevism.

THE Italians live up to their fame as a preëminently poetic nation. Their diplomats having failed to satisfy the national cravings, the poet steps in and cuts the Gordian knot. D'Annunzio's dramatic act will, doubtless, make a powerful appeal to the temperament of the people. The whole affair was enacted with the consummate skill of the playwright. "I understand you would fire upon your brethren? Fire first upon me," the poet, baring his breast, said to the Italian general in command of the city. Whereupon the general, overcome by emotion, exclaimed: "I am happy to meet you, brave soldier and grand poet. With you I cry, 'Viva Fiume.' All forces together: 'Viva Pittaluga'" (the general's name). "J'y suis, j'y reste," says the poetic adventurer.

"No worse service could be rendered to the cause we are defending and have defended," says Premier Nitti. The Fiume affair has thus become an issue between common-sense statesmanship and national exaltation, and it is doubtful whether the Minister will be able to hold his own, since the scene of the contest has been shifted from the assembly room to the stage. What will happen if Mr. Nitti does not succeed in having his orders obeyed, if the army sides with the poet, and Fiume remains in the control of the emotional General Pittaluga? The Supreme Council in Paris will suffer in prestige if it submits to thus being faced by a fait accompli. We shall have a new version of the House that Jack built. This is the city that the Italians built. This is the poet who took the city that the Italians built. This is the Minister who reproved the poet who, etc. This is the Council that reproved the Minister who reproved, etc.

THE cold facts the Commissioner of Immigration, Anthony Caminetti, poured on the current hysteria regarding the supposed flood of departing foreigners which was drying up our labor supply settled, at least in part, a question that has vexed business men, students, and journalists. But the interesting question still remains as to who was fooling us in this matter, and how illusions like that arise and spread. Says the Commissioner, 102,513 foreigners have left the United States since the armistice, "an exodus that is perfectly natural" and not in the least exceeding the normal rate. The rumor about the 1,500,000 leaving or preparing to leave our cold and inhospitable shores forever, carrying $5,000,000,000 in cash with them, is hereby returned to lay its head at the door of the Department of Labor, which fathered it. The child really ought to be legitimized.

THE Review can give the heartiest commendation to the movement, now in progress, to complete a $10,000,000 fund for the better equipment of the various benevolent institutions comprised within the Federated Jewish Philanthropies of New York City. What the cause of philanthropy in general owes to Jewish liberality in New York City, no intelligent reader needs to be told. Jewish aid to causes outside the limits of its own faith has been so frequent and so generous that this call for funds for Jewish charities should as a matter of course meet with spontaneous offering of aid across the lines of faith and creed in the opposite direction. Of the various institutions involved, the directors themselves had already subscribed more than three million dollars at the time when the intensive effort to complete the fund began, a few days ago. The pressing need for funds just now grows out of the fact that Jewish benevolence was so largely occupied, since 1914, with the support of special war philanthropies.

MR. BRATIANO, after riding his high horse for some time in the political merry-go-round of the Balkans, has suddenly come a cropper within a day of his Government's refusal to sign the treaty with Austria. The successes of the Rumanian Army in Hungary, leading up to the overthrow of Bela Kun's dictatorship, were likely to swell the head of any petty ruler. And the knowledge that the restoration of the monarchy under Rumanian auspices was not unfavorably viewed by at least some of the Entente Powers must have added to the self-confidence and pride of the Premier at Bucharest. The Rumanian Government, it is true, has disclaimed all responsibility for the usurpation of power by Archduke Joseph, but the Hapsburg could never have made his coup d'état without at least the connivance of the military occupant. The Supreme Council, in its telegram to the Allied mission at Budapest demanding the resignation of Archduke Joseph, gave official support to this suspicion by attributing the formation of the new Hungarian Government to "a coup of a political group under the protection of a foreign army." Mr. Hoover's successful onslaught dealt, consequently, a heavy blow to Mr. Bratiano's prestige. But neither that nor the compulsory retreat of General Mardaresco's troops behind the Tisza River, in obedience to a command from Paris, could shake his complacency. He would show his importance by refusing to be a partner in the signing of the treaty with Austria. He had a good pretext for making himself conspicuous by his absence: Rumania could not brook having it prescribed to her how she was to treat the foreign minorities under her rule. The distinction to be gained by this sulking attitude was slightly impaired by the partnership of the Jugo-Slav state, although, it is true, it modestly disclaimed any prejudice to the treaty. It was only the momentary non-existence of a responsible Government that prevented the nation from being represented at the ceremony.

THE death sentence pronounced upon Dr. August Borms, the Flemish activist leader, is just punishment for his traitorous dealings with the Germans. He took pride in calling himself the Flemish Casement, and went on lecturing tours through Germany as the guest of the "All-Deutscher Verband" and the "Vlämische Gesellschaft," letting himself be fêted while his own countrymen were being deported or cringing under the German heel. He was at the head of the deputation from the Council of Flanders which entered into transactions with von Bethmann Hollweg regarding the partition of Belgium into an autonomous Flanders and an autonomous Wallonia; he followed the hearse of von Bissing to the grave, and was admitted by his patrons to the prisoners' camps in Germany to recruit from among the Belgian soldiers there an activist army of malcontents.

How far he was misled in believing his Flemish people to be in sympathy with such proceedings has been shown by the utter collapse of his activist party. Less than one per cent. of the Flemings followed his leadership; so little did the tenet of pan-Germanism, that similarity or affinity of language naturally constitutes a tie of sympathy or even love between peoples, prove true when put to the test. First to decimate a nation and then to curry favor with the ninety per cent. that have remained alive by an appeal to their affinity of speech is a policy that only a Prussian militarist can expect to be crowned with success. The Flemish people's response to these approaches is tersely summarized in an anecdote told about Professor Paul Fredericq of the University of Ghent, a prominent leader of the Flemish movement, on whom Freiherr von Bissing had reckoned for support of his policy. One day the professor was summoned to appear before the Governor General in Brussels. "Professor," said the Freiherr, addressing the visitor in his native speech, "since the Germans have occupied Belgium I have learned to speak Flemish, as you hear." "Excellence," answered the Fleming in French, "depuis que les Allemands ont occupé la Belgique, moi j'ai oublié le flamand."

AMONG the new items of expense set forth by President Lowell, in connection with the Harvard movement for enlarged endowment, was $15,000 for the physical training of freshmen. The new system, to take effect with this year's entering class, is under the direction of William H. Geer, formerly State Supervisor of Physical Training in New York. It is compulsory in amount, requiring three hours of physical exercise per week, but largely elective as to the particular form for the individual student. Limitations on choice in this respect are those of physical inability to engage with safety in certain forms of athletics, as determined by the preliminary physical examination. The only positive requirement of specific forms of exercise, apparently, will be in those cases in which the physical examination discloses specific defects requiring definite forms of exercise for correction. The freshman physical examinations will be made in the office of Dr. Roger Lee, head of the department of Hygiene, and in all parts of the work Director Geer will have the aid of thoroughly competent assistants, including the 'Varsity football coach, the crew coach, and Norman W. Fradd, who was with the American overseas force, in charge of training battalions for gassed, wounded, and shell-shocked soldiers. To many, the first thought may be of the gain to Harvard intercollegiate teams to be expected from this systematic physical assessment and development of the entire freshman material. It is due to the Harvard authorities, however, to take it in good faith as an effort to obtain the sound body not for victories over Yale and Princeton but as the fit instrument for the sound mind.

IN the death of John Mitchell, in his forty-ninth year, American labor loses a leader of very superior type. The country also loses a useful and respected citizen. Hard at work at an age when the law would now protect his right to be in school, he won his early education as a side issue, by the evening lamp. Though always opposed by the more radical element, he rose high as a labor leader, serving about ten years as President of the United Mine Workers of America, and as Vice-President of the American Federation of Labor. In 1902, he was summoned by President Roosevelt to the White House to meet the rather untractable George F. Baer, and began negotiations which ended in the settlement of the great anthracite coal strike. Mitchell had no love for a strike as such, looking upon it only as a last available resort, when mediation and conciliation failed to do the work which justice seemed to him to demand. He was head, for a time, of the Trade Agreement section of the National Civic Federation, and served also on the New York State Workmen's Commission. During the war, he served as Chairman of the Federal Food Board, and was also at the head of the State Food Administration Board of New York. At the time of his death he was in active service on the Federal Milk Commission. In all these relations he manifested rigid honesty, intelligent insight, great capacity for labor, and strong common sense. With the I. W. W. type of agitator he had nothing in common. If he made use of agitation at any time, it was only to remove what seemed to him obstacles to industrial justice. He may have made mistakes of diagnosis in particular cases, but his purpose was always legitimate, it was never revolutionary.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of

America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

The Situation in the Senate

SINCE the last issue of the Review went to press, the majority and minority reports of the Foreign Relations Committee have been presented to the Senate. It can not be said that the contents of either report have had any influence upon shaping opinion, either in the Senate or the country at large. No new aspect of the controversy was brought to light; no old aspect received fresh illumination. The majority report, besides rehearsing the long-familiar objections to unreserved acceptance of the treaty, ridicules the plea that delay is dangerous to the prospects of the restoration of industry and business to a normal condition. The minority report lays solemn emphasis upon that plea, and declares the objections to unreserved acceptance to be purely factitious. That nothing novel is brought out implies no reproach to either side; it might, however, have been hoped that one or both of the reports would give a new impressiveness or persuasiveness to the case for its view.

But, though the reports have not in themselves made any substantial contribution to the crystallization of opinion, their presentation—or rather the presentation of the majority report—appears to have been the occasion of a noticeable change in the Senatorial alignment. Such appearances are often deceptive, and it would be a great mistake, in the present instance, to regard them as conclusive. But on the face of the news it would seem that a tendency among the Republicans towards union upon a position more radical than that of the moderate reservationists was distinctly manifested after the submission of the report. Senator McCumber's refusal, however, to go the whole way with his fellow-Republicans in the Committee is a landmark of the situation which must be kept in sight. It may be set down as certain that there are several other Senators who stand firmly with him; and it is quite within the probabilities that before the matter comes to a test this nucleus of steady supporters of a temperate and practical course will find a way to present their view in a form that will rally to it strong support. When the moment of actual decision arrives, the temper of the country and the temper of the Senate may well prove to be quite different from that which is evidenced while everything is still at loose ends.

The issue as between the proposal of the moderates and that of the Committee is a vital one. Not only do the moderates propose no overt amendment to the treaty, but in framing the reservations they have taken scrupulous care to make them, in both form and substance, as unobjectionable as possible to the other signatories of the treaty. On the other hand, the Committee has proposed amendments which would vitally alter the treaty, and has worded two of the reservations in language made unnecessarily offensive apparently out of pure wantonness, while the most important of them—that relating to Article X—can hardly be understood otherwise than as outright annulment. The difference between the two positions is in effect all the difference between acceptance and rejection of the treaty.

It is true that even the course proposed by the moderates involves the possibility of difficulty as to the final consummation of the settlement. No one can say just what processes will have to be gone through to make all safe after a ratification of which any reservations form an integral part. The doctors disagree; but common sense seems clearly to point to the conclusion that, where an end is intensely desired and urgently needed by all parties, no great difficulty will be found in securing assent to a demand highly important to one of them, and comparatively indifferent to the rest. It appears to-day, and it has appeared all along, that there are practically only two courses before the country. Either we shall get together upon something very like the plan proposed by the moderate reservationists, or we shall not get together at all.

The Real Issue at Boston

THE question at issue in the Boston police strike is one that goes to the very heart of our national life. It is a question that is going to present itself in a hundred forms in the period of stress through which it seems only too clear that the country is bound to pass before things settle down to a condition of equilibrium. The question is whether the citizens of a commonwealth of freemen owe to the commonwealth as a whole a paramount allegiance, or whether they may at any moment throw off that allegiance and pursue their own special purposes regardless of the claims of public law and the public safety.

For it is not the state of mind of the policemen themselves that chiefly makes the affair at Boston an occasion for grave solicitude. It is the state of mind of the people at large. If we have lost that instinct of loyalty which should cause the whole community to be instantly shocked by the spectacle of the appointed guardians of the law deliberately attempting to paralyze the government of which they are the physical arm, then the whole structure of our laws and our government has lost its only secure foundation. It is upon that instinct of loyalty, and nothing else, that democratic institutions, in the last resort, can rest. Without it, they can not survive any really serious strain; and that ours are going to be subjected to very serious strain in the near future there is every reason to believe.

Undoubtedly the eyes of the people of Boston were opened to the immediate significance of the policemen's revolt as soon as its consequences of shocking lawlessness and anarchy set in, and they set in very soon. Undoubtedly, too, a majority of the population felt at once that the strike was an intolerable offense against the first principles of government. But the fact that it took place at all is conclusive evidence that a very considerable part of the population had no such feeling. Had there not been an atmosphere favorable to it in a large element of the community, the idea of the strike could not have been seriously entertained by the policemen themselves.

The issue precipitated in so gross a form at Boston is one which, in forms less palpable but by no means less serious, the American people will be called upon to confront in many directions. It is quite certain that they have not, even under the stress of present-day confusions and excitements, drifted so far away from their moorings that they will fail to grapple with it firmly when the question of order or anarchy is put before them in a shape so simple and direct as that of the outbreak of criminality and disorder at Boston. But it is not so certain that they will adequately realize what is at stake when sinister consequences are less obvious and less immediate, though the principle involved is the same. Upon those who bear any share in the formation of public sentiment, no duty is more imperatively laid to-day than that of strengthening the hold upon the people of the essential principles of government; and upon those who have coquetted with notions that are subversive of these principles rests a heavy responsibility.

These misleaders of opinion do not call themselves anarchists—though, as we have had occasion to point out, one of the most conspicuous of them recently came out in an explicit advocacy of anarchy as a goal to be striven for, and to be reached in a fairly near future. What they do is to cast all possible discredit upon the existing order, without incurring the odium of actually proposing its destruction; to ignore or belittle what established institutions do for us and to magnify what they fail to do; to shut their eyes to the history of the hard-won progress of the past and to represent as the simplest thing in the world the realization of roseate visions of imagined progress in the future. Upon immature or undisciplined minds, the natural consequences of a prolonged course of this kind of teaching is to produce the feeling that government as we know it is, if not an absolute evil, at least a thing to which we owe only a feeble or temporary allegiance.

It is possible that the experiences at Boston will have the effect of recalling many who have lightly allowed themselves to fall into this frame of mind to a sober realization of the vital facts of the social order. That order has not been created by mere contrivance; it is not the result of the happy thoughts of a few clever lawmakers or philosophers. Society is held together by sentiments that have grown up in the course of ages, and that have become almost as instinctive and as deep-seated as the feelings of parent for child or of child for parent. It is full of conflicting interests and jarring passions—interests and passions of classes as well as of individuals; and it goes on with tranquility and harmony because, on the whole, everybody acknowledges that the authority of law and government is superior to the claims of these interests and passions. Laws and forms of government are, to be sure, subject to change; and from these changes may come great benefits. But all the benefits that can come from any specific changes which, humanly speaking, can be looked upon as possible, are of trifling importance in comparison with those benefits which the mere existence of law and government—the mere acknowledgment of their supreme authority—is silently conferring upon us all the time, and of which we are usually as unconscious as of the air we breathe. The time was—and that not at all long ago—when all this was a truism; but the time has come when it has to be asserted as a militant principle. It must be made plain that no such defiance of the first principles of government as is involved in the attitude of the striking policemen will be tolerated by the American people.

Labor and Capital to Talk it Over

AS we move nearer to the conference between representatives of labor and capital, which the President has called for October 6, the sense of its importance increases. If the conference in the end should accomplish nothing, the manner in which the mere prospect of such a thing has been received on all sides would testify to the existence of a very general desire that labor and capital should at this time make every effort to get together on a human and enlightened plane. Continued warfare between belly and members is not merely destructive; it is ridiculous. For all to go down to destruction together is bad enough, but to do so through stupidity and selfishness is far worse. But this conference can not possibly end in mere negation; it can do good, perhaps a great deal of good, or it can do harm and also, quite possibly, a great deal of harm. The result will depend on the men who are to compose it and on the spirit in which they address themselves to its delicate and difficult problems.

So far as it has been indicated the constitution of the conference leaves something to be desired. Something like a fairly representative body may eventually be convened but it can not be said that the method of its selection is by any means certain to produce that result. Of the forty-five members, five are to be appointed by the National Industrial Conference Board and five by the United States Chamber of Commerce. So far, so good. But the farmers, who represent a good half of the production of the country, appear at the conference with only three spokesmen, but one more than the Investment Bankers' Association, who seem to have very little justification, if any at all, for participating in the discussion. The important industries of transportation and of mining, on the board, fare worse than agriculture; they have no representatives at all. Labor is officially represented only by the American Federation of Labor, which has as many delegates, fifteen, as the combined groups already mentioned. But the many shop organizations and the vast body of unorganized labor, together greatly surpassing the Federation in numbers, though not in power, go unrepresented.

There is, however, one point at which it is possible to make or break the conference. In the President's hands lies the choice of fifteen delegates, a third of the whole number. Here is the opportunity somewhat to redress whatever lack of balance the make-up of the conference may then show. But more important still, from this group are most likely to come the men who shall be capable of directing the conference to wise and constructive action, the men who can create its atmosphere of intelligent good will and generous coöperation towards attainable ends. Men of vision they must be, but men also who are capable of interpreting in a rational manner what it is they see.

The kind of man who takes in all seriousness Mr. Lloyd George's preëlection vision of a "new world, where labor shall have its just reward and only indolence shall suffer want," which is to supplant an old world "scarred by slums, disgraced by sweating, where unemployment, through the vicissitudes of industry, brought despair to multitudes of humble homes, a world where, side by side with want there was waste of the inexhaustible riches of the earth, partly through ignorance and want of forethought, partly through entrenched selfishness," will not be a very helpful member of the conference. He might in all fairness be allowed a voice, but it should come a long way this side of being a controlling voice, because he has nothing to contribute to the ends for which the conference is organized. His object is quite other: to destroy this world that exists, the much hard-won good, along with the very considerably remediable bad. To a question what he is going to make the new world out of when he has destroyed the old, he has no answer save a pitying smile. Enough for him to echo Miranda's cry, "Oh brave new world!" and, presumably, it will somehow appear.

If, therefore, the President is fortunate in his selection of men who at once see the limits as well as the yet unrealized power of human industry, and if they in turn are so fortunate as to meet with representatives of labor who come to consult on ways of bettering a situation by no means hopeless and not to deliver an ultimatum, October 6 may yet come to be regarded as the birthday of a world, which by its courageous and enlightened acceptance of what man has already achieved for himself, coupled with an increasingly intelligent desire to improve the conditions to which step by step he has worked his way up from savagery, may so transform itself as to deserve, in long retrospect, to be called indeed "new."

Cardinal Mercier

WHEN General Pershing, leading the parade on Wednesday of last week, arrived at the grand stand in front of St. Patrick's Cathedral, he dismounted to accept a bouquet of roses from a pretty Knights of Columbus worker, who was thanked by the General with a kiss. It was then that some one told the hero of the day that Cardinal Mercier was on the stand, and he forthwith went over to salute him. There they stood, face to face, the wielders of the sword and of the cross, joint victors in their war for right and freedom. That the Cardinal's presence was revealed to the General almost by accident is significant of the quiet, unobtrusive manner in which the prelate fought his war against the enemy. All the attention of the world was riveted on the deeds of the men of action; the heroism of the battlefield held the public in suspense, and the roses which pretty hands gathered when the victory was won were for the brave warrior who had faced death in the trenches. But this Christian warrior had faced worse than personal annihilation—the death of all faith and hope in the hearts of the flock entrusted to his charge. To fight that ally of the Prussian, the people's despair, systematically reinforced by the enemy with all the devilish powers of terrorism, deportation, and starvation, demanded from the shepherd a constant heroism of the soul transcending the courage of the fighting soldier.

Désiré Joseph, Cardinal Mercier, Archbishop of Malines, was in the occupied territory of Belgium the embodiment of the nation's resolve never to stoop to the oppressor. Before the self-contained power of this physically weak, emaciate man with the sharp, thin features, the German satrap, Freiherr von Bissing, was forced to yield. Against his strength of soul physical force could not prevail. When in January, 1915, the Cardinal had incensed the despot in Brussels by some utterances in a pastoral letter to his people, which was read in all the churches of his diocese on the first Sunday of the new year, Bissing sent an officer to Malines to demand from the prelate the retraction of the offensive passages. But Cardinal Mercier maintained his right as a Belgian to give utterance to his Belgian feelings, and refused to withdraw a single word. "When on August 2, 1914, a foreign Power, trusting to force and forgetful of its treaty oath, dared violate our independence . . ." were the words that had especially roused the ire of the Governor-General. A German guard at the entrance of the Episcopal Palace was the Prussian argument to disprove the truth of that statement. But Freiherr von Bissing was given to understand by his diplomatic adviser Baron von der Lancken that this attempt against the personal liberty of the Monsignore was contrary to the policy which aimed at winning the hearts of the Flemish people by a show of respect to the Catholic Church. For it is among the Flemish half of the Belgian nation that the Catholic clergy has almost absolute sway. In the Walloon districts, on the other hand, with their coal mines and large industrial centres, socialism prevails. And as the Germans, at that time, were naïvely hoping to bring about a schism between Walloon and Flemish Belgium by holding up to Flanders the bait of autonomy under a German protectorate, they reckoned on the support of the clergy, whose lead the Flemish people were sure to follow. So the guard was withdrawn from the Archbishop's door; but to screen his defeat the Governor issued an order to the priests of the diocese of Malines in which he mendaciously gave out that His Eminence regretted the effect caused by his pastoral and no longer insisted on its being read on following Sundays. The lie was immediately overtaken by the Cardinal's denial: "Neither verbally nor in writing have I withdrawn any, and I do not now withdraw any, of my former instructions, and I protest against the violence done to the liberty of my pastoral ministry."

A year later a similar passage at arms took place in which, again, the man of the cross proved the stronger of the two. His Eminence preached a Lenten sermon which incurred the wrath of the Governor. His secretary Monsignore Loncin and the publisher of the sermon were arrested. But the Cardinal himself the tyrant dared not touch. Nor could the words of comfort he had spoken to his people be arrested on their way from mouth to mouth: "In recognition of the moral truth that justice passes force, you have sacrificed your possessions, your homes, your sons, your husbands, and, after eighteen months of suppression, you remain proud of your deed as you were on the first day. And all over the world your self-abnegation is understood and admired. . . . Still from the very beginning I have made you feel that I foresaw a long time of trial. But the natural and supranatural conviction that the ultimate victory will be ours is anchored in my soul deeper than ever."

That anchorage has remained firm to the last, through the heaviest of storms. Though in many a blast the ship of his conviction was shaken, it was never swept off its moorings. By constant exhortation, by the example of his own unbending spirit, by the devout expression of his faith in God, he sustained his weak, his almost dying people. Of all the figures whose greatness the war has revealed to the world, Cardinal Mercier seems to us the most imposing.

"I have come to thank America for what she has done for Belgium," were the first words which His Eminence spoke on setting foot on land. Our debt to him is greater than Belgium's debt to us. For he has given to us, as to all the world, a matchless example of moral strength and courage, to keep alive our faith in the power of good over evil.

The Apologies of Ludendorff and von Tirpitz

"WE were steeped in illusions about our enemies, the nature of their war aims, their conduct of the war, and the nature of the economic war," says Admiral von Tirpitz in the opening paragraphs of his memoirs, now in course of publication by a syndicate of American newspapers. General Ludendorff's vision is still sadly dimmed by one of these illusions when he repeats, in his story of the war, the childish statement that America simply did not understand, that she had never really known Germany in time of peace, and was misled into opposition by viewing all the events of the earlier period of the war through the glasses of Entente propaganda. It might be well for the German universities to send over some of their matchless experts in quantitative research and have a tabulation made of the contents of American newspapers during the period when American opinion was getting its bearings on the war. The result would show that the decision was hampered by no lack of amplified and oft-repeated statement of the German point of view. In fact, Germany suffered in American opinion not because she was kept from stating her case, but because she stated it all too clearly. For even her deliberate misstatements, with the interpretative comment of her actions, let the fundamental truth shine plainly through.

Admirals and generals, the Kaiser and his chosen counselors, may look this way and that for someone else upon whom to lay the blame for the lack of success of a work so long and so minutely planned. History will not charge it to individual errors in execution, but will find for it a deeper and broader basis in the fact that Germany, misled by the host of self-induced illusions which Von Tirpitz so readily admits, had thrown herself squarely across the main current of modern political progress. In such a contest a final success was impossible from the outset. A delay of the disaster could only increase its violence and completeness, and the advice of a von Tirpitz, heeded or unheeded, could play no fundamentally important rôle.

It must be said for the Admiral that he had some sense of the danger to Germany lurking in the ruthless use of submarines at the start. His desire was for a less spectacular beginning and a gradual working up to the point where outside opinion would have received with less shock such deeds as the sinking of the Lusitania. But after the blunder of the Lusitania had been committed, there should have been no further hesitation. Germany should boldly have maintained the legality of the act, he thinks, and gone vigorously on. His assertion that American expressions of indignation at the act were largely bluff merely illustrates how impervious to the thoughts and feelings of others the callousness of Prussianism had rendered the German leaders. The reply to President Wilson's note on the sinking of the Sussex, he says, "was the beginning of our capitulation. . . . By promising to indemnify the families of the victims of the torpedoing of the Sussex, we showed the world that we were going down before America. . . . By spurning at that time the salvation of submarine warfare Germany signed away her birthright as one of the great powers. In fact, the record of the war is a record of one lost opportunity after another for Germany to wrest from England a satisfactory peace." But after the weakening of 1916, "It is impossible for me to make up my mind," he says, "whether, if the responsibility had been left to me, and I had known all the facts, I still would have waged the submarine war in 1917. As an actual fact, at that time I had an instinctive feeling that it was too late, but I allowed myself to be convinced by those in high office that it must be risked."

All this is only one of many proofs that the men at the top in Germany knew even then that the game was lost, as things stood, and were ready to try any desperate gambler's chance rather than face the consequences of admitting defeat. For it was evident even then, to all who saw beneath the surface, that foremost among those consequences would be the ruin of the Hohenzollerns and their entire governmental machine. With the masses of Germany, loyalty to Kaiserism was largely a matter of the good things of this world which it promised. With its confessed inability to make good, the bond could hold no longer. But the affection of Admiral von Tirpitz for the Hohenzollerns continues, and he looks with a wholly pessimistic eye upon the republican experiment. In the emphasis of rights rather than duties, in the unwillingness to admit that real benefit to the individual can come only through living primarily for the state, he can see no pathway to national elevation. "I can not but fear," he says, "that Germany has lost her last chance of rising to the position of a real Power." Nor does he find hope in the thought of possible estrangement between England and America. "I can not foresee any serious antagonism between the two great Anglo-Saxon Powers."

A correspondent in one of the dailies likens the memoirs of these two German commanders to the Commentaries of Cæsar and Xenophon's Anabasis, but he wisely omits specifications. Neither the simple charm of Xenophon's smoothly flowing narrative nor the quick energy and directness of that of Cæsar have any counterpart here. What the inspiring power to repeat the Roman's "Veni, vidi, vici" might have done for the style of either of them, the world fortunately will never know. But in their attempts to shift the responsibility for disaster from their own shoulders, these memoirs may perform a much needed service. For they are sure to draw a heavy cannonade of rejoinder, and from the entire mass of controversy the truth that Germany's course was one stupendous blunder from beginning to end, and not a rational plan thwarted by avoidable blunders of detail, will at last work its way effectively into the consciousness of the German masses. And herein lies the necessary cornerstone for the rebuilding of Germany's position in the world.

A German Version of Archduke Joseph's Coup

THE story of Archduke Joseph's recent strange coup d'état is still enveloped in mystery. What were the forces on whose support he could rely in usurping power over the Hungarian state? The French papers, at the time, were particularly insistent on it that the unexpected return of the Hapsburg régime in the eastern half of the old Dual Monarchy had not been brought about by the Rumanians. Their knowledge of the event did not go beyond this negative statement. The Petit Journal, the organ of Minister Pichon, couched its comment on the news from Budapest in the following cautious terms:

The Allies can only state the fact of the archduke's appearance at the head of the Government. They will have to await his actions. The course of events will probably compel them to enter into negotiations with him concerning the settlement of current affairs. But they will recognize him definitively and officially only in case of a majority of the country giving him its support.

Were the men in power at Paris actually so completely ignorant of what had really happened as the Petit Journal would have one believe? If so, the representatives of the Great Powers in Budapest either gave their benediction to the coup d'état on their own initiative, or allowed the Archduke to take the decisive step without any interference on their part. They were, at any rate, duly consulted by the Hapsburg aspirant to power before he entered upon his adventurous move. His first step on arriving at Budapest, whither a military deputation from the newly formed militia had invited him to come, was to call upon the several Entente missions. "The upshot of his negotiations with them," said the Hungarian Correspondence Bureau at the time, "was the archduke's decision to take upon himself the solution of the political crisis."

In view of the scarcity of facts that are allowed by official quarters to come to the knowledge of the public, it is of some interest to hear what the German comments were on the development of this mysterious revolution. They are, of course, not at all to be taken at their face value; but they may possibly help to throw some light on an extremely obscure phase of recent history.

There is first a statement, made by the Berliner Zeitung am Mittag, according to which negotiations had been conducted in Switzerland between British agents and Emperor Karl concerning a possible restoration of the personal union between German Austria and Hungary. The plan was to appoint the former Emperor King of Hungary, and meanwhile stir up a monarchist movement in German Austria. The plan was frustrated by the refusal of the Emperor, who saw in the arrangement a personal degradation to which he would not submit. Not until the idea of a Danube Federation had been realized would he consent, he declared, to return to power. Archduke Joseph, however, was found willing to take his place in Hungary provisionally, which he was to cede to the ex-Emperor when the Entente should have succeeded in constituting that federation. The Berlin paper accounted for the wish of the Entente to restore the monarchy of the Hapsburgs by the fear of France of a union of German Austria with Germany.

The Berliner Tageblatt confirmed this last statement: "The new Danube Federation, under Entente control, was to serve as an instrument wherewith to weaken the German Empire." The editor, Theodor Wolff, who has long borne the repute of a reliable and conscientious writer, called the Entente's support of Archduke Joseph the reward for his misconduct in the battle of the Piave, "where Austria was beaten because the Archduke withdrew his Hungarian divisions from the field."

Vorwärts, though it saw in the Hapsburg revolution not an anti-German but an anti-socialist move, agreed with the other Berlin papers in believing some of the Entente missions to have been the wire-pullers behind the scene. "The capitalist governments of the Entente are on the alert to expel the organized workers everywhere from the powerful position they have gained by the revolution. To attain that end they are willing to join hands with the recently dethroned and, up to now, hostile dynasties, and they find in reckless Communist adventures such as the dictatorship of Bela Kun a welcome pretext for making such a volte-face."

In the absence of any proof it is impossible to decide whether this representation of the event, given by German papers of various political convictions, was solely due to the German prejudices which their editors have in common or had some degree of foundation in the facts. An authoritative statement of the relation between Mr. Hoover's protest and the final action of the Versailles Council demanding Joseph's retirement—whether, namely, that protest caused, or merely accelerated, the Council's action, or whether the two events merely happened to come so close together—would do much to clear up the mystery.

The Demand for Withdrawal From Siberia

PUBLIC opinion is much confused as to the situation in Russia and our proper policy with reference to it. In general it may be assumed that the vast majority of right-minded people look with abhorrence upon the Bolshevik Government and what it represents. They sympathize with the efforts which patriotic Russians are making to drive out the brutal, German-inspired tyranny that has ruined their land, and to restore the national Russian state, for they are coming to understand how essential this is for the future peace of the world. They are still a trifle uneasy as to the aims and purposes of the Omsk Government, for the flood of anti-Kolchak propaganda has not been without some effect. But what they do not see is that we should take any part in this movement or interfere in any way in what they consider to be the domestic concern of the Russian people. This feeling is voiced in the insistent demand that American troops be withdrawn from Siberia, and certain Senators have found this a popular and responsive chord to strike and a vulnerable point at which to attack the Administration.

Since the war is over as far as we are concerned, it is not without reason that they ask by what right and for what purpose over 8,000 American troops are maintained in Eastern Siberia. To answer the question requires a brief survey of the situation and the steps in our policy that led up to it. An examination will show that we had a good reason for sending the troops there and that the question of withdrawing them is not so simple as it might appear, but is bound up with and complicated by weighty considerations pertaining to our general policy in the Far East. The occasion for sending our troops to Vladivostok in the first place was the obligation to come to the succor of our allies, the Czechoslovaks, then at war with our enemies and threatened with destruction by armies of German-led Bolsheviks. The need was imperative and we could not in honor refuse. We did, however, delay considerably, pending the conclusion of protracted negotiations with Japan, whom we suspected of ulterior designs, but we finally came to an agreement whereby both countries were to send expeditions of specified size, and accordingly a force of American soldiers was landed at Vladivostok.

At this point, however, the American policy becomes difficult to understand. It was announced that the purpose of the American troops was to guard the rear of the Czechoslovaks, and that they were therefore to remain at Vladivostok.

This was, of course, absurd, for the 15,000 Czechoslovaks at Vladivostok needed no guarding; they were abundantly able to take care of themselves. But the 40,000 west of Irkutsk were in grave danger. They were in desperate straits for arms and munitions, and a powerful and well-armed force intervened between them and their fellow-soldiers at Vladivostok. As a matter of fact, these brave men finally succeeded in breaking through and making their way eastward without our assistance. So they owed us no gratitude, for the instructions to our troops prevented them from going to their aid.

Meanwhile, the people of Siberia and Eastern Russia, thanks to the Czechoslovaks, had been able to throw off the Bolshevik yoke. They welcomed the arrival of the Americans and believed that they were coming to aid them. They had good grounds for such a belief, for it had been announced that one of the purposes was to stabilize the efforts of the Russians to establish their government, and they had been faithful to the Allies and were fighting against the Germans and the German-led Bolsheviks on the Volga front. They saw clearly that if we helped them maintain the struggle on this front it would improve the situation on the western front in France. But when this help did not come and the American troops remained inactive in Vladivostok, wide currency was given to the belief that they had been sent there, not to aid the Russian people, but merely to guard vast stores of supplies in which America had a financial interest. Meanwhile, Japanese troops aided the Czechoslovaks and Russians and cleared the Amur Valley of Bolshevik bands.

Another unfortunate situation arose. Apparently under instructions from Washington, General Graves, the American commander, assumed what was termed an attitude of "neutrality" with reference to Russian "factions." This, of course, meant neutrality as between Bolsheviks and anti-Bolsheviks. In the meantime, the Russians had united in setting up a government of all Siberia at Omsk. The decent people of Vladivostok, of course, gave their hearty support, but the town was filled with transient Bolsheviks and German agents, who made strenuous efforts to incite rebellion against the central Government. Our people seemed unable to understand this and appeared to maintain that any community had a right to determine its own government and allegiance independently of the Siberian authorities. The effect of this policy was to protect the Bolsheviks and afford them a refuge, while our military zone became a vantage ground on which they could agitate without hindrance and from which they could launch marauding expeditions. It is not strange, therefore, that the people of Siberia came to regard the Americans as the supporters of their enemies, and a strong anti-American feeling grew up, a feeling which was encouraged by the Japanese. So strong, indeed, did this feeling become that the Omsk Government felt impelled to intimate very plainly that it did not wish any American troops sent westward.

Nevertheless, after an inter-Allied agreement had been reached with reference to the Transsiberian railway, a quota of American troops was sent to do duty as guards along the line east of Irkutsk. Here again their instructions, which limited them to a narrow zone on either side of the railroad, made their work dangerous and ineffective, while the policy of "neutrality" brought about a situation in which open conflicts were narrowly averted.

The upshot of the whole situation is that the American expedition to Siberia has been a lamentable failure. We have given no aid to the Russian people in stabilizing their efforts to set up their government, but rather have hindered them and have won for America general suspicion and dislike. As far as the Omsk Government is concerned, the withdrawal of our troops would be a relief, save for one consideration. They are, to be sure, employed at present in guarding a section of the railroad, but other troops could perform this service as well. Yet if we withdraw, we leave the whole situation in the hands of Japan. From the day our troops leave, the Japanese will be in complete control of the railway from Vladivostok to Irkutsk, and the All-Russian Government at Omsk will be entirely at their mercy. The Omsk Government will be obliged to come to terms with them and adjust its policy to their aims. The withdrawal of American troops from Siberia, therefore, is not merely a matter of policy as between Bolsheviks and anti-Bolsheviks. The real issue is whether we shall scuttle the ship and let Japan salvage it. To do so will relieve homesick boys and anxious parents, and give great satisfaction to the radical agitators who are playing the German-Bolshevik game, but it will have a mighty influence on all our future relations with Russia, when the present chaos has passed and she comes back into her own as a national state and a great European Power. And meanwhile, we are not absolved from the pledge of support and assistance to Admiral Kolchak and his associates given by the Conference at Paris.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Italy's Point of View

THE Governments of France, England, and the United States have had Italy by the throat at the Peace Conference. The situation has been plain enough; Italy is to-day immediately dependent upon the Allies, and particularly upon the United States, for financial assistance, for food supplies, and for the coal and raw materials required by her industries; consequently, they can force her to sign eventually any peace which they choose to dictate.

It will be remembered that England and France showed themselves humble enough in 1915, when cap in hand they sought Italy's saving intervention in the war; and the primary consideration which they sincerely urged upon her then was her vital interest in the Adriatic. "Italy has certainly need of possessing this second lung in order to breathe normally," declared the London Times on March 25, 1915. "There is not a single Italian patriot who does not understand that the question of the Adriatic takes precedence over every other in his country and can be solved only through her intervention," pleaded her later arch-enemy Gouvain in the Journal des Débats of February 4, 1915.

Indeed, as early as August 27, 1914, the London Times had issued an appeal to Italy for the liberation from Austrian domination of "the Italians of Dalmatia and Istria."

Italy entered the war on May 24, 1915, entered "in the cause of civilization and justice;" and the assistance which she subsequently rendered the Allies by offering up 460,000 of her best citizens and from seventy to eighty per cent. of her national wealth alone made possible the common victory over the Central Empires. She risked freely all that she had, trusting in the honor of England and France to secure that for which her heroes were giving their lives—a just and permanent peace in Europe, with the completion and future security of Italian national territory. Now that the victory has been won and that she is completely in the power of the Allies, what is their policy towards her? If the Nation is to be believed in its statement of May 3, "they made up their minds some time ago to cut her adrift by the first of October and let her sink or swim, survive or perish, from that time on. . . . How can she refuse to sign the peace?" The answer is quite simple: She can not refuse.

But is the policy of coercion of a faith-fully ally wise? Leaving aside considerations of their international honor and integrity, in the name of which the great war was fought, is it desirable that England and France—with their associate the United States—should force

Italy to sign a peace which she believes to be manifestly unjust in her regard? She may well recall Mr. Wilson's statement of February 11, 1918: "Nothing settled by force, if settled wrong, is settled at all. It will presently have to be re-opened."

Italy's claims have been frankly stated from the outset, and consistently maintained. Sonnino's declaration in Parliament on June 20, 1917, is a characteristically honest exposition of her position, setting it forth as in full harmony with the international principles laid down by the Allies: "Our aspirations are for liberty and security, both for ourselves and for others. We have no desire to acquire frontiers that would constitute a menace to a neighbor or a peril to anyone, but simply frontiers that will serve as a bulwark for the independence of our country and a guarantee of its pacific civic progress." In other words, Italy means to have frontiers that will assure her at least a minimum of safety, rendering normal disarmament possible and enabling her people to go about the business of life without constant preoccupation over the danger of surprise and attempts at domination on the part of their neighbors. No one can deny Italy's right to have such frontiers, and she hopes to obtain them by the treaty of peace now under discussion. If, however, she should be forced to sign the peace without them, she believes that it would simply mean that the question "will presently have to be re-opened." So it was after the peace "settled wrong" in 1859. So it was after the peace "settled wrong" in 1866. Mr. Wilson believes that we are "living in a new world"—but the eternal course of justice does not change.

The minimum frontiers to which Italy has a right for purposes of self-defense were exactly determined by the English, French, Russian, and Italian Governments in 1915, and the decision was then recorded in a secret document known as the Treaty of London, which gave definite assurances. Mr. Wilson, however, has a particular aversion to secret diplomacy and secret treaties, unless he himself has been in the secret—though he has made an exception of the secret Japanese treaty with the Allies, of 1917, which secures great concessions to Japan in China, against China's sovereign will. Mr. Wilson, therefore, put his veto upon the Treaty of London—although on February 11, 1918, he had declared that the United States had "no desire to act as arbiter in European territorial disputes." But even if this binding document is to be treated as a scrap of paper, the fact remains recorded in it that England and France recognized in 1915 the justice of Italy's present claims.

What has induced the recent radical changes in policy of France and England towards Italy with regard to the Adriatic? For it is generally known that Mr. Wilson has not stood alone in contesting Italy's rights at the Peace Conference, but that his opposition has been supported, if not inspired, by Clémenceau and Lloyd George. If the Allies called upon Italy to liberate the Italians of Istria and Dalmatia in 1914, why should they now seek to prevent these Italians, finally liberated, after immeasurable sacrifice, from becoming citizens of the Mother Country? It is not without interest in this connection to recall certain historic declarations made in past phases of Franco-Italian relations. At the time of Garibaldi's famous expedition of the Thousand in 1860, Prince Napoleon maintained that from the French point of view Italian unity was not desirable: "A nation of twenty-five millions of men (to-day forty millions), grouped together under a powerful dynasty at the doors of France, frightened him; the influence which France had long exercised over the Latin races would suffer cruelly from it. He wished an Italy divided into three kingdoms, one at the north, one at the centre, and a third at the south." Such was the view of the Government of the Second Empire: a united and strong Italy was contrary to the interests of France. Nor was the downright policy of the future leader of the French Republic different; on March 4, 1867, Thiers declared in the French Chamber: "Had I enjoyed the honor of directing the destinies of France when this question arose, I would have employed all the force at my disposal to prevent Italian unity."

One can not believe that a similar aversion to a strong Italy prevails among the majority of the French people to-day, yet the position taken by Clémenceau at the Peace Conference would clearly indicate this attitude on the part of the French Government; and that this is its attitude is the common belief in Italy. The French people must realize that a strong Italy would have saved them from Germany in 1870, that a strong Italy did save them from Germany in 1914 and 1915, and that if they are skeptical as to the efficacy of a League of Nations as a panacea for all international evils, a strong and friendly Italy will be an invaluable bulwark against the enemies of France in the future.

But it has been said that Italy's claims for national defense are exaggerated. Can this charge be maintained? The general staff of the Italian Navy, composed of officers of the highest ability and integrity, have clearly demonstrated to the Peace Conference, as they believe, that Sebenico and a certain number of the Dalmatian islands indicated in the Treaty of London are essential to the security of Italy in the Adriatic. These naval officers have borne the heavy responsibility of directing Italian naval defense, characterized by some of the most brilliant achievements of the World War, for over three years. Do you now charge them with ignorance, or bad faith, in their claims? In one of the "technical" discussions held in Paris regarding Italian claims in the Adriatic, the American "expert," a smug professor of one of our great universities, who had been dressed up in khaki as a major, declared that the American delegation was very well informed upon the questions under debate; it had been studying them for three months. "Indeed," replied the Italian naval officer, Italy's "expert," who had served for three years during the war in command of a cruiser in the Adriatic, "we have been studying them for two thousand years." One may be permitted to ask whether in questions of sea power it is usual to submit to the decisions of other nations issues of vital national defense? Who decides whether Gibraltar shall belong to Spain or Great Britain? And Malta? Have the French submitted the future of Djibouti to the League of Nations? Is the United States ready, at the dictation of an international tribunal, to relinquish to a European power her dominating influence in Cuba?

But, say those who hold Italy by the throat, Italy claims Fiume, which is not designated as Italian in the Treaty of London; its hinterland is Slav; and the claims of Italy both in Fiume and in the zone of naval defense embracing Zara and Sebenico and the Dalmatian islands are in conflict with the claims of the Yugoslavs. The truth is, however, that Fiume, the vast majority of whose population is Italian, has of its own initiative declared its annexation to Italy—this by the right of self-determination. The immediate hinterland is certainly Slav, and is not claimed by Italy. The vast commercial hinterland, however, served by the port, is for the most part not Slav, but Hungarian and Czechoslovak; and the Hungarian trade interests at Fiume, which concern principally agricultural produce, will be much safer in the hands of the Italians than in those of a competing agricultural nation like Yugoslavia. In 1912, to the commerce of Fiume the Yugoslavs themselves contributed but 13 per cent.; for their own commerce they have abundant port facilities and opportunity for extensive further port expansion on the Slav coast, both close by Fiume, and to the south where most of the small Slav export trade would originate. No valid reason, therefore, can be adduced for denying to Fiume its right of self-determination, or for depriving Italy of Fiume, which is essential to the commercial unity of the Istrian peninsula.

In regard to the claims of the Yugoslavs, as Lord Cecil declared in Parliament on May 22, 1918, "there is no incompatibility between the aspirations of Italy and those of Yugoslavia"—meaning, of course, between their just aspirations. To Italy's honest efforts to harmonize her claims with those of Yugoslavia the records of the Congress of Rome bear witness. But the Yugoslav delegates have been false to their pledges there given; they shamelessly intrigued against Italy prior to the Peace Conference, and after having solemnly pledged themselves to respect Italy's "vital interests" of territorial defense and the rights of nationality, they have extended their own claims to include even Trieste and Gorizia. Trumbic declared on June 18, 1918, that the Slav troops "would not fight to save Austria." How mistaken was his assurance may be gathered from the bulletins of the Austrian general staff upon the fiercely fought battle of Vittorio Veneto, in which many Yugoslav regiments are cited by name as having fought with singular gallantry; in the fleet the Yugoslavs were equally faithful to Austria. The committee of Yugoslav émigrés which was intriguing with the Allies thus proved to have comparatively little following among its own people, of whom the vast majority desired only independence under a triple Austro-Hungarian-Slav monarchy, for which declared end they fought fiercely against the Allies to the last—even against their "brothers," the Serbs.

If the Allies fought for the cause of liberty and justice against Germany, they fought for the same cause against the Yugoslavs (Croats and Slovenes) who faithfully supported Germany until the great Italian victory of Vittorio Veneto brought the overwhelming finale. Yet it is by the unjust claims of Yugoslavia that the rights of Italy are contested. For the Allied cause Italy raised a fighting force equal to over 13 per cent. of her total population, a percentage greater than that reached by England, France, or the United States. Yet you would reward Italy with injustice in order that you may give a premium to the Yugoslavs, two-thirds of whose composite and unstable nationality, to the last hour of the world conflict, continued to sacrifice their lives for the cause of the Central Empires. If this be justice, we now live in a new world, indeed!

No country in Europe has been more sincerely favorable to a League of Nations than Italy—but a League of Nations founded upon justice, guaranteeing truly national frontiers and equitably distributing colonial mandates, not a League whose deliberations are a series of compromises dictated in the interest of the most powerful. "To this point has the logic of ambition brought Mr. Wilson," observes the Corriere della Sera, voicing in its issue of July 23 the bitterness that is in Italy's heart. "He has said 'Yes' to Japan because she is great and strong. He has said 'No' with regret to China, which is great but weak. He has said 'No' without any scruple whatever to Fiume, which is weak and small."

H. NELSON GAY

Rome, August 5

The Socialist Reaction

AMERICAN Socialism as a constructive force touched its highest point in the national convention of 1912 at Indianapolis. That convention was faced by a party crisis. The cult of "direct" action, sponsored by the I. W. W., had won many proselytes; and the term had come again to mean what it had meant forty years before, in the days of Bakunin. In its extreme form it meant, negatively, contempt for government and abstention from political effort, and positively, reliance upon conspiracy, sabotage, and destruction. In its milder forms it meant anything the individual chose to read into it. Numbers of professed Socialists had caught the contagion, and they succeeded in making themselves felt and heard in the convention.

The left displayed a fairly well-organized front. Of course, not all its members—perhaps not even half—were extreme "direct" actionists. The faction included persons of every degree of gradation from propagandists of the deed to mere emotional flappers. The faction was, however, at its core, a reincarnation of the old foe against which Marx had thundered and which supposedly had been vanquished and laid to rest. This reëmbodied thing had now come forth in a new guise, and it had brought to its support a hitherto unknown element in social radicalism—an element that had sprung up overnight some time in the early part of the year and was now hysterically making itself known. This element was composed of what were then known as parlor impossibilists and pink-tea revolutionists, though they are now usually referred to as boudoir Bolsheviks. To the Roaring Jims and Wild Bills of the hinterland had been allied the Esmeraldas and Reginalds of the metropolitan coteries.

This alliance of "fanatic roughneck and sentimental softhead" in the propagation of a resuscitated heresy was looked upon by the guardians of the Socialist faith as a grave menace. The movement meant, unless checked, the overturn and wreck of all that had been built up in forty years of hard and courageous work. In the convention of 1912 the issue was fought out. There was a memorable debate, and in that debate the speakers of the constructive element placed the party squarely on the side of legalism and order. Unquestionably the note of expediency was heard; "politics" was not forgotten; but in most of the speeches—particularly those of Delegates Charles Dobbs, Winfield R. Gaylord, and W. L. Garver—the ethical note was strongly emphasized. "The working class," said Mr. Dobbs, "is entitled to the best that there is in our civilization; . . . and if the capitalist class desires to stain its hands with fraud and to practise violence, let us, who represent a new and constructive force, take our stand in favor of order as against chaos."

The convention agreed with him; and by a two-thirds vote, amid tense excitement, formally condemned the reactionaries of the left and decreed the expulsion from the party of every advocate of sabotage, violence, and abstention from political effort. A referendum to the membership of the party confirmed, by an equal majority, the verdict of the convention.

All authoritative propaganda of Socialism at that time emphasized its constructive, its ethical, its humanitarian aspect. The platform, the official leaflets, the books and other writings of leading Socialists were consistent with one another. Had any anti-Socialist of the period 1906-14 pictured a Lenin-Trotsky régime as a Socialist ideal, he would have drawn upon himself from the propagandists of the faith a storm of denunciation. Socialism was explained, not as a reversion to terrorism and loot, but as the next stage in the march of civilization. True, there was to be revolution, but in the sense that the change was to be thoroughgoing. The transition from capitalism would be made with the minimum of social dislocation, the maximum of regard for individual well-being. Socialism meant internationalism, but it did not mean anti-nationalism, and it made ample allowances for the obligations of national allegiance. The "bourgeois" state was not to be overthrown and abolished; it was to be conquered at the polls and gradually transformed into a social state, functioning for the greatest good of the greatest number.

Socialism, it should be noted, did not mean Communism; it meant the fullest individualism consistent with the common welfare. Even the class war, though emphasized as a fact, was described in terms not unduly terrifying to the timid. In those days the capitalist was not necessarily a bad man; he was quite as much a slave to the system (even though a lucky one) as was the proletarian. The chief anathema was reserved for the revolutionary extremist and his dilettante worshiper. No dictum was oftener on the lips of the orthodox than that the extremist and his sentimental dupe were, consciously or unconsciously, mere tools of reaction. Above all, Socialism meant democracy; everybody—at least every adult—should have a voice and vote in the conduct of the world's affairs. Without democracy there could be no Socialism.

This was the picture presented; and though a few ribald extremists hung about the fringes of the crowd and jeered at it, and most of the illuminati of the coteries superciliously rejected it as a thing quite too tame for souls of the real revolutionary vision and fire, it was the official picture. It had behind it the sanction of the leaders and the often repeated verdict of a plebiscite to the membership.

Of the sincerity of one section of these spokesmen there can, of course, be no question. But doubtless also those who afterwards so completely stultified themselves were equally sincere. They pictured Socialism as they imagined it, and the transition from capitalism as they believed and hoped that it might happen. But when, not long after, came the great test, it was found that among Socialist spokesmen with presumably equal degrees of sincerity there were vast disparities of self-understanding. Some of them knew themselves, and some did not. The minority—which included, with many others, the men mentioned above—found that they could consistently maintain their self-respect only by seceding from the party. The majority, under the increasing pressure of events on which they had not counted, gradually shifted their ground until today their attitude is on almost every point a complete reversal of that of five years ago.

Three factors, then latent but brought into active expression by the great war, are responsible. The first was the strong racialism of the large German element of the party; the second was the pro-German subserviency of the equally large alien, but non-German, element; and the third, the perverse impossibilism of a considerable part of the American element—a mental state which finds its chief ecstasy in always being on the wrong side of every question and which naturally enough found merits in the autocracy of William Hohenzollern which it could not find in the democracy of the Joneses, Smiths, and Robinsons of the United States. It is well to remember, in an age in which so many juvenile philosophers are perpetually challenging every accepted belief and standard, that sometimes at least the obvious explanation may be the true one. In this case it is the only conceivable one; and in spite of all the demurrers and protests of the accused, the fact remains that the Socialist shift is a product of Germanism. Had there been no war, there would have been no Socialist shift to Bolshevism; the Lenin-Trotsky régime (assuming that it could have come into being in a time of world peace) would to-day be denounced by the American Socialist leaders as a brutal travesty on Socialism. They would have followed Kautsky and Branting in their verdict; they would have listed the Bolsheviks with the counter-revolutionists—the more or less conscious tools of a czaristic reaction.

The change is so striking that it can not have escaped any observer. No time is now wasted in employing any of the old arguments. They have been remorselessly scrapped. If now you want a picture of the Socialist state, you are directed to gaze at Soviet Russia; and if you ask about Socialist tactics and means, you are likely to be told that anything which produces results is sanctionable. Soviet Russia is a model in operation; and the exegesis and apologetics of Socialism depend, in large measure, upon what has happened in that land and what may yet happen. If you make any inquiry about such things as liberty, justice, fraternity, and democracy, you are quite as likely as not to be told that the terms for these things are mere "bourgeois ideologies." As for the word democracy, it was a good and useful word a few years ago, but new conditions have rendered its meaning vague: it may mean anything or nothing.

What matters most is power; and what matters least is how it was acquired or how it is wielded, so long as it is maintained in the holy name of the proletariat. Of the glorification of proletarian power there is no end; and there is ready justification for the violation of every right or principle for which official Socialism stood in the days before the war. Internationalism has become more or less anti-governmentalism. The nice distinctions between Communism and Socialism have in the main been forgotten. Though there is still a professed reliance upon political action as a means of advancing the cause, an increasingly indulgent attitude towards "direct" action brought about, in 1917, the repeal of the anti-sabotage clause. Moreover, the old antagonism towards the extremists and their parlor disciples had by 1917 disappeared, and many of these intractable souls had become authoritative spokesmen of the movement. That within the last few months the old breach has again been opened, and that the extremists, with the relentless fury of an army of dervishes, are warring for the total obliteration of the Socialist party, merely adds a sequel of humiliation to a five years' career of stultification. The party leaders had nothing to gain and everything to lose from their truckling to the extremists, and they are now paying the penalty. They have drawn upon themselves a storm of objugation. What it is all about must prove puzzling even to one long experienced and well documented in radical controversy. But in any case it remits nothing in its sweeping denunciation; it concedes no shred of merit or honor to the party leaders. Even their stubborn resistance to America's part in the war, which cost some of them long prison sentences, is now denounced by the ultras as an expression of mere "petty bourgeois pacifism," a tawdry imitation of the simon-pure article of international revolutionary proletarian pacifism.

The American Socialist party had its greatest opportunity in the days of 1914-17. But saturated as it was with Germanism and pro-Germanism, and more or less tinctured with impossibilism, it drifted day by day into Bolshevism. The gates were opened to what it once considered its greatest enemies—the Goths and Vandals of revolutionary extremism—with the inevitable consequence of opening gates to enemies. Too late its leaders learned their mistake. They are modifying their Bolshevism, and they are trying desperately to save something from the wreck. It appears, however, that there is little to save. The recent national referendum seems to show an overwhelming majority for Beyond-Bolshevism. The party as a political factor is thus doomed. It may continue a sort of death-in-life existence after the pattern of its predecessor-contemporary, the Socialist Labor party; or it may be absorbed by some other organization, or it may merely die of inanition. Whatever its ultimate fate, it can now no longer be seriously regarded as a factor in the political struggle.

In its better days this party was a power; and to those of us who were then among its fellowship it held the promise of a glorious future. Now, the mere shadow of its former self, it awaits the inevitable end. "Men are we," wrote Wordsworth,

And must grieve when even the shade
Of that which once was great is passed away.

Yet the fitting regret in this case is not because of the impending extinction, but because of the fatuous course of social and national apostasy which decreed that fate.

W. J. GHENT

Correspondence

Vim Vi Expellere

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Having thrown the barn doors wide open and fastened them back, now that the horse has been stolen, our wise and watchful authorities are scurrying hither and yon, crying stop thief, and asking for clues. There is one unmistakable damning clue which anyone can see with his eyes shut, and it leads straight back to the social authorities themselves and from them higher up. It was, to begin with, the attitude and action of our Government in permitting Trotsky and his gang, after having urged the destruction of our institutions, to go to Russia, in spite of the remonstrances of the Allied Governments, with the declared purpose of taking her out of the war; and its further action when the Bolsheviks, not yet strong, had entered openly upon their career of murder and robbery, in refusing to join the Allies in putting them down and preventing the spread of their nefarious propaganda; and later its efforts more than once to treat with them on equal terms, a course that gave them clearly to understand that they were at liberty to send here as many emissaries and as much stolen money as they chose with which to spread their poison and carry on their warfare against us.

This propaganda they have been carrying on without concealment on their part and without let or hindrance on the part of those we have set over us. So serenely confident were they of not being interfered with, reassured doubtless by the declaration of a high officer of the Government that no matter what they said they would not be proceeded against unless there was an overt act, they have held public meetings, one of them presided over by a Government official, where anarchy and revolution were openly preached, and this after numerous bombs had been sent through the mails. The same doctrine has been proclaimed unhindered in numerous journals.

We are now reaping the legitimate results, and all under the monstrous plea of free speech and a free press. As well talk of free murder and free plunder, which is indeed what in stricken Russia has been attained. Every one knows that just as certainly as seed planted in a fertile soil will grow and bear fruit, incitements to the use of the bomb and the torch sown in idle, vicious, perverted, or disordered minds, spring up and bear fruits of anarchy and violence. The authorities know well enough that all the money spent on propaganda was not for amusement but for results, and they know equally well what those results must be, and yet they have sat with folded arms and chanted and chattered of free speech and a free press, and let the teaching and training of anarchists and murderers go on before their very eyes. Worse still, when a large band of them, caught red-handed in the West, were brought to New York to be deported, the Department of Labor, in which no such power should be lodged, turned the majority of them loose, and it is more than likely that it is to some of them, in token of their gratitude, that we owe this last exhibition of the beauty and advantages of advanced Socialism.

Our authorities have shirked their plain duty, shown themselves incompetent and inadequate to meet the menacing situation which confronts us, which they have long been aware of, and it remains for Congress to pass laws which will not only punish the criminals but compel timid, inefficient, and demagogic officials to act. This plea of waiting for an overt act—preaching revolution is an overt act—is as though a Board of Health, fully informed that enemies were spreading deadly germs throughout a community, should say, "We can do nothing until someone has developed the plague, and died." The making of laws and their execution should be, like the modern practice of medicine, as far as possible preventive.

There can be no question in any patriotic or reasoning mind as to how these Bolsheviks and I. W. W.'s should be dealt with. They are our avowed and deadly enemies, bent on destroying our Government, our liberty, and every institution which we hold sacred. They despise, scoff at, and violate our laws, and when confronted with their cowardly and bloody crimes invoke the laws they would destroy in their own defense. They are not entitled to their protection. Those that commit acts of violence should be hunted down like the vipers and rattlesnakes they are, and every member of the I. W. W. and the Bolsheviks should be rounded up and driven out of the country. They hate and despise it, and lie in wait to injure it; they are our deadly implacable enemies; why should we permit them to remain among us another day? Send the foreigners back to their native shores and bar them and their like out forever. Send the Americans, for with shame be it said there are some, to some far-off uninhabited island, where they can work out their theories unmolested. As to the parlor Bolsheviks, send them to Coventry. Not one of them will ever go within a hundred miles of a bomb or anything else dangerous. Then and not till then will there be abiding peace and security throughout our borders.

VETERAN

Nonquit, Mass., July 14

T. M. Osborne, Genius

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your recent editorial on "T. M. Osborne, Seaman 2," is an example of the characteristic inability of the American public to recognize and appreciate genius in its midst. And because of this very inability, you fail to see that it is the peculiar and especial genius of Thomas Mott Osborne that makes his experiment a most hopeful and significant one.

In one paragraph of your editorial you express admiration for the distinctive character of his service to prison reform. Yet you presume that his experience at Auburn Prison as a voluntary prisoner added naught to his equipment. Now it must be evident that it was some particular quality of his genius, or his actual experience within prison walls, or both, which account for his achievement. His remarkable accomplishment at the Naval Prison at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, prefaced as it was by a voluntary incarceration as a naval prisoner, lends great weight to the proposition that it is the genius of the man, coupled with the reality of a living experience, that explains his success.

If this be true, is it unreasonable to expect that out of this experience as a "Seaman, 2nd Class," the genius of Osborne may reveal not brutalities, but needless repressions and ways of developing a more consciously integrated organization? Suppose that with his rare creative instinct he should discover some means of articulation between officer and seaman, more friendly and less formal, which would make for greater harmony, fewer misunderstandings, fewer infractions of discipline—and a decrease in the number of naval prisoners. Then would not his service be of value, and entirely substantiate the courage and foresight of Secretary Daniels? And would not Osborne's capacity for inner penetration into the fundamentals of vital relationship command new attention? It is some such thought as this which has persuaded Lieutenant-Commander Osborne that he might perform a useful service as a "Seaman, 2nd Class."

Your discussion of naval tradition is both confusing and contradictory. After all, traditions have their day, and pass away if they do not square with common sense. The passing of the wine-mess removed a long-standing tradition. The war has witnessed many more, even to the extent of construction officers in the navy yards putting on civilian clothes to remove the artificial barrier between officer and workman. And taken by and large, they have all been for the best interest of the service. Nor is this work of Osborne's in any sense "high-minded spying." He is aboard the North Dakota by executive order, with the full acquiescence and knowledge of the Commanding Officer. The very thing that an Intelligence Officer would do is the very thing most abhorrent to Osborne—namely, spying. In fact all that any Intelligence Officer would detect would be some obvious infraction of naval regulation, and nothing that reached deep into the very fundamentals of associated life; its repressions and conflicts, with illumined suggestions, of a constructive nature, on the way out. For this contribution is going to come from men with perception and profound understanding of human relationships.

It is no longer the confidence of his friends that these six years of whole-souled, unselfish devotion to prison reform has cut deep into his financial resources till it is a gross exaggeration to speak of him as a "millionaire" in a seaman's rôle. He has given without stint of his principal to sustain the ideal of a moral principle. With true Christian spirit he has given all—or nearly so—for the fulfillment of this service to his fellow-men. Such is the eloquent testimony to his genuineness.

So the genius and genuineness of Osborne may bear much fruit. His clear vision, his articulate voice, his trenchant pen, and his constructive imagination may shed light on the path for others.

SPENCER MILLER, JR.

New York City, August 6

Mexico as it Was

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Permit me to suggest, in connection with the very interesting résumé of books about Mexico by Edward Lester Pearson in your issue of September 13, that readers who wish information and entertainment par excellence should be advised to secure "Life In Mexico," by Madame Calderon De La Barca, now reissued in Everyman's Library.

Written by a brilliant young American woman, wife of a Spanish diplomat, who resided in Mexico for two years, it was first published in England in 1843. William H. Prescott sponsored the book with an Introduction.

So accurate was it and so authoritative, that in our war with Mexico in 1847 the book was used as a guide by the American officers, including General Scott.

CHARLES M. ROE

New York, September 13

A Correction

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Galsworthy's "American Addresses" is published by us and not by Houghton, Mifflin, as stated in your issue of September 13.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

New York, September 15

Book Reviews

Philippine Independence

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN THE PHILIPPINES. By Maximo M. Kalaw, Chief of the Department of Political Science, University of the Philippines, Secretary of the Philippine Mission to the United States. New York: The Century Co.

THIS is a book which all citizens of the United States should read, for it lays before them in direct, courteous, and dispassionate language the Philippine situation of to-day, and makes clear the plain duty of this country. Its appeal to our national conscience is only strengthened by the careful avoidance of everything that should offend the most sensitive American, and by its generous recognition of whatever good we have done, for the author's forbearance must make anyone who has studied the facts feel mortified that the representative of a nation we have treated as inferior should so easily demonstrate the absurdity of our claim to superior civilization.

The Congress of the United States with substantial unanimity passed in 1914 the so-called Jones Act, which in its preamble pledged the United States "to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein." Mr. Kalaw shows that the stable government has been established, and that the promise of the United States should now be kept.

The conditions are in all respects singularly favorable to independence. In the first place, there has been in the Islands no dynasty whose representatives might aspire to recover their power, there are no noble families, no castes, no political distinction between citizens, except such as are surmountable. The conditions are like those which existed here in 1776, but are better because there are no slaves in the Islands. We have, therefore, the best possible foundation for free government in an essentially democratic people, who naturally favor republican institutions.

In the next place, we have a homogeneous people of the same blood inhabiting a group of islands, with no boundary questions to disturb them such as have so long elsewhere disturbed the peace of the world.

In the third place, they have been tried in the balance and have proved their fitness to govern themselves. Of this Mr. Kalaw furnishes convincing proof. He quotes the foolish statement of a writer in the New York Herald, who, speaking of Mr. Wilson's remark at Staunton, Virginia, in 1912, that he hoped the frontiers of the United States would soon not include the Philippines, said that when the news of the speech reached the Islands, "like a clock in a house shaken by an earthquake, the new-found business expansion stopped, like a pulse in the body struck by lightning the current of its life ceased to throb. Capitalists accustomed to place their money through brokers on commercial loans drew in their funds; insurance companies and other institutions that had been investing their surplus in local enterprises closed their doors to such transactions." This statement, on its face absurd, is typical of many before and since by which the American public has been deceived, such as the delusion that the Filipinos "desired our sovereignty," that the opposition came from only one out of eighty tribes; that the photographs and living specimens of savages sent to this country fairly represented the Filipino people, and that Aguinaldo was like an Apache chief.

Mr. Kalaw marshals the facts and figures which absolutely refute the theory that Filipino government meant disorder and ruin. In 1913, the total trade of the Philippines was 202,171,484 pesos. In 1918 it was 468,563,496 pesos. In 1913, 42.65 per cent. of the trade went to the United States; in 1918, 63.4 per cent. The Philippine National Bank was established in 1916 with some 20,000,000 pesos in resources, which in 1918 had grown to 230,000,000 pesos. In the last few years 3,065 domestic corporations and firms and some 95 large American concerns have been organized. "For three years prior to 1913 the Government had expended from two to two and a half million pesos yearly in excess of its ordinary income, and in 1913 had expended more than 9,000,000 pesos in excess of such income" was the statement of Governor Harrison in his first message to the Philippine legislature. In the last three years the national income has increased from about fifty-three and a half million pesos to nearly 71,000,000 pesos, and "at the end of 1918 there was a surplus of nearly 35,000,000 pesos in the insular treasury."

It is very instructive to see how the Filipinos have worked out a successful budget system, which this country has vainly been striving for, under which the budget is prepared by men elected by the people.

It was predicted that if the Philippines were independent "the Moros would revive their piratical life and war on their Christian brothers, and that the other districts would be subject to disorders and revolutions." The Philippine officials have disproved all these gloomy prophecies, and have adopted a policy of kindness which is steadily civilizing all these so-called "savage tribes," and has accomplished wonderful results. Civil government was established under an American, Governor Carpenter, and has been continued so wisely that peace and order reign, and the Moros have learned to trust and respect the other islanders to such a degree that their representative in the Filipino Senate said, "We are one in spirit and one in blood."

The Filipinos have nearly doubled the mileage of first-class road from the end of 1914 to 1918. They have built public buildings, school-houses and bridges, increasing the amount devoted to public works from about 3,000,000 pesos annually under Governor Forbes to 17,000,000 in 1919. They have a Bureau of Labor to serve as a mediator in disputes between labor and capital of which both the Director and Assistant Director are labor leaders. The number of children at school in 1912 was 440,000, in 1918, 675,000. The number of teachers in the Department of Mindanao and Sulu in 1912 was 99, in 1918, 783.

One is tempted to quote more freely from the abundant evidence which this volume contains that the Filipinos are a united, civilized, prosperous people, entirely fit to govern themselves. It is enough to repeat the words of Governor Harrison: "The Filipino people have come out triumphantly through their trial. By temperament, by experience, by financial ability, in every way, the ten millions of Filipinos are entitled to be free from every government except of their own choice. . . . They are intelligent enough to decide for themselves. . . . I have found the native Filipino official to be honest, efficient, and as capable of administering executive positions as any men I have met anywhere in the world."

The Filipinos have done their part. If the American Governor and Vice-Governor were to sail away to-morrow, the stable government which the people have established would go on without feeling any shock. The question which for twenty years has vexed the conscience of the American people recurs. Shall we whose government stands upon the immortal declaration that all human governments rest upon the consent of the governed refuse to such a people as this has shown itself to be the same right of self-government?

If we care nothing for the principles which we constantly profess, shall we treat our solemn promise to withdraw our "sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein" as a mere "scrap of paper," following an example of broken faith which we all condemn?

Shall we who believe that "every people should be left free to determine its own policy, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful" disregard these fine professions with cynical indifference?

In a word shall we whose conquest of the Philippine Islands is a chapter in our national history of which no American can really be proud, add a yet blacker chapter to that history by trampling principles and promises alike underfoot, and while trying to emancipate other nations for which we are not responsible, continue to hold in subjection the weaker people for which we are responsible?

Shall we who hesitate to enter a league of nations because we fear foreign entanglement and do not wish to see our young men fighting in remote regions insist on remaining an Asiatic Power with all the consequences?

If the American people really believe in their own institutions and value their own honor, there can be but one answer to these questions.

MOORFIELD STOREY

The Middle Distance

THE OLD MADHOUSE. By William De Morgan. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

THE GAY-DOMBEYS. By Sir Harry Johnston. New York: The Macmillan Company.

IF there is a boundary between the prolix and the garrulous, Mr. De Morgan stepped over it in "When Ghost Meets Ghost." You may say that there was no superfluous item of fact or of comment in the nearly nine hundred tight-printed pages of that remarkable tale. But there were unmistakable redundancies of manner and superfluities of phraseology. At times his readers could but feel themselves, reluctantly, to be half-charmed victims of beard-wagging, finger-shaking eld. How get to the 'osses without somehow cutting the cackle? Why couldn't this delightful old gentleman speed things up a bit, so that we might proceed to the next business on the docket? If nothing else, there were other story-tellers with a right to be heard.

It may at once be confessed that "The Old Madhouse" arouses similar qualms. Indeed, if De Morgan had lived to finish it, he might easily, at the pace he was making, have beaten again all recent records for the long-distance novel in English. Some readers, genuine De Morganites, would have rejoiced in this. The rest of us will be well enough content to accept Mrs. De Morgan's summary chapter of conclusion in lieu of the three or four hundred pages into which its substance would have been spun by the leisurely affection of the author. The facts are, briefly, that he was working at the story till within a month of his death, had talked over its conclusion with Mrs. De Morgan, and left notes from which she was able to solve for us without peradventure the mystery on which the plot is based, and to tell how everything "comes out."

The plot seems, as usual, to be carefully and deliberately constructed, and from the multitudinous cross-references and minor pertinences which make perilous the skipping of a De Morgan page, we might have fancied the whole affair complete in the author's mind before the penning of a sentence. Mrs. De Morgan's account of her husband's methods of composition completely destroys this easy supposition:

When my husband started on one of his novels, he did so without making any definite plot. He created his characters and then waited for them to act and evolve their own plot. In this way the puppets in the show became real living personalities to him, and he waited, as he expressed it, "to see what they would do."

It was his usual practice to read out aloud to me every Sunday evening all he had written during the week. When the novel was completed we read it aloud again straight through from beginning to end, so that he might judge of how the story came as a whole, omitting or adding parts as he considered necessary. This process of weeding or elaborating was not always left till the completion of the story, but he relied on being able to do it before giving his work to the public. . . .

Towards the end of the book, when an intelligible winding-up of the story became imperative, the plot was taken up and carefully considered, all the straggling threads gathered together and finalities decided upon, though latitude was always allowed for details to shape themselves after their own fashion. . . . He never made rough copies and practically finished as he went; everything was so complete that he found even a slight alteration in the text would often let him in for as much work as the writing of the whole chapter would have given him.

The plot, in the end, is there, and everything seems to fit into it. And, as usual with De Morgan, it is a plot based upon quite simple and external facts: a sudden disappearance, the revelation of a long-concealed passion, the love-affairs of a few young people as determined by jealousy, temperament, character, and opportunity. The old madhouse, so far as we can see, is introduced—that is, the former use to which the fine old house has been put is postulated—purely in order to account plausibly for the hidden trap-door which is the primitive engine employed for the sudden elimination of poor Uncle Drury. Uncle Drury's ghost capably plays that part of innocent mystification which is customarily assigned to the supernatural in this romancer's work. In truth, he and his faded romance are pretty lightly linked to the tale of Fred Carteret and Charley Snaith and Lu Hinchliffe and Nancy who is our real heroine—a kind of unsentimental Cinderella, with the undying appeal of her rôle. But whatever in structure and substance the novel may or may not be from the technical point of view, it will have for thousands the character of yet another delightful communication from a well-loved friend, the more agreeable because, in a way, unexpected.

De Morgan writes of his own England. It is a little England of nice middle-class or humorous lower-class people, of no visible "problems" beyond the personal interests of the handful of persons we are concerned with at the moment; a world snug and safe and self-contained. Sir Harry Johnston, in "The Gay-Dombeys," writes also chiefly of Victorian England, and in an intimate, discursive vein which suggests De Morgan more than any other recent writer. But his is the Victorian England of the ruling class and of steadily broadening empire, which honestly believed in its destiny, and shouldered without false modesty or cant, if sometimes also without discretion, the white man's burden in many lands. Through his experience as explorer and British administrator in Africa and elsewhere, Sir Harry Johnston was in the thick of this movement for racial expansion, an empire-builder in faith and practice. He is evidently his own model, in some degree, for the Eustace Morven of the tale. In an enthusiastic Preface, Mr. Wells contrives to mention this fact without assuming responsibility for it: "Sir Harry has used his own experiences with extraordinary freedom throughout, and the mechanical reviewers from whom all writers suffer will no doubt, when they are not saying he is a caricaturist, be saying that the is 'autobiographical.'"

How much truth may be in these extra-Wellsian charges is, as Mr. Wells says, a matter of small importance. Never mind where he got his materials, the question of moment is what use he makes of them? And the answer is that, not being one of those mechanical novelists from whom all reviewers suffer, he has retold an excellent story, as a story. The main action, however aware of the adventures and achievements of Eustace Morven abroad, is firmly rooted at home. "The Englanders" would not have been a bad title. And the central figure among them is not Eustace or any other man, but Suzanne, that island Ceres who is also a great lady and a dear girl, and who needs only to exist in these pages in order to justify them, if there were no other justification. But the book is rich in other ways, in portraiture, in ideas, in humor—a keen and sympathetic study of that Victorian age which it has been the fashion of late to dismiss (no, never to dismiss!) as all of a piece, whether pathetic, or absurd, or downright damnable in its hypocrisy and mediocrity. There is no dove perched on Suzanne's finger!

H. W. BOYNTON

A Courageous Pessimist

A GENTLE CYNIC. Being a translation of the Book of Koheleth, commonly known as Ecclesiastes, stripped of later additions; also its origin, growth, and interpretation. By Morris Jastrow. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company.

IN the record of the literature of the world the Book of Ecclesiastes holds a unique place. It, in Renan's famous phrase, is the only lovable book ever written by a Jew, and the phrase still holds even with Heine reckoned in. Ecclesiastes rings truer than Heine in any of his stages and can be read and re-read beyond even the "Buch der Lieder." No one who has ever caught a glimpse of the real man behind these broken sentences, swaying with many moods and truthful to each to the limit of contradiction, has ever thereafter been unfaithful. From St. Paul to Thackeray they have known that here was a great creative mind, their kin, struggling to express itself and to tell the burden and mystery and attraction of human life as it had found it, even when the exact meaning of the words has been held from them and they could only answer, spirit to spirit. For this book belongs to great literature in its very diversity of possible interpretation, and beyond the haze of meanings we still can see the man. He abides our questions, and his smile, when we can catch its rare glimpses, is true and warm. He had part in the common élan vital and he knew, in spite of all experience, that life and living were good.

Yet, there is the horror, too, of the mystery. He was no metaphysician; no Hebrew ever was. He had to posit a Personality behind everything and directly controlling everything, and what kind of Personality could that be? We might call it the order of nature and solve the shrieking paradox between it and ourselves with a phrase, but for him it had to be a Will, and in presence of that Will he had to walk through the number of his fleeting days here under the sun. That Will knew neither good nor evil—all experience of life showed that; it was inexorable but irritable; in some strange way it actually feared man—the Garden Story in Genesis was a myth of the deepest meaning for Ecclesiastes, though he read it very differently—and had arranged all the events of life in opposites to puzzle man. Thus life could have no plan or meaning, and every one could see that it had not. But this Will, also, had put man under a curse of toil—again just as in Genesis—and for the same purpose. So there was man, and the whole groaning and travailing creation, driven to toil on in endless circlings, without hope of any advance or new thing, in an essentially changeless universe. That is this mortal life, and, when it is over, man returns to the dust, for he is dust and unto dust he returns. And in the meantime let men walk cautiously before this Will, lest It be angry and he perish by the way.

If ever pessimism were justified it would be in presence of such a nightmare as this. But our tags do not apply to Ecclesiastes; he is too great and different for them all. Yet he is, if anything, more a pessimist than a "cynic," and has neither lot nor part with the snarling curs of Diogenes' litter. Nor does "gentle" fit him save as he was a great-hearted gentleman who faced life steadily and as a whole, ready to do his duty by it and in it; having learned the joy that lies in work and fellowship and human love and that man could thus transform the penalty imposed on him and really live. It is true that he never speaks of duty, just as he never speaks of conscience—no Hebrew ever did—but these things were as real to him as was that Will behind life which haunted his dreams. So strongly beat the pulse of life within him, although he knew well the paradox that it involved. And what impatience he had was expended on those who talked and theorized where no one could know. He preferred to leave the contradiction as it stood and to go on with life. The curious point is that, while he had no doubt that the Will behind the events of life did not recognize good or bad, he never asked himself whence his own acceptance of these categories came. But, then, neither did the poet behind Job. Was the problem hidden for them by their having no term for "conscience"? Contrasted with this blindness is the clearness of the double classification which he lays down of people and their actions. One is into categories of moral good and bad, and the other into what is pleasing to that unmoral Will and displeasing to It. Here he even shows the beginnings of an escape from the fundamental confusion in Hebrew ethics between being wise and prudent and being good. The wise and prudent man knows how to get along with that Will, more or less, but the unflinching and inconvenient moralist destroys himself. This is somewhat veiled in our English versions by the translation of a Hebrew word as "sinner"; in his use of it Ecclesiastes reverts to its etymological force of "one who makes a mistake," "a blunderer."

Beyond this use of wisdom and the practical fact that "the wise man's eyes are in his head but the fool walketh in darkness" Ecclesiastes did not go. He had no more use for those philosophers who professed to understand and explain both the phenomena and the inner meaning of life than he had for those writers of apocalypses who told of a golden future and a new heaven and earth. How did they know? was his rejoinder to all attempted escapes, by reason or pious imagination, from the leaden and certain facts. He preferred to posit the two sure things, the unmoral personal Will and the élan vital; and to leave it there.

All this has been written not to send the reader to Professor Jastrow's book but to that of Ecclesiastes. Almost two hundred pages of Professor Jastrow's book are given to introduction and about fifty to translation and commentary—an intolerable proportion of bread to sack. Further, he is an Old Testament exegete, historian, theologian, and as a sworn higher critic he must have editors, redactions and glosses, and deals with the Book of Ecclesiastes as though it were Leviticus or Deuteronomy. But the laws of literature are not those of history, or theology, or jurisprudence. It is a mirror of life and its pure products may be as full of contradictions as life and personality themselves. This Ecclesiastes well knew, but he could hardly have known that in thus liberating his soul he was writing the first and perhaps the greatest of the books of the literature of self-revelation. How he came to do it, how his book became current among men, how it became part of the sacred canon of the Jews, are questions which show how little we know of the real life of these centuries of Hebrew history. The rest is silence, and literature accepts and respects the silence.*

Marriage Laws of the States

AMERICAN MARRIAGE LAWS IN THEIR SOCIAL ASPECTS. By Fred. S. Hall and Elizabeth W. Brooke. New York: Russell Sage Foundation.

THIS digest of the marriage laws in our States and of various proposals for their reform is preliminary to a thorough study by the Russell Sage Foundation of the manner in which these laws are administered, and of their relation to family welfare. Readers of the book are asked to aid the authors in securing information on the following points: "What is the interpretation put upon the marriage laws of your State in daily practice? How are licenses issued? How carefully is the intention of the law made clear to unsophisticated people? How are evasions punished?" The authors believe that the women voters will take a keen interest in the subject and will render effective service in reforming our marriage legislation. Let us hope that such faith is well founded. There can be no doubt that our marriage laws are now bewilderingly diverse, and their reform seems beset with many and strange difficulties.

*Of course the Hebrew text of Ecclesiastes is not immaculate and the last six verses are an explicit editorial appendix. Yet the text is in better condition than that of a very great part of the rest of the Old Testament.

It is a fact rarely referred to, and perhaps not generally known, that the Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws owes its existence largely to an attempt to bring about uniformity in our State laws upon marriage and divorce. And yet, while the Commissioners were able to draft statutes relating to negotiable instruments, to warehouse receipts, and similar topics, which commended themselves to State Legislatures and are rapidly unifying commercial law in this country, they made no progress with marriage and divorce legislation for many years.

This state of affairs led the Governor of Pennsylvania to call a National Divorce Congress, the expenses of which were paid by his State. It was attended by representatives of all but two States and resulted in giving a new impetus to reformatory legislation in this field. Taking advantage of the interest thus aroused, the Conference of Commissioners formulated a series of uniform statutes of great importance, viz.: The Marriage License Act, the Marriage Evasion Act, the Divorce Act, and the Family Desertions Act.

It was hoped that they would receive immediate legislative approval and go far towards correcting the evils incident to the defects of our present marriage laws. This hope has not been realized. Up to the present year, only three States—Delaware, New Jersey, and Wisconsin—had passed the Divorce Act; only four—Illinois, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and Vermont—the Marriage Evasion Act; while the most important of the series, the Marriage License Act, has been passed in but two States—Massachusetts and Wisconsin—and one of these, Massachusetts, modified the draft in many respects.

How little is known of these Acts, even by prominent legislators, is shown by the conduct of Representative (now Senator) Norris of Nebraska, in introducing a bill in 1911, providing an appropriation of $200,000 for a congress of delegates to be appointed by State Governors, who should assemble in Washington and formulate uniform laws on marriage and divorce. A similar bill was introduced at the same session of Congress by Representative (now Senator) Sheppard of Texas. Both appeared to be ignorant or forgetful of the divorce congress which had been held under the auspices of the Governor of Pennsylvania and which had given rise to the legislation which we have described.

The present book will be of service in bringing these uniform acts to the attention of social reformers. Its authors agree with the Commissioners that the welfare of society required that emphasis be put upon laws regulating marriage rather than divorce. "It is the duty of the State to discourage and place obstacles in the way of sudden and clandestine marriages, both for the sake of inducing forethought and deliberation generally in the formation of indissoluble relations; and for the purposes of preventing illegal and irregular relations, as well as of enabling parents to protect minors from improvident marriages."

Accordingly, the Uniform Marriage License Act declares void all common law marriages; that is, all marriages by consent or reputation, and without a civil or religious ceremony. It fixes the marriageable age. It requires the parties to apply for a license at least five days before it is issued and to post a notice of the proposed marriage in a designated public office. Objections to the marriage may be filed by near relatives of the parties, to be heard and passed upon by a designated court. The manner in which marriage may be solemnized is prescribed, as well as the form of marriage certificate; and a formal public record is provided for.

To what extent the enactment of this statute would change existing law is indicated by the following facts: Common law marriages are valid in twenty-eight jurisdictions; in seventeen States no marriageable age has been fixed; while most States require some sort of license, only eight require a notice of application for it, and only two provide for the public filing and hearing of objections to a proposed marriage.

In digesting our marriage laws the authors have summarized their provisions under the following heads: 1. Common Law Marriages. 2. The Marriageable Age. 3. The Marriage License. 4. Solemnization. 5. The Marriage Record. 6. Inter-State Relations. 7. Other Prohibitions.

The compilation appears to be a careful piece of work and quite up to date in its reference to revised statutes, codes, and session laws. It does not pretend to inerrancy, and the authors illustrate the difficulties which they encountered in gathering their information by the following experiences: "In one State the secretary of a charity organization presented our inquiry regarding common law marriages to two lawyers. When she found they disagreed, a former judge was appealed to. The lawyer who assisted us in another State wrote, in explanation of a conflict that we had noted: 'That was a mistake of the Legislature in drawing the Act.'"

On the topic of common law marriages, the authors would have found much useful and some corrective information in Decker's "Digest" of the law on this topic, prepared for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, but which does not appear to have fallen under their notice. This remark is not by way of disparagement, for the book is entitled to high praise not only for the information it contains but for its sane and practical suggestions to social reformers.

The Run of the Shelves

"IN White Armor" (G. P. Putnam's Sons) is the interesting record of the manly and generous life of a young American captain, Arthur Ellis Hamm, who died in action on the Lorraine front on September 14, 1918. The recorder is his widow, Elizabeth Creevy Hamm, and the spirit of the book is one of proud and tender worship. The following passage illustrates the tenor of many parts of this unreserved but not indelicate little book:

"I chose 'The Holy Grail,' and he leaned his head against my knee and looked dreamily into the fire as I read. I lingered a little over the description of the sending of Sir Galahad upon his quest [we omit part of the quotation]:
I maiden, round thee maiden, bind my belt.
Go forth, for thou shalt see what I have seen,

And break through all, till one will crown thee king

Far in the spiritual city'; and as she spoke
She sent the deathless passion in her eyes Thro' him, and made him hers, and laid her mind

On him, and he believed in her belief.

I paused and ran my fingers through Arthur's hair, and he reached up and took my hand, and so on to the end of the poem we read together."

This is not Tennyson at his best, nor Tennysonianism at its best, by a good deal. The form in both cases is dilute and saccharine. The passage (in the biography, not the Idyll) is precisely the kind of passage which a prudent writer or a timid publisher would have been tempted to excise. Excision, however, would have been regrettable; the passage carries a lesson. This young man who reads the "Holy Grail" with his head against his wife's knee, with her fingers in his hair, and his hand in hers, was a tireless worker, an unequalled disciplinarian, and a fearless leader in combat. Victorianism in its weakened and ultra-sentimental phase, Victorianism in the hour of its decline and its reproach, is still the pabulum and incentive of manhood, can still make men all that their commanders ask and that their countrymen honor. There is neither need nor wish on our part to derogate for a moment from the heights to which other men, like Alan Seeger and Rupert Brooke, have been urged by other stimuli. But Victorianism as a man-maker holds its own even to-day.

There may be some who will rejoice at a rumor that the Senate Prohibition Bill is to permit the manufacture of cider and wines made from the elderberry, the gooseberry, and even the wicked grape itself. But those who have lived "In the Sweet Dry and Dry," as described by Christopher Morley and Bart Haley (Boni and Liveright), will be wise enough not to rejoice prematurely. They know that Bishop Chuff and his minions will not thus tamely surrender at the first skirmish. It is nothing but a ruse; when the demon begins to work in these supposedly innocent beverages, then the homes of offending citizens will be invaded by his squadrons, armed with their breathoscopes, and woe betide the poor Decanterbury Pilgrim whose souse registers the minutest fraction above one-half of one per cent., unless he can prove that his exhilaration is due merely to communion with departed spirits and not with those of his own manufacture.

The world is grateful for this revelation of the lengths to which its chuffs are prepared to go in their implacable warfare against Nature's evil tendency towards fermentation. It may be, however, that the chuffs, instead of abolishing Nature, may conclude that it will be easier to abolish all the wicked individuals who trade upon her weakness. This seemingly generous concession offered by the Senate is merely a device to find out who these individuals are. Let no man, therefore, make his gooseberry wine with any other notion than that he is playing into the hands of his persecutors. The only way of safety lies in using the dangerous stuff to irrigate his flowers, as Virgil Quimbleton did, and thus communicate a tonic quality to the atmosphere which can be enjoyed without transgressing the statute "for beverage purposes." Before long there will be a law making it a crime to circulate recipes for these noxious homebrews. It is in the book. And everything in the book is so, or shortly will be.

"The Story of the Rainbow Division" (Boni and Liveright) loses nothing in its telling by Raymond S. Thompkins. And indeed, it is difficult to overpraise this division culled from the flower of the National Guard. It was the first to take over a divisional sector under its own commander, it was more constantly engaged than any other unit, it fought in Lorraine, Champagne, in the second Marne, and in the Argonne, having its patrols nearest Sedan at the moment of the armistice. Some time we hope to have a real military history and criticism of its fighting. Meanwhile, this chronicle and eulogy will more nearly meet the immediate needs of its members and their friends.

English Political Parties

THE present position and prospects of political parties in England are interesting subjects for disinterested observation. Disinterestedness is precisely the most difficult position to attain, for in England we are all accustomed to regard political affairs from a party point of view, tinged with personal preference and aversions. One thing, however, may be considered certain—the party system will continue. The constitutional habit of centuries will not be altered completely even by the great cataclysm of the last five years. Beneath the often rather contemptible and puerile characteristics of Parliamentary parties is a genuine conflict of fundamental principles and ideals. The parties which were so long known in England as Whig and Tory were actuated by opposing ideals of movement and rest. The same ideals exist to-day, as in the time of Gladstone and Disraeli. The remarkable Parliamentary coalition which came into being during the abnormal period of the great war was an abnormal political fact; and now that peace objectives and not military are before us, the same principles which governed the actions of politicians and statesmen in the ante-war period must once more come into play. The coalition is, therefore, doomed. Politicians and journalists take short views and talk of reconstructing offices and changing Ministers, but though the end of the Coalition may be deferred, end it certainly will, and two great parties will again face each other at Westminster as they have done in the past. The questions have already taken shape that afford abundant opportunity for broad differences of opinion and subsequent political action. Having regard to human nature, it is almost inevitable that there should be one party which is bold and another which is timid, one which regards movement as essential, another which looks upon the preservation of existing institutions as the most vital need.

But personal aims and ambitions have always affected English parties; they demand effective leadership and are inclined to hero worship. It is immaterial from most points of view whether or not Mr. Lloyd George became Prime Minister through personal intrigues; it is certain that his appointment was approved by the large majority of the nation who were looking round for courageous and visible leadership in a time of war. But having, in the process of succession, cut himself off from many of his former associates, and having at the last election endeavored to establish a coalition party entirely subservient to his leadership as distinguished from a coalition of parties, and having by so doing brought himself into bitter antagonism with the Liberal party, Mr. Lloyd George can not, as things stand, again become a leader of that party without a complete abdication of his present personal preëminence. Yet the Prime Minister by temperament and opinion is out of sympathy with the Unionists, who form the bulk of his present supporters, nor have they any liking for his aims in domestic politics, if these are to be judged by his ante-war political record. In war-time political principles disappear before the overwhelming necessity of united action; they rise again, perhaps stronger, when war ceases. Disraeli, when he became Prime Minister in a Tory government in 1868, had done first-rate service to his party during years of Parliamentary opposition; his party may not have liked or trusted him, but he had served it well. But Mr. Lloyd George opposed the Unionist party until the war, for a time, eliminated party differences. Is it to be expected, then, that he can ever be the head of a purely Unionist government?

Yet the future of parties seems not a little to depend on the aims and ambitions of this one man, who unquestionably by ability and courage and parliamentary skill has attained a supreme political position. Country and party are inextricably mingled in the mind of the ordinary parliamentarian; therefore a successful and courageous leader from a party point of view is the first of patriots and should be supported. This fact is Mr. Lloyd George's chief political asset. Yet he is in a difficult position; he is isolated, from a party point of view, and has neither the temperament nor the kind of ability needed in the difficult, slow, and trying time of post-war reconstruction. But whatever course he may follow, he can not prevent the reëmergence of the Liberal party, which includes the bulk of those who are in favor of what may compendiously be called Reform. It does not want for guides, whereas their Unionist opponents are in this respect deficient. The Labor party is not likely to be more than an independent and advanced wing of the Liberal party as long as it continues to be a Labor party. For a Labor party in Parliament is one which is actuated, not by political principles, but by the interests of a class; its objects are selfish and not national. In furthering these objects it may support or promote certain measures beneficial to the nation, but it does so because in the first place they benefit a class. This must remain a weakness of the Labor party in a democratic and politically well-educated country, and therefore the Labor party as a Parliamentary party does not seem likely to have the importance or the influence which many appear to expect.

Indeed, the more successful the Labor party or Labor organizations are in obtaining advantages for Labor as a class, the less will be the influence of that party, for it lives on the discontent of its constituents.

E. S. ROSCOE

Chalfont St. Peter, Bucks

Post-Crisis Studies

THE wholesale and thorough appraisal of American manhood by the draft brought to light a number of conditions that constituted a challenge to our educational system. The percentage of rejections showed that our physical manhood was not so rugged as it might have been; there were more illiterates and near-illiterates than we had thought; and there were too many who had not been thoroughly Americanized. Since both the physical defects, not infrequently, and also the mental insufficiencies were largely due to lack of information and training in more tender years, a considerable portion of our disillusionment had to be referred to defective elementary education. And there was no comfort in the reflection that, after all, our system was better than that of other nations; for the shortcomings of others, especially if we have to shoulder the consequences, are no palliation of our own.

Yet it was just the inculcation of the vital and elementary things that we had prided ourselves upon. Perhaps we had been a little lax about insisting upon physical examination and upbuilding in the common schools, but we thought that we were making almost everybody learn at least to read and write. And then it has gradually become evident also that even the common schools have not fully succeeded in that fundamental service of theirs: Americanization. Naturally there could be but little of the peril of a foreign language press if that indispensable precondition of national unity, a common language, had been insisted upon; nor could alien societies with counter-national objects have existed long if the young had been thoroughly imbued with the spirit of our national ways and institutions. Pro-Germanism was more vociferous than multitudinous; but there was enough cause for concern over the hitherto unquestioned efficiency of the "melting-pot"—and most of the fusion attributed to that vessel has always, and rightly, been credited to the common schools.

The schools are naturally not to blame for the status of persons who have not attended them. It is for the Governmental authorities to secure the proper exposure of all the young to the school influences. It is true enough that, with our enormous immigration of afore-time, and especially in view of the fact that a considerable part of that immigration represented only transitory exploitation of economic opportunity, there has been much material for the melting-pot that the schools could not touch. The need of contriving in some way to Americanize the immigrant who comes to us when past the school-age, has offered a difficult problem to able and devoted specialists; hence the night-school and school-centre enterprises, the home-visitations, and many another high-minded form of service to the nation.

In a general way these newer devices, summoned into being to meet a positive and ominous condition, go pretty straight to their mark and are not much handicapped by whims and fancies. It is the institution of long standing that is subject, not alone to the incrustation of tradition, but also to the solvent action of half-grasped, emotionally conceived "theory." It is the latter sort of institution that needs reconstruction; the former are not yet past their period of construction. The school may not be responsible for the status of those who have not attended it; but for those who do attend, it is evident that more can be done, and more expediently done.

Elementary education, no matter what the age, in years, of its recipients, must, in order to be thorough and disciplinary, confine itself to fundamentals: to arithmetic rather than to "infant biology," to spelling rather than to those "expressions of individuality" that the gushing type of so-called teacher seeks to elicit; to physiology and hygiene rather than to folk-dances. It is not nearly so hard to maunder poetically before a class over thrilling subjects as to inculcate and discipline a set of resisting minds; and the thing that is easier to do, and more interesting, has not had to wait long for its justification in "pedagogy." But if the fundamentals are to be taught in a fundamental manner, there is no time or place among the subjects for frills or caprices, even if the latter be assumed to carry some advantage instead of producing slackness of mental fibre.

To have well-learned fundamentals we must have few fundamentals. All are agreed, presumably, upon the identity of some of these, for they have constituted the basis of education these many centuries. Even the ardent faddist falls in with the traditional view; only he has developed some pet scheme for teaching, say, spelling, in such manner that learning involves no mental labor or tension. Indeed, some of the subjects that have been introduced into the schools are not at all bad in themselves if they were or could be introduced in a disciplinary manner. But we are concerned, for the moment, with matter rather than manner; and must ask ourselves, therefore, what subjects are the least dispensable after the three R's and the scanty remainder upon which practically everyone, in earlier times and at present, has been in agreement.

This is a question as to what every young American, boy or girl, needs most to know in order to take his place in the adult generation. Naturally, then, vocational education, except along the broadest lines, is excluded. These broadest lines will represent rather a survey of the field of economic opportunity than preparation for any species of gainful occupation; that is, an understanding of the nature and location of the nation's natural resources and of the industrial organization that Americans have developed for the utilization of these resources. Here are the bases and fundamentals of American life, that is, of that type of life which the rising generation is to lead.

The tendency towards such studies has been apparent for some years; and the war has given impetus to it. Perhaps the world has never seen, even in the tortured countries of Europe, so dramatic a mobilization of national resources and industries as that effected by the United States prior to and after its entrance into the war. And strained attention has been called to this mobilization, for it was seen that it was a marshaling into the fighting-line of ultimate and indispensable necessities. What saved our friends of like mind with ourselves, and our wives and children, and civilization? American products derived from rich natural resources exploited by an adequate industrial organization. The inevitable inference is at hand that we have known too little of these vital things—too little in view of the need of their mobilization to preserve our existence, and also, we now see, too little in order to secure the fullest and most economical national well-being, now that existence is preserved. The arts revealed as of such supreme importance for war are seen to be of a supreme significance also for peace.

This economic enlightenment is not all; we need more effective "Americanization." It has always been of the utmost moment in time of war that, in whatever it does, a nation shall act as one man. Cohesion within has ever been a precondition for successful defense as well as offense. Likemindedness in the face of national danger, expressed in loyalty and patriotism, has had a strong survival-value among the qualities of nations. Once it was only a certain controlling part of the people—those who had the say—who needed to hang together and hold their more or less inarticulate followers with them. But in this age all have a say, whether they use it or not; and for some time they have been inclined to avail themselves of it liberally. Hence it becomes important that public opinion shall fuse into one synchronizing rhythm in face of peril. That it did that in the recent wartime is attested by what is now history; but it could have done what it did still more nearly unanimously, more intelligently, and more quickly. Too much had to be explained, or powerfully suggested, before it was accepted. Too much had to be said about "What America Stands For"; and what had to be said must needs be translated into too many different languages.

There is no excuse for tolerating any foreign language at the expense of English. The most superficial student of history knows that community of tongue is almost a prerequisite to political cohesion. We must profit by our war experiences at least to the extent of revising our easy-going ways as respects this essential. Perhaps the literacy test for entrance into the country is altogether ill-advised; but a test in literacy on the basis of the national language should precede any conferring of the suffrage. The foreign language press is doubtless useful, or can be made so, in easing the transition to American citizenship for foreigners above school age; it should be confined to that function.

To return now to the need of Americanization as respects the fusing of public political opinion. Every native-born citizen ought to know what America stands for before he attains his majority; and every naturalized citizen ought to have learned that, as an essential prerequisite of naturalization. But such knowledge, while most nearly indispensable in time of stress, is scarcely less dispensable in ordinary times. This fact is ripe for acceptance, just after the war, as it could not be after a long period of peace, with its milder lights and less burning focusings.

Therefore, it seems that to instruction in national economic life there should be added, as a fundamental of American common-school education, instruction also in national political life—in American citizenship. But I hasten to qualify this term "citizenship." It does not mean merely "civics," or "civil government." These are important, though they have been taught in a mechanical, dry, and unilluminating way. It is not alone the mechanism of American government that the prospective citizen and voter ought to know. It is something wider, more vital, more interesting than that; something with perspective in it and capable of laying hold of the imagination. It is possible to learn the names of all the parts of a completed machine and stop there; but it is not interesting or "inspirational" to do so. Facts in themselves are not only the driest but also the least useful of things; while as the material out of which to build, say, an evolutionary theory, they are not only full of meaning, but they will also stick permanently in the mind.

In such considerations lies the answer to those who would find fault with the foregoing fundamentals—economic opportunity and citizenship—as materialistic, not providing for the imaginative and poetic elements, devoid of the æsthetic, artistic, and spiritual. This is no place to enter into controversy over the matter. There is not time or place for all sorts of studies; and it is not claimed that the ones here proposed would yield the type of poetic inspiration sought in courses where young children are called upon, for example, to identify, in "The Ancient Mariner," Coleridge's departures from the ballad form. But it is contended that the body of these subjects is fundamental to the purpose of common-school education; and that if they are treated aright, they are not devoid of appeal to faculties higher than the acquisitive. It is also contended that, in contradistinction to some of the fanciful subjects which aim directly at enlargement of the soul in the child, the ones proposed are capable of being understood by him; and that there is here a body of definite knowledge that can be taught, with the result of mental discipline and the strengthening of fibre in both individual and nation.

There is here no advocacy of courses for the schools in theoretical economics or politics. These are beyond many collegians. But it is possible by the use of simple language and direct and homely statement to teach children the real meaning of terms like capital, labor, money, speculation, competition, wages, profits, etc.—terms not seldom in these days so diversely conceived of as to produce uncomfortable, costly, and even perilous misunderstandings and enmities. It is not impossible to convey to a boy the working of the law of supply and demand or even of Gresham's Law. It is possible to make any subject recondite and intricate; and not impossible to convey an adequate working knowledge of a subject without pursuing it into its metaphysical phases. The line of safety is the adoption of the historical and evolutionary method: the letter of credit, for instance, becomes understandable the more readily in the light of its matter-of-fact origin, and so does many another economic device. Similarly as to the topics under citizenship. Any boy can be shown the evils of lawlessness and disorder, of weak and ambiguous government; he can be shown, in historical perspective, the pain and labor which the race has suffered in evolving the liberal political system which he enjoys and must presently uphold and defend. He can readily understand the blessings of freedom of conscience if he is aware of the conditions out of which that enfranchisement evolved. He can be shown that liberty is not to be got for the taking, but is bought at the price of eternal vigilance and responsibility, and can exist only under law. History is one long panorama of the evolution of such matters.

It is well for the individual to know such truths. It is practical to know them; and it is also enlarging to the mind and soul to imbibe them, as ideas so early and so thoroughly assimilated that they seem "natural" and underived. The perspective of their historical development is something that stimulates the imagination and fills the mind with thoughts that are above the commonplace. And if benefit to society be considered, it is well with any nation that has citizens whose heads are clear upon such fundamentals. They will be the less readily swept off their feet by the agitator, whose main stock in trade is highly colored promises of the impossible. They will possess, in their own minds, a touchstone upon which phantasms can not impinge without revealing their insubstantiality. Is there fear of Bolshevism in the United States? Not very much. And why not? Because our people are too wise. We can make them wiser still, and thus still more sturdily proof against anti-social notions.

A. G. KELLER

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little farther into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available without much trouble, through publisher, book-seller, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles are in no sense bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

China

IT should be remembered that in these articles no pretense is made to name the latest sources of information about the subjects discussed. Such sources to-day are, more than ever, the daily newspapers and weekly periodicals. Books, to be based upon any research, any consideration whatever, must follow the event by months, if not by years. With international politics as changeable, as apt to take unexpected shapes as the lava flow from a volcano, with industrial and social conditions similarly fluid and red-hot, the printed book, even of 1919 imprint, often can only be read to get a background for the news of the morning. Or it may help to make the news intelligible by showing what a different turn events have taken since the book was published.

William R. Wheeler, author of "China and the World War" (Macmillan, 1919), is a member of the faculty of Hangchow College. His book describes China's part in the war, epitomizes the Lansing-Ishii agreement between Japan and the United States re China, and the China-Japan military agreement of 1918. A Japanese view is in "Japan and World Peace" (Macmillan, 1919), by Kiyoshi K. Kawakami, who discusses Japan in the war, her relations to the League of Nations, the question of the Pacific Islands, the Japanese advance in China, and China's financial condition. The last subject is studied at length in Theodore W. Overlach's "Foreign Financial Control in China" (Macmillan, 1919), wherein a description of China's early foreign relations is followed by chapters taking up, country by country, the influence which the various nations have had upon China.

For her history, readers are referred to S. Wells Williams's "A History of China" (Scribners, 1901), a book composed of the historical chapters from the author's standard work, "The Middle Kingdom." A handy book, good for dates and quick reference, is "A Sketch of Chinese History" (Kelly and Walsh, 1915), by F. L. Hawks Pott, which gives a brief outline from earliest times, with maps. K. S. Latourette has written, in "The Development of China" (Houghton, 1917), a concise study of China's history and present problems, up to 1917.

For a detailed account of Chinese manners and customs, there is Arthur H. Smith's "Village Life in China" (Revell, 1899). H. A. Giles, professor of Chinese in Cambridge University, gives in "China and the Chinese" (Columbia Univ. Press, 1902) a brief book of lectures, taking up a number of interesting points, dispelling some old, popular errors. Law, government, taxation, business customs, banks, and railroads are treated in T. R. Jernigan's "China in Law and Commerce" (Macmillan, 1905), while Edward A. Ross's "The Changing Chinese" (Century, 1911) is a readable book upon the new tendencies, such as the anti-opium and anti-foot-binding agitations. Our late minister to China, Paul S. Reinsch, includes India, Japan, and China in his "Intellectual and Political Currents in the Far East" (Houghton, 1911). K. K. Kawakami, author of "Japan in World Politics" (Macmillan, 1917), as well as the later book, previously mentioned, is a Japanese, eager to promote good relations between Japan and America. He writes of China in this book, and of all phases of Japanese-American relations. In Stanley K. Hornbeck's "Contempo-“Crocker-Wheeler Motors have the confidence and endorsement of electrical manufacturers who insist on engineering as one of the requisites in the motors they buy.

Engineering

“Duplication has never been a part of the C-W plan. Origination and hard and fast principles of engineering have marked the company’s substantial progress.

“The dependable character of C-W motors meets every demand expected from motors of quality.”

W. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

JADE AMULETS
NECKLACES RINGS AND CHARMS

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Hotel Puritan
390 Commonwealth Avenue
Boston

The atmosphere and equipment of the Puritan are unusual in an American public house.

Globe trotters say it is one of the most homelike and attractive hotels in the world. Rates are reasonable.

Motorists, send for our booklet with guide to Boston and historic vicinity.

R. E. COSTELLO, Manager.

rary Politics in the Far East" (Appleton, 1916) there are sections devoted to China and to Japan, considering the relations of both with America and with Germany.

China is a fascinating subject, and out of regard for my readers' own enjoyment, I can lose no opportunity to urge them to try to see, at some large reference or university library, H. A. Giles's "A Chinese Biographical Dictionary" (Quaritch, 1897), one of the most curious and charming books imaginable. Another work, entertaining and valuable, is "China under the Empress Dowager" (Lippincott, 1914), in which J. O. P. Bland and E. Backhouse depict life in Peking and the intrigues of the old, Imperial Court. Li Hung Chang's memoirs (or autobiography—I am not where I can verify the title) is also certainly to be read, for pleasure and profit.

EDWARD LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

- Aumonier, Stacy. The Querrils. Century. $1.60.
Akins, Zoë. Cake Upon the Waters. Century. $1.35.
Barbour, R. H. and Holt, H. P. Fortunes of War. Century. $1.50.
De Morgan, William. The Old Madhouse. Holt. $1.90 net.
Duhamel, Georges. The Heart's Domain. Century. $1.50.

- Gilchrist, B. B. The Camerons of Highboro. Century. $1.35.
Knipe, E. B. and A. A. Vive La France. Century. $1.50.
Kreutz, R. J. Captain Zillner, a Human Document. Second edition. Hodder & Stoughton.
Macdonald, F. C. Sorcery. Century Co. $1.35.
Morley, Christopher and Haley, Bart. In the Sweet Dry and Dry. Boni & Liveright. $1.50 net.
Oemler, M. C. A Woman Named Smith. Century.
Pertwee, Roland. The Old Card. Boni & Liveright. $1.60.
"Sapper." Mufti. Doran. $1.50 net.
The Story of a Lover. Boni & Liveright. $1.50 net.
Woden, George. Little Houses: A Tale of Past Years. Dutton. $1.90.

ART

The War in Cartoons. Compiled and edited by G. J. Hecht. Dutton. $2.50 net.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

- Hyndman, H. M. Clemenceau. The Man and His Time. Stokes.
Runtz-Rees, C. Charles de Saintemarthé, 1512-1555. Paris: Librairie Ancienne Honoré Champion.
Young, Norwood. Frederick the Great. Holt. $2.50 net.

DRAMA AND POETRY

- Smith, J. T., Jr. Haunts and By-Paths and Other Poems. Stokes. $1.25 net.
Maynard, Theodore. Poems. Stokes. $1.35 net.
Towne, C. H. A World of Windows. Doran. $1.25 net.
McCoy, Samuel. Merchants of the Morning. Doran. $1.25 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

- Corelli, Marie. My "Little Bit." Doran. $1.75 net.
Baker, R. P. Engineering Education: Essays for English. John T. Wiley & Sons, Inc.
GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS
Barker, J. E. Modern Germany. Dutton. $6.00 net.
Chung, Henry. The Oriental Policy of the United States. Revell. $2.00 net.
Dawson, W. H. The Evolution of Modern Germany. New and Revised edition. Scribner. $5.00.
Nordentoft, Severin. Practical Pacifism and its Adversaries. Stokes. $1.50 net.
Pepper, C. M. American Foreign Trade. Century. $2.50 net.
Turner, E. R. Ireland and England. Century. $3.00.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

A History of the New Thought Movement. Edited by Horatio W. Dresser. Crowell.

SCIENCE

- Dunlop, J. M. Anatomical Diagrams For the Use of Art Students. Macmillan.
Fabre, J. H. Field, Forest and Farm. Century. $2.00.
March, N. H. Towards Racial Health. Dutton. $2.00 net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

Footner, Hulbert. New Rivers of the North. Doran. $2.00 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Taillandier, Madame Sainte-René. The Soul of the "C. R. B." Scribner. $1.75 net.
Woolcott, Alexander. The Command is Forward. Century. $1.75.

The Review is Established

as an organ of sane American opinion; it has found a definite place in American journalism; it is read in more than 600 libraries in every state in the Union; it is quoted every week by newspapers throughout the country.

Can you afford to be without THE REVIEW?

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 20

New York, Saturday, September 27, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	417
Editorial Articles:
Basing Industry upon Principle	419
Holland and Belgium	420
The New Army Plans	421
Restriction of Output	422
Photo Music	423
"Anti-Wilson." By H. deW. F.	424
The Fatal Defect of the Cummins Bill. By Thomas F. Woodlock	425
"Soldier, Soldier, Come from the Wars—" By Robert P. Utter	427
Correspondence	428
Book Reviews:
Frederick the Great	430
Square and Sphere	431
The Status of German Socialists	432
A Journalist in the Far East	433
The Run of the Shelves	433
The Redemption of Philadelphia. By Edward Fuller	434
Drama:
The Re-Opened Theatre. By O. W. Firkins	435
Books and the News: Treaties. By Edmund Lester Pearson	436

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

THE fight on the Treaty continues. Last week its opponents were making the most of the disclosures of Bullitt, but the sting has been extracted from them by Mr. Lansing's handsome appeal to the people to ratify the Treaty without delay. This week there is chuckling over the defection of Senators Thomas, of Colorado, and Hoke Smith, of Georgia. The real test will come with the vote on the Johnson amendment. Meanwhile, evidence is accumulating in support of the belief that the Treaty will hardly be ratified without some reservations. That enough votes can be obtained to send it back to Conference is most improbable. The break in the Democratic ranks seems rather to imply that the moderate reservationists will receive enough backing to make their views prevail. The country is very evidently tired of the confusion which has thus far characterized the Senate's action and would be only too glad to see the interpretative reservations in question put speedily into the Treaty and the document ratified.

IT is unfortunate that in discussion on the League certain points which in themselves are not likely to cause serious trouble have not received frank treatment. The President in answering the objection that the British Empire could outvote the United States in the League rested his case upon the understanding that the vote of the Council must be unanimous and that therefore the veto of this country would entirely protect our interests. Senator Reed has undoubtedly scored by immediately introducing the reply to Sir Robert Borden made by Clémenceau, Wilson, and Lloyd George. Asked whether in their opinion representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire might be selected as members of the Council, they answered in the affirmative. Similarly, Mr. Wilson left something to be desired when he gave it as his view that the Irish problem might properly be a subject for discussion by the League. The inference was inevitable that the League might also address itself to the status of the Philippines. Why should not the President have admitted this? It is not now a question whether such objections to the Covenant are vital; it is the President's attitude which must give some concern. From a champion of the League who, presumably, has a better understanding of its workings than any of his fellow-countrymen one expects the utmost frankness.

ONE tires a little of the tendency to prove a point, or to justify a course of action, or perhaps merely to stir up trouble, by uncorroborated assertions that Theodore Roosevelt did say so and so, or by stout insistence that he would say so and so if he were living. Admiral von Tirpitz supplies an instance by stating that Roosevelt, on the occasion of his last visit, said to him personally, "Germany must take Holland." If Roosevelt were living to answer, it is pretty safe to say that no such statement would have been ventured. It is absolutely out of harmony with every probability in the case, and the standing of the Admiral is not such as to give it credit. Senator Hiram Johnson has been making energetic use of what Roosevelt "would have said" in opposition to the ratification of the Peace Treaty, and the President has just been brought to book for using certain of the Colonel's words as a recommendation of the League. It would show a little more respect for Mr. Roosevelt's memory to quote only such statements as he actually did make, with no effort to wrest them out of their natural meaning, or stretch them unduly in their application. When Mr. Roosevelt was here to speak for himself, it was a pretty dangerous business to attempt to put one's own meaning into his words, or to claim his support for a position on which he had not declared himself. If those who would use his reputation now to further their own views are not a little more careful, some of our skilled mediums may yet be reporting from the other side a few more elections to membership in the famous "Ananias Club."

AS the Review goes to press, the strike among the steel workers has not developed far enough to warrant prediction as to its outcome. Figures concerning the number of men actually out are conflicting, and one may well doubt the ability of either side to give accurate information on the subject. Disorder has promptly raised its head, and it is unfortunate for the credit of the strike, if it has any justifiable basis, that its chief promoter, William Z. Foster, has in the past put forth a pamphlet in support of many of the most revolutionary demands of the "Bolshevistic" wing of labor agitation. The owners of industries, according to this pamphlet, are merely "thieves who must be stripped of their booty," not men who need to be brought by orderly methods to agree to a just distribution of the fruits of industry. Such expressions, until definitely recanted, will not gain support for the strike with the great majority of the American people.

If American sentiment is now more sensitive than ever to all just demands of the laboring classes, it is also more sensitive than ever to the danger of pressing those demands by means radically at war with the orderly progress of civilized society. There is a very general impression that the present strike would not have occurred save for the temporary dominance of this tendency to violence. This has put the public on its guard, and there are so far no signs that the strike is "popular" with unbiased observers. On the other hand, there is every evidence short of positive statement that many prominent labor leaders themselves regarded it as unwise and used their influence, under cover, to prevent it. It has also been known from the start that a very large portion of the men employed had no grievances to press at this time and no desire whatever for a strike. A large portion of those who have gone out have done so under compulsion and contrary to their own judgment. If all this were not true, there would doubtless be a very strong popular feeling that Judge Gary was wrong in refusing the conference asked by the promoters of the strike. As it is, there are many who feel that such a conference could have been granted and conducted without sacrifice of the principle of the open shop—a principle which can not be universally yielded without a loss of individual liberty hardly consistent with the continuance of a free state.

THE Italian Government will not use Italian troops against D'Annunzio's forces in Fiume, and we hope that the Entente will be deaf to Mr. Nitti's reported appeal for armed intervention. For abstention from action is the wisest course that could be taken at this juncture. An armed attack on the adventurous poet, even though it were crowned with success, would add lustre to his person and gain him the sympathy which heroic martyrdom always evokes. But the enthusiasm and its attending glory will soon lose their glamour when the enterprise ends in an ignoble struggle against starvation. Unless the poet's coup is soon overtaken by its failure, we shall witness an epidemic of D'Annunzi-itis. Danzig is first on the programme, to judge from hints in the German press. Gerhard Hauptmann may there find a welcome opportunity to recover a fame which his feeble war poetry has sadly impaired. Maurice Maeterlinck may be the next to follow Gabriele's lead in forcing his way, at the head of Belgian troops, into Maastricht. And some modern Tyrtaeus can make himself famous overnight by the surprise of a Thracian fortress in defiance of the principal Allied and Associated Powers.

THE most striking feature of the peace terms presented to Bulgaria is their lack of "finish." The two most vexed problems are left unsettled. "The question of inducing Rumania to cede to Bulgaria that portion of Dobrudja which is wholly Bulgarian in character will be taken up later," we read in a summary. This confession of inability, on the part of the Entente, to bring one of its recalcitrant members to reason is sadly misplaced in a document that prescribes to a defeated foe. Western Thrace is to be ceded to the principal Allied and Associated Powers, but how they will dispose of it does not appear from the treaty. It only guarantees to Bulgaria an economic outlet to the Aegean Sea and assigns to the Powers the right to return all or part of the territory to Bulgaria, or transfer part to Greece and incorporate the remainder with Eastern Thrace as an international state, or, maybe, defer the disposal of it to the Greek calends. This evasion of the real issue will prove the source of new strife and unrest. For the Greeks the indefinite status of Thrace will be an inducement to fresh agitation, to which the Bulgarians will not fail to respond in the true Balkanese spirit. And this perpetuation of unsettledness will bring grist to the German mill. The more the small nations of Central and Eastern Europe spill their energies in fighting among themselves, the easier it will be for Germany to restore her economic life and recapture her former position on the world market. We have the authority of Mr. Morgenthau for saying this.

IT was the part of wisdom in Boston labor organizations to recede from the first impulse towards a general strike in support of the Boston policemen. When brought to the test, public sentiment was neither slow nor uncertain in declaring its opinion that there can be no toleration of strikes by men to whom the immediate safety of the lives and property of all is entrusted, under sworn obligation to fidelity. There is a principle involved here on which there can be no compromise. And a similar crisis might show that the classes of workmen who must be exempted from the privilege of striking do not stop merely with the police and fire departments. If there is any other class without whose uninterrupted service the really vital functions of a civilized state of society can not continue, it should be included. We are not interested at this time to show just where the limit of the right to strike should be drawn. It may take a very careful study to determine that question, with justice and safety to all concerned. The point of importance just now, to labor organizations and the public alike, is the clear and final recognition that there is such a limit.

And in the definite recognition of this fact, the just interests of labor will make a distinct gain. Let it be once understood that all laborers who are entrusted with these vital functions of organized society have renounced all claim to the right to force an increase of wages, or other concessions, by the strike method, and it will be found that society will very gladly deal generously with them in answer to this spirit of loyalty to duty. This limitation of the right to strike will not diminish the effectiveness of the weapon where it is legitimately used for securing justice. Most people are willing to admit that employers of labor are sometimes hopelessly arbitrary. There are few who would say to-day that a strike is never justifiable in such cases, if there has first been an honest endeavor to settle the controversy by less drastic means. A strike can win public sympathy only as it meets with these conditions. And when it does meet with them, its power to secure the justice desired will be definitely increased by every concession that organized labor has made in the way of safeguarding society against the dangerous abuses to which the method of the strike is always liable.

CALIFORNIA is a land of contradictions. Her grape growers are ruined by prohibition, and yet they are selling their product for more than four times what they got for it before the war. California, we are told, elected Wilson, and supports Hiram Johnson. But now she has surpassed herself. With a duplicity perhaps learned from the Oriental denizens, she has extended to the President a welcome that for ambiguity leaves nothing to be desired. She looked upon him, apparently, "with one auspicious and one dropping eye." She must have greeted him with words modeled upon the impartial utterances of the Delphic Oracle. How otherwise could the correspondent of the New York Times report that "great crowds gave him a generous welcome," whereas of precisely the same crowd at precisely the same time the correspondent of the New York Sun is obliged to say that "Wilson meets much hostility in Los Angeles"? Can it be merely a matter of whether you believe—or your paper for you—that a failure to ratify the League will plunge the world into chaos or that its ratification marks the end of American liberty? Or is it rather an example of the futility of trying to draw conclusions from the behavior of a crowd that comes out to hear the President? A President can always get a crowd; and among them there will always be some who come to scoff and some to praise and a great many to gape and shout. Is anybody the wiser for this Presidential parade 'cross country and its Senatorial trailer? Certainly not, if its significance is to be interpreted for us in any such prejudiced way as this. If trained observers on the spot can't come nearer to agreement in estimating the temper of a crowd, it must be because the crowd failed to express itself very definitely. Maybe it was too engrossed in wondering when this whole business is coming to a settlement.

MR. PADEREWSKI has been playing an eloquent accompaniment to Mr. Wilson's plea for speedy ratification. He seems to fear that a prolonged delay will be the prelude to Poland's marche funèbre. Maintaining a front line of 1,500 miles against Bolshevik forces, hampered by a shortage of food supplies, clothing, and many other necessities of life, the country will not be able to endure the tax upon its strength very much longer, unless it have the assurance that it can appeal for aid in the righting of its wrongs to the impartial tribunal of the League of Nations. It is not military support the country wants but a moral protecting power that will furnish it the opportunity of solving its difficulties. Mr. Paderewski may be trusted to touch the right chord. Of course, the strain patiently borne for the upkeep of a numerous army is all for the benefit of civilization, which owes its safety from Bolshevik inroads to the Polish front line of 1,500 miles. And with such ardor Poland, in her exhausted state, discharges her duty to mankind that the Supreme Council in Paris has found it necessary to protect her against herself. "The Supreme Council," we read in a special cable to the New York Times, "in a few days will probably call on Poland to cease pressing operations against the Russian Bolsheviks. This step does not mean love for the Bolsheviks, but consideration for Poland. In other words, the Peace Conference was satisfied to have Poland fight the Bolsheviks in self-defense, but now that her armies have in some regions penetrated 200 miles into Russian territory the Conference begins to believe that the necessity for self-defense has passed." Mr. Paderewski will doubtless rejoice at the promptness with which his appeal for moral support has received an answer from Paris. This will enable him to withdraw his troops without laying himself open to the blame that, for selfish reasons, he left Europe and civilization without defense.

HERR SCHEIDEMANN, since he resigned as Prime Minister, has turned his black bourgeois coat inside out and parades the red lining. On his return from Switzerland he has seen occasion to denounce his comrade and former colleague, Gustav Noske, the German Minister of Defense, as "a tool of the military reactionaries," expressing thereby, according to Vorwärts, "what millions of Germans are thinking." There is nothing new or startling in the statement, for millions of foreigners have not only been thinking but saying so. What surprises us, however, is the confession of Vorwärts that these millions of Germans are only thinking but not saying it. Do they still silently submit to the wrongs under which they suffer from a life-long habit of moral cowardice, or is the dictatorship of Herr Noske maintained by forcibly muzzling public opinion? Herr Scheidemann's attack coincided with a sally of M. Longuet in the French Chamber of Deputies. M. Longuet belongs to the extreme left of the French Socialists and is, consequently, bitterly opposed to what he calls "this peace of injustice and violence." It was Bismarckian, he said, and marked the advent of a reactionary Utopia. And by way of illustration he declared that "Gustav Noske still had under arms 1,200,000 men." M. Longuet seemed to imply that the German Minister could not be in command of such a force, in defiance of the peace terms ratified by Germany, unless the Great Powers connived at the infraction.

THE Guaranty Trust Company of New York has issued a booklet on "The Solvency of the Allies," giving a brief analytic study of the war debts, internal and external, of Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Italy, with some account of the resources available for their payment. The general conclusion of the study is hopeful, and if none of the countries involved allows itself to be overwhelmed in a flood of Bolshevistic radicalism, the regaining of solid financial ground should be steady and fairly rapid. Barring any such catastrophe as we have mentioned, the concerted effort of financial leaders in all lands will be brought to bear upon the problems of reconstruction with an accuracy of knowledge, and to an extent, never even approximately reached in the period of recovery from any previous war. The condition of Italy gives most cause for uneasiness, her debt amounting to about three-fourths of her entire national wealth, if the current estimate of that wealth, between sixteen and seventeen billions of dollars, is to be taken as fairly correct. It is evident that she will sorely need the aid of outside investors in financing her industries, present and potential, through the period of reconstruction. But if the raid upon Fiume by D'Annunzio and his deluded followers is to be taken as the prelude to continued disorders of the same type, it need hardly be stated that the aid of investors from without will be out of the question.

Basing Industry Upon Principle

THE disturbed condition of labor emphasizes the difficulty of the problems with which the coming industrial conference, summoned by the President, will be called upon to deal. It is well not to count too much upon immediate remedies. The difficulties, at least some of them, are fundamental and require the most careful discussion, if any permanent progress is to result. Added to the obstacles which in normal times any such conference would have to face is an attitude set up by the hope of all sorts of post-war readjustments. We have been encouraged to believe by many leaders of opinion that a new order of civilization is coming into being wherein the weak will receive justice equally with the strong. Every right-feeling person certainly desires such a consummation. But "justice," like "truth," is a concept upon which agreement is often most difficult, and, in a period of quick changes in many spheres of activities such as we are now passing through, eternal vigilance is needed, lest in the name of justice we yield to the advocate of panaceas.

The President has stated that he looks to see the relation of labor and capital put upon a new footing. If he means by this that he will insist upon a thorough discussion of principles, he can do the country an enormous service. He will also add to the confidence of the country in him if he will clearly indicate that he does not hesitate to call labor and capital equally to account, should either become obstreperous. One point should be brought out plainly at the start, that one's first allegiance is to the state and that any organization which threatens the orderly process of the law will feel the hand of the Government upon it. The need of a specific statement to this effect is all the more urgent because of recent outgivings by quick-thinking radicals. So, in its issue of September 20, the Nation says, with reference to the strike of the Boston policemen:

We suggest that President Wilson, Governor Coolidge and those who believe that loyalty to the state is paramount, forestall such happenings by showing cause for their belief instead of abandoning themselves to mere oburgation and scurrility.

And even if the obligation of a policeman is as sacred and direct as that of a soldier, the Nation is not put out of countenance. In the new order the soldier, too, is within his rights if he questions authority: "Suppose, on occasion, the soldiers ask, Why?"

This particular consideration will, no doubt, tax to the utmost the President's statesmanship. Labor has always fought any suggestion that it should be respon-

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION

140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

sible, short of crime, to the Government. But if the President really has in mind a new understanding, he can not fail to see that any association which exerts as much influence on trade as organized labor can now compass must, if it is not to overstep itself, be conscious of a definite restraint imposed upon its activities. Whether this can be brought about by incorporation, which unions oppose, or by other means is a subject for study. When the trusts operated in restraint of trade, public agitation began which resulted in the Sherman anti-Trust law. Fortunately, the strike of the Boston policemen, following upon the tie-up of subway and elevated trains in New York, has served to open the public's eyes to the serious disturbances which it is in for unless some principle of responsibility on the part of labor is soon firmly established. What organized labor has apparently failed to see is that such an arrangement would, in the long run, help its cause with the public. Once it is understood that labor is willing to submit to legal control similar to that which applies to its employers, and is not seeking lawlessly to advance its interests, popular sympathy in particular cases of unfair dealing will be easier to obtain.

Yet little can be accomplished by new statutes unless a spirit of sportsmanship is fostered. The Conference should not be made the occasion for delivering ultimata. Capital has amends to make. The spirit of the times requires that labor should not cherish the feeling that it is not getting its just share. This is a problem in the discussion of which it ought to be possible to get down to brass tacks. We need, above all, a frank presentation by capitalists of the workings of their industries. It has been said that, in the present state of reduced production, labor is getting more than its share. Here figures can help, and we believe that, if the Conference could obtain the coöperation of a few heads of large businesses, it might do much to remove the suspicions of labor. The whole country feels the pinch of high prices, and labor, naturally, is the first to cry out. Yet if it can be shown that there is no sovereign remedy, that capital, even if it would, could not entirely cure the evil, certainly not for the present, and that both capital and labor can obtain mutual benefits, perhaps considerable benefits, by getting together in the spirit of friendly collaborators, a hopeful beginning will be made.

The course which should be steered at the Conference is difficult yet plain to the eye. In so mixed an assembly there will be the danger, on the one hand, of much talk and no conclusions; and, on the other, of too hasty action. What is desired is an insistence on solid principles as a basis of agreement.

Holland and Belgium

THE reported breach in the diplomatic relations between Holland and Belgium has not come unexpectedly. On June 4 of this year the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the five principal Allied and Associated Powers decided that to a committee of representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and Holland the task should be delegated "of examining the measures which must result from a revision of the treaty of 1839, and to formulate proposals which may not involve either a transference of territorial sovereignty or the imposition of international servitudes." For two months this Committee of Fourteen has sat in Paris and studied the means wherewith to build a bridge between the minimum of Belgian demands and the extreme limit of Holland's concessions. The latter were thus formulated by the chief representative of the Netherland Government, Jonkheer De Marees van Swinderen: 1. Holland is willing to discuss an extension of the present regulations for the common control of the Scheldt as far as navigation is concerned, so that the Scheldt would ever answer to the increasing requirements of shipping; 2. Holland will, in principle, not raise objections to the digging of a Scheldt-Meuse-Rhine canal across Dutch territory, provided an arrangement be made to establish adequate connections between such a canal and Dutch waterways; 3. neither will Holland, in principle, object to the digging of a canal across Dutch territory from Antwerp to the Moerdijk; 4. Holland is prepared to make improvements in the Ghent-Terneuzen canal, on condition that the brunt of the cost be borne by Belgium.

But the Belgian delegates were not to be satisfied by these concessions. They demanded for Belgium the right to have all improvements for shipping purposes made by, and at the expense of, Holland, and the free disposal of both embankments of the Scheldt for the execution of these works. But the Netherland delegates refused to consider these claims as amounting to a cession of "territorial sovereignty and an imposition of international servitudes," which, according to the decision of June 4, might not be involved in the committee's proposals.

The discussions had practically come to a deadlock, when an incident occurred which made matters worse: The Flemish Press Bureau at The Hague published the text of a confidential note alleged to have been addressed by Mr. P. Hymans, the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the Belgian Army Headquarters. In this document a plan was unfolded for a secret propaganda among the inhabitants of the Netherland province of Limburg, which, in spite of the decision of June 4, is still claimed for Belgium by a small but powerful group of annexationists. "Every Belgian agent in those parts must help, to the measure of his capacities, to bring about the return of the province to the mother country," is the general injunction to these secret propagandists.

To call Belgium the mother country of Dutch Limburg is just as absurd as to call Jugo-Slavia the mother country of Fiume. For the greater part of that province belonged to Dutch territory at a time when the Kingdom of Belgium did not yet exist. What is now called Belgium was known, before the French Revolution, as the Southern Netherlands, which never, since 1585, enjoyed an independent status. From that year until 1713 they were a Spanish possession; at the Peace of Utrecht Spain ceded them to Austria; in 1793 they were conquered by the French, and, after Napoleon's fall, the Allied Powers, which had wrested them from France, considered themselves entitled to decide their fate, as Austria did not desire to have her former possession returned to her. The union of Holland and the Southern Netherlands as effected by the Allied Powers proved, after a fifteen years' trial, an utter failure, so that, when the Belgians revolted in 1830, the same Powers intervened to untie the knot they had ineffectively made. The guiding principle adopted by them in establishing the basis of the separation was thus formulated: 1. "The Dutch frontiers shall enclose the whole of the territory, all fortified towns, boroughs and places, which in the year 1793 formed part of the late Republic of the United Provinces. 2. Belgium shall include all that remains of the territory which in the treaties of 1815 was given the name of Kingdom of the Netherlands, with the exception of the Grand-Duchy of Luxemburg, which, placed under the authority of the Princes of Orange-Nassau by virtue of a different title, forms and will continue to form part of the German League." Only in one respect was this principle qualified by a provision in Article X of the so-called "Bases de Separation": "As the consequence of the principles laid down in Articles I and II would be that Belgium and Holland would own enclaves on one another's territories, arrangements and exchanges between the two countries shall be effected through the good offices of the five Powers, which will assure the complete continuity of their territories and the free intercourse between the towns and places situated within their boundaries."

In accordance with this provision, the King of the Netherlands received additional territory in Limburg in exchange for a part of Luxemburg, which he ceded to Belgium. There is no ground, therefore, in the contention of the Belgian annexationists that Belgium, in 1839, was robbed by Holland of Limburg. The greater part of that province had belonged to the Dutch ever since the peace of Westphalia, and the territory which was added to it in 1839 Holland received by an exchange to which Belgium herself was a party.

The secret note to the Army Headquarters, having stated an historical falsehood in its preamble, proceeded to give detailed instructions as to the manner in which the propaganda should be conducted. The passage which caused the greatest indignation in Holland was a hint to the Belgian agents "to give expression, every day at every possible occasion, to their gratitude for the good services tendered by the Limburgers to the Belgian refugees during the war." To forge a weapon against Holland out of the hospitality shown by one of her provinces to Belgian people is, to say the least, a perverse form of gratitude.

As the Belgian Legation at The Hague failed to issue a denial of the charge against the Brussels Government implied by this revelation of the Flemish Press Bureau, the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs felt called upon to ask for enlightenment at Brussels, and a few days later he announced that he had received the complete and authentic text, and that a great part of it had already been published in the press. That meant, translated from diplomatic into straightforward language, that the version which had been published in the press did not call for correction.

Such underhand dealings are scarcely calculated to bring the Dutch-Belgian negotiations in Paris to a satisfactory conclusion. The certainty on either side that the other party will proceed with absolute fairness is a conditio sine qua non for the success of these transactions. The incident has called forth sharp criticism of Mr. Hymans from several organs of the Belgian press, and in so far it has had a good effect, as it has provoked an up to now indifferent public opinion to unambiguous repudiation of the annexationists' aims. De Standaard, a Flemish paper published at Brussels, denounced them in fiercer terms than the Dutch papers employ, which are always more temperate in tone. "In our negotiations with Holland," says De Standaard, "the motive powers are downright annexationists, who would prefer a rupture with Holland to a partial satisfaction of their dreams. In constantly widening circles one gains the conviction that Mr. Hymans' policy will prove fatal to Belgium. Only the political truce has thus far protected him in Parliament. But he will not remain scot-free very much longer; his secret note has aroused too much resentment to leave his position unshaken."

Mr. Hymans seems determined to bring the annexationist issue to a head while the truce still lasts. The Minister is playing a dangerous game, for if it is true, as M. François Dessain, as spokesman of Cardinal Mercier, is reported to have said, that "many Belgians would welcome war," the war with Holland will lead to civil war in Belgium. For the Flemish people, who contribute 70 per cent. to the Belgian army, are opposed to annexation and an armed attack on the sister state. The Gallophil Government of Brussels is hated in Flanders, and Mr. Hymans might take the warning contained in the bitter attacks of the Standaard and other Flemish organs on what they call his "fatal" management of the country's foreign affairs.

The New Army Plans

CONGRESS has before it two well-balanced schemes for army reorganization—the Wadsworth Bill, representing the views of the General Staff, and the Chamberlain Bill, deriving from the Training Camps Association. The bills agree in the essentials that military training should be required of all young Americans, and that the organization should be in divisions of all arms, preserving as far as possible the designations made historic in the recent war. The Chamberlain Bill does not require universal service, assuming that an adequate army reserve can be had by voluntary enlistment. The required period of training would be six months, between the ages of 18 and 20. Those who entered the reserve would be subject to at least three weeks' additional training for three separate years—nine weeks in all during a five years' enlistment. Vocational instruction would be given so far as possible.

The Wadsworth Bill calls for universal service as well as training. In his twentieth year every physically fit young man would be called to three months' intensive training in camp, and would remain a member of the army for two years thereafter, subject only to report in time of peace. There is no provision for vocational training.

As to the size of the Regular Army, the bills differ radically. The Chamberlain Bill calls for a regular force of 225,000, with a reserve dependent on enlistment and wholly indefinite. The Wadsworth Bill fixes 510,000 as the peace strength of the Regular Army, with about 1,000,000 of reserves. Secretary Baker has recently insisted before the Military Committee of the House that no smaller force is safe, considering our prospective military responsibilities. This regular force could be quickly swelled to about 1,500,000 by calling the two trained classes to the colors, while the new classes would normally come out of the training camps at the rate of over 500,000 every year. This constitutes a military provision sufficient for any conceivable case of war, and yet not burdensome on the youth of the nation. To give three months to camp training in one's twentieth year can not be called a heavy sacrifice.

The two bills, agreeing on compulsory military training, differ quite radically as to the composition of the nation's army. The Chamberlain Bill appeals to the old volunteer spirit, and should provide a reserve force very similar to the British Territorials, who served brilliantly in every theatre of the late war. It is assumed that if you train 500,000 men every year, enough of them will develop military spirit to furnish a sufficient reserve, and this reserve will be a corps d'élite, like the best of the British Territorials and of our own National Guard. The Wadsworth Bill virtually rejects the volunteer idea. The enlisted line is to be just the average youth of the nation, taken as it comes along. Unquestionably this is the democratic plan. The nation requires the necessary military service of everyone impartially, depending on no one's good will, self-sacrifice or love of adventure. It makes a pure business of its army concerns, knows exactly what it can count on and when.

A weak point in the Wadsworth Bill is the half-million regulars required. Presumably it is hoped to attract them by the allurements of vocational education. This hope would probably be disappointed; it would hardly be found possible to recruit the Regular Army to the desired figure. There are distinct limitations to the schooling of soldiers and sailors, as has already been demonstrated in the Navy for many years. For instructors you depend on your officers, and, Mr. Daniels to the contrary notwithstanding, it doesn't follow that your capable army or navy officer is a zealous and effective pedagogue of non-military lore. Much is being done to improve general instruction in the Army, but the time is still far distant when the recruiting offices will be thronged simply because of the army schools. We believe with General Wood that the lower figure, 225,000, for the Regular Army would be adequate, and that in maintaining the larger figure Mr. Baker is playing for safety in case the Staff Bill should fail in Congress.

Aside from cutting down the figure, the Wadsworth Bill could be much improved by requiring a month in continuation camp for every member of the national army. The second-camp men would be an immense resource in the instruction of the new recruits. Their presence would speed up the training and double its value. Each second-camp man would fix the knowledge partly gained in his first camp, and would come out a soldier indeed. In the second camp, too, the officer material would emerge clearly. In the second camp the men, who will have received only pin money during their first training, should receive the pay of their rank. The plan of holding a million men, very slightly trained, to report to duty would almost certainly result in wholesale evasion and confusion of all sorts. A continuation camp would avoid all this, provide better training, and assure the army of the control of its invisible force. The second camp also would be the time to sort out the men into appropriate special services. Without it, the engineers and artillery, for example, would be relatively far below the infantry in efficiency. With the extra month, the special divisional services could be tried out under service conditions without cutting into the infantry training, which is fundamental for all branches.

In the matter of general army organization the Wadsworth bill, as Senator Chamberlain has cogently shown, has many questionable features. It multiplies generalcies beyond all needs of the service, increases the already exaggerated powers of the Chief of Staff, and disregards both economy and impartiality in promotion and appointment of personnel. Congress may be trusted not to vote away at once its own powers and those of the civil executive.

The relation of the National Guard to army reorganization is a minor consideration. Our militia system is as obsolete as the military corset and shako. The Guard will have to adapt itself to whatever reasonable system is adopted. Under the Wadsworth Bill it would come off very well. From the millions of young men who have completed their military service, the National Guard would find ideal recruits and officers, and could readily be shaped into a compact and effective second line. Under the Chamberlain Bill the Guard would meet the formidable competition of the volunteer reserve, and would be in danger of extinction. This would be a pity, for, anomalous and costly as the Guard is, it represents a fine tradition and a valuable military good-will which should be utilized.

Apart from any question as to the desirability of either bill for the fundamental purpose which it is designed to serve, the merits of that fundamental purpose itself demand more ample consideration than has yet been given to them. Before adopting either, Congress and the public should thoroughly weigh the question whether the present situation of our country and the world makes it desirable that the nation should commit itself at this moment to the policy either of universal military training or of universal military service.

Restriction of Output

BEFORE the war the statement was frequently made—and by people who should have known better—that capitalism had solved the problem of production. Assured of an abundant supply of necessaries and comforts, society, it was said, might now give chief attention to the more important question of distribution, in order that the good things of life might be more fairly divided among the rival claimants—landowners, capitalists, business men, wage-earners, the Government, objects of benevolence, and what other participants there may be. An error such as this is not, of course, the cause of the bitter conflict over the joint product, but rather a sort of echo of it. It rests on a half-conscious assumption in the minds of ignorant partisans, who imagine an enormous surplus income that does not exist, and fail to realize that in the quarrel about the divisor the dividend itself is in danger of being reduced. The very persons who are in a constant state of militancy over the question of the exact percentage of the product that should go to capital insist upon reducing the total product by all manner of restrictions.

The example of the restrictions imposed by British trade unions shows to what lengths this pernicious policy can go, and how it threatens the foundations of national prosperity. A partial list of the union regulations prevailing in Great Britain before the war was published in the London Times in January, 1917, and is well worth quoting:

They embrace not only the standard rate of wages, and the length of the normal working day, together with arrangements for overtime, night work, Sunday duty, mealtimes and holidays, but also the exact class of operatives, apprenticed or skilled, semi-skilled or unskilled, laborers or women, to be engaged or not engaged for various kinds of work, upon particular processes or with different types of machines; whether non-unionists should be employed at all; what processes should be employed for particular tasks; what machines should be used for particular jobs; how machines should be placed in relation to each other, and the speed with which they should be worked; whether one operative should complete a whole job, or attend only to one machine, or form part of a team of specialized operatives each doing a different process; what wages, if any, should be paid in the intervals between jobs, or whilst waiting for material, and what notice of termination of engagement should be given; whether the boys or girls or young persons should be employed at all, or in what processes or with what machine, or in what proportion to adult workmen; whether remuneration should be by time or by the piece and under what conditions, at what rates or with what allowances, and—but by no means universally existing—what amount of output by each operative should be considered a full day's work, not to be considerably exceeded under penalty of the serious displeasure of the workshop.

During the first year of the war, under pressure of military necessity, a truce was effected between the employers and the unions, especially in munitions factories, by which some of the most burdensome restrictions were temporarily given up, with the result that, with the coöperation of other factors, production per operative was greatly increased—in some factories as much as 100 per cent. And yet, now that the war is over, the unions demand that the restrictions be restored, or else that they be given an equivalent in the form of nationalization or drastic reduction of hours, or union control of industry—the results of which may be equally bad. Evidently, British labor has not yet fully learned the economic lessons of the war, and may not until a serious reduction in the national dividend forces the country to a lower standard of living.

British writers often praise the United States as a country where economic fallacies have no vogue and restriction of output is almost unknown, but truth compels us to confess that we are very far below that pinnacle of virtue. Who does not know of painters and paperhangers loitering over a fat job, or plumbers holding to their daily stint of work, or workers in almost every trade persecuting speeders, or walking delegates condemning piece-work, or prominent labor leaders favoring shorter hours on the ground that they make work for the unemployed and quoting that foolish rhyme, "Whether you work by the piece or the day, decreasing the hours increases the pay"? Even the exigencies of war did not drive ca' canny from American industry, but rather increased its power, as in a typical though extreme case mentioned in a recent report of the National Industrial Conference Board:

In one of our shipbuilding yards it was found that a certain steel ship had required before the war 200,000 hours of labor to construct it at 30 cents per hour; to-day a sister ship, in every respect the same, has just been completed requiring 400,000 hours of labor, but paid at 70 cents per hour. In this case, therefore, it appears that the efficiency of labor—irrespective of materials, engines, etc.—has fallen in the ratio of 6 to 28. A part of this loss of efficiency was undoubtedly due to lack of skill by the new men employed in the industry, but much of this loss must be accounted for by the deliberate practices of the workers. The forces which, undirected or wrongly directed, have already brought British industries to such an impasse, should not, by our careless impassiveness, be permitted to produce the same effects upon our own. [The ratio 6 to 28, it should be noted, refers to the productivity of a dollar's worth of labor.]

Whether we like it or not, the fact must be faced that millions of American and British wage-earners—the best paid workers in the world—care nothing for the employer's interest because they do not, or will not, see its relation to their own. The independent farmer, fisherman, prospector, berrypicker, craftsman or trader, is not thus indifferent, because the product is his own; but when an employer intervenes, or a whole series of employers, and the laborer receives money wages instead of a portion of usable goods, then, losing sight of the end, he thinks—if he thinks at all—that he can obstruct and delay the productive process without damage to himself. The union leaders, who give some thought to these matters, should see the evil tendency; but they are almost invariably, and perhaps necessarily, shortsighted, seeking immediate ends rather than long-time results. Moreover, their policy, short-sighted though it be, has brought certain temporary advantages in the way of higher wages and shorter hours, which have not yet been taken away by the slow but certain retribution that is dogging their footsteps, and will, sooner or later, exact an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

The obscure places in our industrial organization and in the process of distribution are being gradually lighted up, and both employers and employed are beginning to see that, instead of quarreling so much about the division of the product, they had better create a larger product to divide. Grievances there are on both sides, but not such as to justify a general industrial war, which might destroy the means of subsistence of millions of people. Now that the nations of the world are making peace can there not also be industrial peace on the principle of give and take, live and let live? Certainly British capital and labor, facing the danger of losing the foreign trade on which they live, must work together or suffer together; and American capitalists and laborers, on the eve of a great era of prosperity, will never enter the land of promise except they go hand in hand.

Photo Music

THE motion-picture is by its nature a new and transforming artistic medium whose emotional possibilities for the individual and whose promise for the development of a kind of new folk-lore and folk-art are scarcely glimpsed. The uncanny power of the films from the very beginning must be dependent upon something deeper than the fascination of the childish tricks, the buncombe and claptrap, and the adolescent hocus-pocus of star-worship that have been its chief substance so far. Münsterberg and other psychologists have attempted various explanations of this holding power, a power so great that in a country sufficiently provided with movies, like ours, it may quietly take the place of a banished alcohol. These explanations and all others reduce themselves to the simple fact: that the moving picture achieves so unusual a release of emotional power because it coincides with or resembles the flow of human consciousness more nearly than any other artistic medium but one, and that one is music. It is like music in its continuity of flow; continuity has even become a common movie term, expressing the ever-to-be-striven-for goal of the more modern director. It is like music in its plasticity and fluidity of material and method, and more than any other art except music it transcends the limitations of space and time freely, without effort. There is no art that achieves anything like as great a degree of freedom in boding forth the real things, persons, and emotions of life. The moving picture is essentially visual music. It owes its power to the fact that it does through the eyes what music does through the ears. As music achieves a liberating emotional experience through the creative selection and flowing together of ordinary and commonplace sounds, so out of the commonplace and transient images and experiences of ordinary life the motion picture can in its plastic freedom evoke an equally liberating emotional insight.

A dim realization of this is what probably lies behind the call occasionally heard for "A Wagner of the Movies." If this means anything, it means that the movies need not only someone to liberate them from their present banal conventions, but someone also to fuse music and the movies into a better working partnership. Were Wagner alive to-day, he might seize upon the moving picture as the perfect instrument of his intention regarding the music drama. His effort of a real union of music and the drama was a failure because of the essential inferiority of the dramatic medium to music in freedom and plasticity. We have to-day in the moving picture the freest dramatic medium conceivable, hampered only by the stupidities and lack of insight of those whose commercial plaything it is.

Without music the movies are inevitably crippled, dragged down by the weight of the reality of their material and by irrelevancies of actor personality. They need the extra lift of the free emotional inspiration that music alone gives to enable them to effect true artistic emotional release. And this can come only by a musical accompaniment that enters into the musical quality of the film itself, and expresses and heightens its emotional flow.

For such musical interpretation it is no longer possible to depend upon the songs, snatches, and musical rags and patches of the tinkling pianist improviser which marked the early days of the movies. Producers soon realized the deficiencies of this kind of musical support for the films and made some attempts to concoct more rigid programmes for the accompanist, cut and fitted precisely to the various films. Some went further and employed regular musicians to attend to this matter, but, though these would make occasional efforts to write special music for spectacular films, the run of movie houses usually heard more or less pre-arranged potpourris of familiar ballads and parlor pieces.

Musicians of standing, like Briebl, whose opera was produced last season at the Metropolitan, are gradually being drawn into this work, but the total effect on the movies thus far is insignificant.

At the same time the closeness of the connection between music and the movies has been emphasized to the producers from another side—that of the actors. Whether it is because of the lack of inspiration afforded an audience or because of the thinness of the situations and material they are called upon to portray, many of the stars have of late been constrained to seek the aid of musical accompaniment to evoke heightened emotions while acting. Thus it is that Dustin Farnum has himself tagged about the scenes of studio or wilderness by a trio of stringed instruments that play him tears when sad's the word and laughter when gay, and make shivery harmonies to slay the villain by.

It is in view of this faltering progress that nothing has happened in the moving-picture world of such revolutionary importance as the recent gift by Mr. Eastman, head of the Eastman Kodak Company, of three and a half million dollars for the building and maintenance, in connection with the University of Rochester, of a permanent school of music dedicated specially to the development of music for motion pictures. It is not probable that the National Association of Motion Picture Producers, at whose recent convention Mr. Eastman announced this bequest, realized the soundness and importance of the insight into the business that was behind this project. If they had, they would have undertaken the thing themselves long ago. Mr. Eastman, as one of the largest producers of photographic film for the movies, and one who has been most active in the development of the motion picture on the scientific side, sees that the moving picture, on the commercial side no less than on the artistic side, is bound up with the development of effective musical presentation.

“Anti-Wilson”

THIS phrase has been put to much use, for the purpose of discrediting the argument of a large class of persons. It is as if one were to say, concerning a man applying for manual labor, “Oh, he has a withered hand.” The counterpart of the phrase is not employed with anything like the same frequency. The fact that one does not know how to word it is in itself sufficient proof. “An idolater of Wilson” sounds unfamiliar and “pro-Wilson” is almost as strange. “Hatred of Wilson” is a variation which also finds great favor with his strong adherents. It is unfortunate that in a crisis which demands searching popular discussion and real understanding the issue should be clouded by an overworked label.

That unreasoning hatred of the President exists is true; that its volume exceeds the amount of the irrational, emotional worship of him is highly questionable. The situation is, after all, not so extraordinary. Men of vigorous personality in public life are usually the victims of strong likes and dislikes. The feeling towards Col. Roosevelt, when once he began to put all his power into advocating his doctrines, showed similar violence. What it is important just now to recognize is that discussion of the President's programme is only hindered by this rather childish calling of names. No change of heart is effected by it and bitterness is engendered. Both sides could help materially by admitting that, while a certain amount of the irrational feeling described does actually exist throughout the country, much of the sympathy and antipathy addressed to the President is based upon sober reflection.

In the minds of many thoughtful persons the President's policies have become suspect, not because of any single act, but because of what is taken to be his habitual attitude. Personal ambition, it is true, is often alleged, and the bringing of this charge certainly does not help the present situation. Besides, there are grounds enough for their view, such critics hold, outside the sphere of the personal. In retrospect they find the first milestone of their lengthening distrust in Mr. Wilson's hasty yielding to labor in 1916, when there was a threat to tie up the railroads. To state, without a second thought, as the President appeared to many persons to do, that a question of this nature was not “arbitrable” seemed like a rash surrender to bullying methods. It was, to their thinking, not in conformity with the best American traditions. “Be neutral in your thoughts,” came next. Such a sentiment at such a season was foreign and impossible to a great many old-time Americans. A country which had habitually welcomed to its shores the oppressed of Europe and which had been wont to lend at least moral support to causes in which it heartily believed could not be expected to suppress entirely its indignation over the ruthlessness of German methods. Even at the time when the President uttered this strange mandate, the public was in a position to determine definitely where its sympathies must lie, and information which transpired later did not really change the nature of our feeling towards Germany; it merely revealed the futility of the President's admonition.

“Too proud to fight” is a saying which to this day has never been satisfactorily explained. Coming, as it did, immediately after the sinking of the Lusitania, it was inconceivable to the many Americans here in question. They at the time could think of nothing but the great disaster and the complications resulting from it, and it would have been impossible for them, even in private life, to consider the country's honor in the detached fashion which apologists of the President urge as the explanation.

Strange phrases of this sort have blazed in the memory of many because they seem significant of the President's whole manner of directing public sentiment during those critical years. Such persons are convinced that a more normal attitude towards the affronts administered by Germany would have helped to silence, not only the strong partisans of that country, but also the rather wishy-washy endeavor to make Germany no blacker than her enemies; and would have excited in America a quick response to the cause of righteousness.

Throughout the whole period of the war the feeling has also been widespread that the President wished to play a lone hand. While other Governments, in order to meet a situation unprecedented in the history of the world, were calling upon the best talent to be found, Mr. Wilson, so the argument goes, stubbornly stuck to the somewhat limited abilities discoverable in his own party. Men of the largest experience in international affairs were passed over, and surprise gave way to astonishment when it was learned that at the Paris Conference the United States was to be represented by virtually one man. Added to this was the irritation caused by his uncommunicative way with the Senate previous to the first European visit.

Since the President's final return to this country what looms largest in the minds of his opponents is probably the inference which he has allowed to be drawn that genuine idealists are not to be found in their ranks. (One is somewhat reminded of Mr. Roosevelt's one-time unfortunate effort to be known as the high-priest of common sense.) The inference has not made for better feeling. The retort has been forthcoming that Mr. Wilson has been too much in the company of professional humanitarians to understand the limits of true idealism. If

That man's the best cosmopolite
Who loves his native country best, those who are not willing to go the whole way with the President are not bothered by his insisting that he is not a “little American.” If the President were wiser, he would see, not only that an honest difference of opinion is possible in this case, but that one may disagree with him here and still be forward-looking. Many who are opposed to him sincerely desire to bring wars to an end and are willing to see sacrifices made by this country to effect this worthy object. Only, they are doubtful of the efficacy of his League. They have seen him in the past as the enthusiastic advocate of “get good quick” methods and, quite reasonably, they have become suspicious. They wonder whether the prophecy of Samuel Butler, that the next tyrant of the world would be machinery (organization), is not likely to be fulfilled if the President can have his way, and are sincerely worried by the trust which he places in the mere machinery of the proposed League. They may rightly call themselves idealists if in combating a hasty remedy they are reserving their powers for a more permanent cure.

These, in brief, are the incidents in the President's career which have bred distrust and, often, strong antipathy to him; hatred is too strong a word, if by it is meant an unreasoned emotion. Mr. Wilson, himself, might have removed some of the opposition if he had adopted a franker attitude. He did not need to be told that the traditional American way to put through large measures is by a campaign of education and that the public is not accustomed to yield until it is convinced. Instead of taking his opponents seriously, he has given little time to their objections and has resorted to glowing phrases descriptive of the new world to be. He is a political philosopher, and from him, if from any one, one might expect to receive a judicial explanation of his convictions. Put it this way. Suppose as a professor of politics Mr. Wilson had proposed in book form the arguments for a League of Nations which have been handed out as such in his several speeches around the country. How many of his colleagues in the profession would have regarded the book as anything more than an enthusiastic vision?

Party politics should in some way be silenced in the remainder of the discussion. All decent citizens should be made to see the extraordinary opportunity which America now has to help shape the destiny of the world. It is certainly not a time for a timid withholding of our leadership. It is a time to forget partisanship and to practice straight thinking. And the person to set the example of forgetfulness of self and of clear, earnest argument is the President. There are many, even among the so-called anti-Wilsonites, who profoundly wish that he would fully embrace the great opportunity that so obviously beckons to him.

H. de W. F.

The Fatal Defect of the Cummins Bill

SOME three years ago, in his book "Heredity and Environment" Professor Edwin Conklin pointed out that modern civilization had become too complex for the present race of men to handle. Either we must contrive to produce abler men or we must be satisfied with a simpler state of civilization.

The so-called "railroad problem" in the United States furnishes a good example of the truth of this statement. That "problem," long existent and long recognized by students of economics, is now acute and pressing for settlement, and the efforts that are being made to find a solution only serve, by their own futility, to illustrate the apparent helplessness of the community to manage the machine that it has brought into being. This helplessness is not so much the result of ignorance of fundamental principles as it is the result of lack of courage to apply those principles and follow them to their ultimate conclusions. We now know all we need to know about government operation in the business of American railroad transportation, and we want no more of it. We know by experience that government operation spells inertia, and that if we want initiative we must go back to private enterprise to get it. Since we want initiative and not inertia we agree that the railroads should go back to their owners. But our fear that under private operation of railroads we shall be exploited, leads us to surround it with all manner of checks, counterchecks, restrictions, and hindrances, the inevitable result of which will be to choke initiative at its source. Under this kind of private operation we shall be no better off than we were under the Director General. As soon as we find that out it will be but a short time before that official's name is once more plastered over railroad tickets, time tables, dining-car menus, advertisements, and government reports. We shall then settle down permanently in a "simpler state of civilization" so far as railroad transportation is concerned. That is the prospect which we now face.

Lest this be regarded as wholly unreasonable pessimism let us take for the purpose of demonstration the so-called Cummins bill now before the Senate. Senator Cummins has for many years been a specialist in legislation affecting the railroads. He has given every evidence of an earnest desire to settle the question and settle it right. He has shown a mind open to new ideas—even ideas directly opposed to those long entertained by him. He has become a convinced advocate of private enterprise in railroad operation and his bill is designed to restore it. The bill is the product, no doubt, not merely of his own thought, but also of the thought of his associates on the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is, indeed, fair to say that taking it all in all it is perhaps the most hopeful essay yet put forward in the matter of railroad legislation.

Bear in mind that its avowed object is to restore private initiative in railroad transportation. Its authors know in a general way that what the public needs is abundance of railroad facilities, and the fullest possible use of those facilities. They know that private capital voluntarily invested in development of railroad facilities and private enterprise freely employed in the working of those facilities furnish the best means to the desired end. They know that there is but one incentive to capital and that is return. They know that return on capital invested in railroads must come through railroad rates, and that the rate-regulating authority must make such rates as will give this return. All this is plainly understood by the author of the bill.

The bill is, therefore, all the more significant in the fatal defects that it discloses, and the significance of these defects is in the illustration that they furnish of the truth of Professor Conklin's suggestion. It will suffice to select one point for discussion out of the many that the bill provides. That point is the most important of all—regulation of rates. There lies the heart of the railroad problem. Everything comes to that sooner or later. The problem is, under a system of regulated private enterprise in the operation of railroads, to make rates large enough to furnish a perpetual incentive to capital to flow into the railroad industry and at the same time prevent any exploiting of the general public. Let us test the Cummins bill for its handling of this part of the problem.

Sections 4, 5, and 6 provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission is to divide the country into rate districts, and the carriers into rate groups for the purposes of rate making. They provide that it shall be competent for the Commission to consider these rate districts and rate groups as a whole, apart from the question of the reasonableness of rates upon particular commodities, or for particular communities. In making rates for a rate group the Commission is to consider the interest of the public, the shippers, labor, cost of maintenance and operation, including taxes, and a fair return on the value of property used in transportation, and to raise or lower rates accordingly. If any railroad in the group receives more than this fair return the excess is to be paid over to the Transportation Board provided in the bill. Furthermore, in Section 9 it is provided that the railroad systems of the country are to be consolidated into not less than twenty and not more than thirty-five systems, and the principle upon which consolidation is to proceed is that the consolidated systems shall, under uniform rates, earn substantially the same rate of return on the value of their respective properties. Consolidation is to be compulsory after a period of seven years (Section 10), which period is allowed for voluntary consolidations. The capitalization of the consolidated companies shall not exceed the value of the railroad property as determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission (Sections 21, 22).

The authors of the bill have in part correctly apprehended the basic principle of railroad rate regulation in the United States. There is no such thing as a railroad rate that is "reasonable" per se. All rates are relative to all other rates. A tariff is nothing more than a floating mass of relativities, and this mass of relativities must be "anchored" to something. The true anchorage is found in the "traffic region." In its recognition of the "traffic region" as the starting point of rate regulation the bill is solidly founded upon the rock of reality.

The "traffic region" is a natural product and not an arbitrary convention. The railroad systems of the United States are grouped by a natural division of the country into "traffic regions," and in each of these regions there is a general tariff of freight rates applicable and peculiar to that region. The principle of this natural division of territory lies in the fact that in the large cities which form the boundaries of the "traffic regions" virtually all—or at least the greatest part—of the freight moving into or out of one region or another changes ownership. Each region is thus a natural unit in that it constitutes a group of markets interrelated one with the other. This unitary character of the "traffic region" is expressed in a general freight tariff—the "regional tariff"—which is so constructed as to maintain a general competitive equilibrium between the various parts of the region so far as shippers are concerned. These regional tariffs are the growth of many years of experience and enjoy a status which is generally recognized as prescriptive.

The purpose of the "regional tariff" is to make an equitable distribution of the entire transportation burden properly belonging to the region among those who use the railroads. This regional burden consists in the obligation of the region to support the regional group of railroads. The rates charged for transportation in the region must be such that their total money product will give the group of railroad systems in the region, regarded as a group, a fair return on the value of property employed by these railroad systems in transportation. This is the fundamental principle of rate regulation so far as the interests of the carriers are concerned. It is not necessary in this discussion to consider the principle governing the distribution of the regional burden between the users of transportation further than to note that it is based upon a general equalization of "sacrifice" and "access" with respect both to the shippers and the districts concerned.

In the Cummins bill the principle of the "regional group" and the "regional tariff" is recognized. It is the first time in the history of American railroads that this principle has been recognized by lawmakers and we may well be grateful for its appearance now. The capital mistake, however, of the Cummins bill is that, having correctly apprehended the principle of rate regulation of regional groups and "regional tariffs," it proceeds to apply it in such a way as to nullify the declared purpose of the bill, namely, the restoration of private initiative in railroad operation. It does this by removing the necessary incentive to private enterprise within the group—by confiscating the fruit of enterprise. In attempting to solve the problem of the "strong" and the "weak" roads it takes away with one hand what it has given with the other; encouraging private enterprise at the outset, it ends by destroying it.

The bill provides for enforced consolidation of railroad systems, and it lays down as the principle of this consolidation the ruling that it is to proceed with the object of giving each system the same "fair return" on the capital invested in the system as is provided for the group as a whole. It provides that if any system operating under the regional tariff shall earn more than this fair return there shall be taken away from it the earnings in excess of this amount.

The bill erects a "regional group" composed of several systems, each of which is earning the same rate of return on capital invested as the group as a whole is earning. This provision is absolutely wrong in principle, and if put in effect would be absolutely destructive of initiative. Let us suppose a "traffic region" in which there is operating a group of several systems under one "regional tariff," and let us suppose that the product in money of this "regional tariff" is sufficient to yield a fair return on the total capital invested in the "regional group" of systems. Let us suppose further that this tariff equitably distributes between passenger, mail, express, and freight service this total "transportation burden" of the region. Upon what principle is a single railroad of the group to be deprived of the fruits of good management as reflected in an earning capacity in excess of the regional average? What concern is it of the passengers or shippers in that region how much any single railroad can manage to make under a uniform group tariff which is admittedly fair to passengers and shippers alike? What wrong is done to the public in such case by one road earning 9 per cent. on its invested capital while another earns but 3 per cent.? Moreover, it is precisely the opportunity to earn profits under the uniform regional tariff which is necessary to obtain the full benefits of initiative in railroad operation. A railroad can increase its earnings only by increasing the use of its facilities, and the more these facilities are used the better for the territory which they serve. The Cummins bill most ingeniously provides for removal of the very incentive which would lead the individual railroad to strive to build up its territory when it proposes to confiscate the reward for so doing. A more complete nullification of the purpose of the bill could hardly have been devised.

There are, moreover, two lines of wrong thinking in this matter. One is the limitation of the profit that a railroad may earn under an approved original tariff. The other is the attempt to eliminate "strong" and "weak" roads, and thereby reduce all the systems to a common level of return. The latter is just as much opposed to private initiative as is the former. A road is "strong" because of the ability and honesty of its managers as reflected in location, operation, and financing, and it is "weak" by reason of absence of these qualities. Why should those who are prudent, honest, and able be required to support those who are less so? Why should a prosperous district in a "traffic region" be required to support another less prosperous district by furnishing it with transportation that it can not of itself provide and pay for? What incentive is there for "competition" under such an arrangement?

Under a proper conception of the "traffic region" as the unit of rate regulation the "problem" of "strong" and "weak" railroads is of no public concern whatever. The ideal situation is that of a regional group of railroads operating under a "regional tariff," each free to earn as much or as little as it can under that tariff, so long as the total burden imposed by the tariff gives no more than a total fair return on the total capital invested in the "regional group." Some will be "strong" and some will be "weak"; the "strong" will ever be trying to become "stronger" and the "weak" will ever be trying to become "strong," and the result of such striving will always be for the good of the people served. The thing to do is to preserve the largest possible chance for reward of endeavor consistent with exclusion of exploitation. There can be no "exploitation" under a regional tariff which is designed in the first place to be fair to the regional group as a whole. And there can be no "initiative" unless the road to reward be left open. The Cummins bill would effectively close this road.

One has but to read over the entire bill to see that its spirit is one of deep distrust of the very thing which the bill professes to make possible—private initiative. This distrust is in part the product of ignorance and, particularly, ignorance of the true nature of the partnership between the railroad and its shippers. It is, however, mainly the result of something much more fundamental. All forms of democratic government are at bottom based upon a mingled fear and jealousy of the individual. All are based upon a theory—sometimes explicit, sometimes implicit, but always present—that a common level is the goal of human organization. Whatever tends to rise above the common level is suspect. When, therefore, there is question of something which by its nature is deeply affected with a public interest, such as railroad transportation, which by reason of its nature must be subject to governmental regulation, what hope is there that this regulation will be so conducted as to open a way for the free play of individual enterprise and initiative? As men are constituted nowadays, there is no such hope.

THOMAS F. WOODLOCK

“Soldier, Soldier, Come from the Wars--”

THERE was a king in Ithaca who wandered far through years and sorrows, and heard the sirens call. In the end Zeus “cut off the day of his returning,” for the home that had been his pole-star through the epic years was, when he came to it, but another achievement of conquest. He held his steadfast course through the charms of Circe, past the might of the Cyclops, and over all the peril of the sea, only to find himself again, as he had been before the walls of Troy, in the midst of stratagem and intrigue, and the slaughter of men. He found no rest by the fireside save for a moment in the hut of his swineherd; no hint of welcoming love save for an old woman kneeling at his feet whose eyes filled with tears, and an old boarhound who wagged his tail and drooped his ears, but had no strength to draw near his master.

An exile of to-day came upon the book, a mildewed Butcher and Lang, in a Red Cross hut at Brest, a room crowded with exiles whose nerves were tense with waiting, raw with chafing at delays, bodies restless, minds obsessed with the single idea of getting home. The whole camp was in a turmoil of nervous activity blown in waves by the breath of rumor, finding no outlet in accomplishment; nothing but successive stampedes for new bulletins, and endless tramping up and down the duckboards from office to office, unraveling miles of red tape without loosening a single knot. The exile took the book and read of the homecoming, from the time when Odysseus in the form of a beggar went to Eumaeus, the master of his swine, to the last words of Pallas Athene “in the likeness of Mentor both in fashion and in voice.” He laid aside the book with a new shadow across his heart. Is this the way of a man’s homecoming after years of toil and peril? Shall he find only toil and peril renewed, nothing of love save in the heart of a dog and the eyes of an old woman, and only a night’s rest before he “fare forth again to many cities of men, and death upon the sea at last, fordone with age.” If that were all, it were scarcely worth while to “go home and be a king like other folk.” In spite of all the gods, a man’s wife should know him better than his dog, and one need not hold the homeward course through twenty years of fabled peril only to set forth again “with a shapen oar to find men who know not the sea.” Is all the emotion of the day of the exile’s returning taken up in the driving desire that sends him on, spent when it reaches the goal, all but a dying flash or two? Before he had time to ponder these things, the exile was made aware that his name was on the sailing list, and he sprang anew to the unraveling of red tape. But the question haunted him on his journeys with a vague persistence, and his mind made note of what he saw, seeking in life the force of which he had seen in the poem the shadow, gigantic and grotesque, to learn whether it end in flash and shock or in steady glow, to measure life against the poet’s dream.

He saw what all of us see of the homecomings of men, men in hundreds and thousands, the flow of the stream from western ports of France to eastern ports of ours, its branching, flowing, dividing and flowing again; its individual atoms filtering into every place of human habitation, none so remote as not to know its contact. From these emotionally charged atoms he saw flashes when he sought them and when he least foresaw them, and as it was with his fellow-voyagers, so was it with his own heart. Flashes they were, and swift glimpses, at first seeming never to go near to the heart of reality, merely a blurred mirror to his emotion; a shifting light, touching now here, now there, on a scene faint with mist. But soon he knew them as all of reality the heart could endure.

There was the last evening of the voyage when he stood at the rail arguing about a row of dim lights along a low shore. He knew the shore, and every town along its length; he was sure he was right—but suddenly he found that he could not trust his voice, so he turned abruptly and left the group. One of the fellows thought he was offended, and came to him later to apologize; by that time it was easy to laugh. Again it was the Goddess of Liberty; he had grown tired enough of the talk about her; she had never given him a thrill. But he felt it when first his eye caught her, a faint greenish shadow against the morning mist. He was standing apart in a corner under the bridge; the men on the forward deck were yelling and leaping; the band was playing in the reception committee’s boat, and everybody was at the starboard rail waving at the women and catching oranges and bundles of newspapers. The point of the citied island towered high and dim in mist and smoke like a gigantic shadow of Mont-Saint-Michel, and for him there was no more peril in the sea.

In the smoking compartment of the Pullman, the exile watched with wondering curiosity the face of a boyish infantry corporal. He had been through it all from the Mexican border to Coblenz, but he bore no trace of it save his service chevrons and the little constellation on his ribbon. His complexion was that of a child, and his eyes were gloriously clear and young. His talk rippled over the surface of his experience as lightly as his eye flickered over the landscape that was now drawing near to the focus of his heart. There was the pond, he said it without a quiver of voice or eyelash, that he had fished every inch of for pickerel; he was only ten years old the first time he swam across it. Father and mother and the rest were coming to meet him—he stood in the vestibule and ran an unwavering eye over the crowd.

“Are they there?”

“Don’t see them yet”—his voice rang clear and steady as a bell.

Then he saw them and charged. Mother’s hat went suddenly askew when the brim hit his overseas cap. Her eyes were shut, and there were tears on her cheeks. Of the corporal, the exile saw only an unexpressive back.

The train moved, and the exile turned to his idle conversation with the captain of engineers. He had been away two years and a half, making roads behind the lines. He spoke easily, but somewhat absently, for the most part of his wife, bravely “carrying on” with reduced income and increased expenses. He fell silent as the train rounded the base of the hill into his home valley. The car window swept along the platform of the little wooden station, and there was the real hero of the war just where he had parted from her. A quick change fell on her face when she saw him. The captain’s jaw was set and his lips pinched tight. They clung together in silence. As the train slid past, they were walking slowly the length of the sunny platform, she clinging to his arm.

On an electric car, the exile found another captain, with crossed guns on his collar and three stars on his ribbon. He sat very still looking steadily forward. He caught sight of them at last, under a big sycamore tree on a shady corner, Towzlehead, Curlywig, and a shaggy terrier. At sight of the car they jumped up, craning forward with hops and squeals of excitement. The captain swung out on the running board. Towzlehead saw him first and darted forward. The terrier was a close second. He sniffed at the unfamiliar puttees, and got no reaction from the smell of French leather polish, but when he got his nose in the captain’s hand he went off like a bunch of firecrackers, leaping, barking, twisting, whining, wagging. Curlywig rushed into the midst of the scrimmage, was caught up and carried to the sidewalk, her arms round father’s neck and her cheek against his overseas cap.

For such moments as these, the exile may make what preparation he can; rehearsals of them in imagination, however frequent, do not dim their poignance. With places, the dream may be so true to life as to make the actual when it comes, as peaceful as the dream itself. The old garden flanking the pillared white house had been to the exile's memory through all that was harsh and hideous as a secret refuge, a hidden inmost shrine to beauty. Through every month of the year his imagination had followed it, seeing in his heart as in a mirroring pool every change of unfolding bloom or of falling leaf. Day after day as he walked the numbered paces of the boat-deck, his eye ranging over the uncounted miles of racing waves with

No dial shade of any tree or flower
To mark the hour,

night after night as he traced the pendulum swing of the masts among the stars, or in his narrow berth felt the slow lift, pause, and fall of the sea, he drew so exactly before his mind's eye every stone of the path between the swords of iris, the grass walk and the leaning spires of foxglove, the balm and bergamot, forget-me-not and sweet alyssum, that when at last it lay about him in very fact, it slid into his heart with familiarity so soft and sweet that he scarcely felt its touch. Within its borders lay only the memory of placid hours. Of other hours the shadow fell on him unexpectedly days afterwards at the little hillside farmhouse where the call had come to him, where he had made the real decisions—but those had not haunted his dreams in exile. He went to the place unsuspecting, walked merrily up the lane with the children and the busy dog. Then while they clamored into their familiar corners of the long empty house, he went alone through the orchard, leisurely from tree to tree, thinking of nothing but the future stores of fruit till he came to the wall and stood looking over into the woodlot. There where with a heavy heart he had cut that last cord of wood, the slashings lay unburnt, matted with a summer's grass and weeds that had grown up through them and died. He turned and looked back down the rows of orchard trees now become a vista straight into the past, of days in Indian summer when in haste he had gathered the apples lest the call should come before he could store them all, the deadness of his heart at the sound of the children's voices and the squeaking of their little wheelbarrows as they busily helped at the harvest, all the strain of the waiting. . . . Then the children came racing down the row of trees, the dog barking at their flying heels, and the bad moment was gone.

He returned with them, and stood on the broad granite doorstep looking down on the road at the foot of his hillside. It was quivering in the heat, and was bordered with blackberry and Joe Pye weed that were velvet with dust. On it moved slowly the figure of a man in overseas cap and spiral leggings, an infantry sergeant whom the exile knew. His mind followed the soldier up the road he was to go, across the bridge where the hemlocks grow over the stream, over the long hill road to the little upland farm. There where apple trees slant sturdily against the wind is the goal of his dreams. He has fought over the ancient fields of war where Celt and Gaul have been before him, Roman legionary, Goth and Ostrogoth, Lombard, Vandal and Hun, rider and bowman of Burgundy, Orleans, Normandy, Britain, of Austria, Bavaria, Saxony—life and death have woven those fields with the richest tapestries of history. Through it all his dreams have been only of the old apple trees leaning to the wind, the gaunt barn, the low house with the heavy chimney, and the far purple hills over which the storm clouds ride. Night and day he has dreamed of them, at Rheims, at Toul, the Argonne and the Meuse, most of all in dust and idleness at Saint-Aignan and Brest. They have been to him the intense and burning focus of all his being. Are they so still as he plods the dusty road? Well the exile knew that he could not learn by asking. He was tempted to go down across the pasture to intercept the sergeant as he rested under the hemlocks at the bridge; but he knew how it would be. The sergeant would accept his cigarette; they would exchange experiences, and wonder that they had not met at Bligny or Vigny, or any one of the "fifty-five more all ending in" -gny. But were he to touch on the main theme, the homecoming—"Say, this sure does look good to me!" and further deponent saith not. To the exile who knew so well the electric tension of Camp Pontanezen, and of the nights on the transport when, if the ship could have been sent on her way by the united wills of those on board all straining in one direction, she would have flown swift and true as the homing thought—to him that brown figure toiling up the road was the emotional high light of the landscape. But is there still in the soldier's spirit enough of fervor to illumine those harsh upland fields with the light of his dreams? Has his hillside welcoming love for him, or only the promise of battle?

The nature of a man's homecoming is of the nature of the man himself. Odysseus is no sentimentalist. He looks coolly at the feeble Argos, and one feels that the thought behind his words to Eumaeus is of the dog's money value, or his "efficiency." As for Penelope, whatever she may once have been, by the time we see her she is very much as her lord has shaped her. She has guarded well the things he values in herself and in the palace. It ill becomes him to reproach her with lack of warmth since he has taught her naught but craft. With the dog it is different; you can teach him many things, but you can hardly teach him not to wag his tail and adore you with his eyes, and you can not inculcate in him any prudent maxims that shall withhold him from spending his last ounce of strength in such welcome as he can give you. The garden does not leap forth to greet you—no proper garden jumps at you—but if you have given to it liberally of your mind and heart and hand it repays a thousandfold in its soft enveloping welcome. If you have put nothing into it but money, it will not know you when you return. Not often do the gods "cut wholly off from the exile the day of his returning"; they are much more apt to deal it to him measure for measure.

ROBERT P. UTTER

Correspondence

The Monroe Doctrine— Policy or Principle?

To the Editors of the REVIEW:

If, by some process of personification, the Monroe Doctrine were endowed with a voice, perhaps we should find it uttering that bitterest of laments—"Heaven preserve us from our friends!" For the solicitous friends, who seem to think that the Doctrine can be saved only by means of the reservation formulated by the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, have, in truth, inflicted upon it the most grievous wound it has yet received.

It is true, in a sense, that the Monroe Doctrine is the expression of a policy. It had its origin, at any rate, in a policy springing out of a deep sense of self-preservation, and designed to counteract and defeat a hostile policy, which, if unchecked, might have come, in time, to threaten the safety and independence of the United States. But the Monroe Doctrine possesses two fundamental characteristics which easily distinguish it from those dictates of national interest which are commonly called policies. One of these characteristics is that the Doctrine looks not so much to immediate as to ultimate consequences. It takes a long view. But the second characteristic is far more significant. It lies in the fact that this "policy" is in essential harmony with men's moral nature. It has its basis in a recognition of the indispensable condition of human liberty, the free development of self-governing peoples. This is what justifies its claim to universal acquiescence and gives it the character almost of a legal principle. This is why our people, by a sort of instinctive feeling, have regarded it as a part of the world's public law. Though technically not such, it has nevertheless come per vim ipsam rationis to be looked upon as a just rule of international conduct.

The reservation proposed by the Foreign Affairs Committee takes an altogether different tone. It thrusts the Monroe Doctrine from its assured position as a principle of international conduct and reduces it to the level of a mere self-regarding national policy. If the Doctrine is to be regarded from this point of view and dealt with as a mere declaration of national policy, the proposed reservation is clearly useless, for every Power is necessarily the sole judge of the scope and applicability of its own policy. If it is to be viewed, on the contrary, as a principle of international conduct entitled to universal acquiescence, the proposed reservation is equally senseless and highly mischievous besides, because it declares that a principle claiming obedience from all is to be defined, interpreted, and applied, as exigency may require, according to the sole discretion of a single interested power. Clearly this is to deny to the Monroe Doctrine in express terms the character and validity of an international principle.

Why, then, should we do something which is equally senseless from the point of view of those who regard the Doctrine as something devised for our own particular purposes, and from the point of view of those who believe that it is an abiding principle governing the relations of all mankind with the American continent?

A reservation framed, not for the purpose of embarrassing the ratification of the treaty, but for the purpose of giving due notice to the world of our fixed and unalterable intention to maintain this Doctrine or policy at whatever cost, and to retain all necessary freedom of action to that end, might have made use, it would seem, of language more after this fashion:

In giving its consent to this treaty, the Senate of the United States declares, its adherence to the traditional policy commonly known as the Monroe Doctrine, a doctrine which it understands the covenants of the League of Nations not in any wise to impugn or impair, nor the enforcement thereof by the United States in any manner to hamper or restrict, but on the contrary, to recognize as a just and permanent principle of international conduct in respect of the American continent.

A reservation to that effect would surely go far enough. Yet, being merely interpretative, it would not be tantamount to an alteration or amendment of the treaty. Perhaps that would not recommend it to the framers of the proposed reservation, who, unmindful or unaware of the moral injury done to the doctrine about which they are so concerned, have chosen to deal with the principle of the territorial and political integrity of the Americas as if it were nothing but a point in a selfish diplomatic programme.

HENRY H. GLASSIE

Washington, D. C., September 16

How the Real France Feels

To the Editors of the REVIEW:

French and Americans will always sympathize through the qualities common to both: quickness of understanding, capacity for enthusiasm and idealism, frankness of character. French and Americans will always admire in each other the qualities by which they differ: on the one side, practical sense, love of enterprise, and the habit of prompt decisions; on the other side, refinement of taste, logical and clear thinking, and the precious art of nuances, delicate shadings. They lack nothing that happens in marriages for love, not even the little surprises, the passing quarrels, which sometimes follow the enchantments of the beginning, and are remembered afterwards with a smile, when one has had, as we have had, and will have again if the case repeats itself, the wisdom not to take these slight disappointments tragically, and stupidly magnify them into occasions of divorce.

Yes, a marriage for love, wherein neither of the betrothed seeks the other's wealth, wherein they both declare they want no dowry. "Our arrangements are simple," wrote Vergennes in the name of France in 1778, "we have not desired to obtain any commercial advantage for ourselves which other nations might envy us, and which the Americans themselves might in time regret having granted us." And the reply came a hundred and forty years later, when America entered the war at France's side: "We have no selfish end to serve," wrote President Wilson in his message of April, 1917. "We desire no conquests, no dominions. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensations for the sacrifices that we shall freely make." Pershing, in face of the peril of April, 1918, gave up all his personal plans in order to put his troops quite simply at Foch's entire disposition. Rochambeau, on board the Duc de Bourgogne, wrote in his orders before leaving: "The body of troops sent by His Majesty to America is auxiliary to the United States, his Allies, and to General Washington."

And the same advantages which this generous policy brought both our countries in the past, and which it enables them to enjoy to-day, will endure into the future. It is by remaining in accord with us and our several associates in the Entente, England at their head, that America will maintain her choice position, her moral hegemony, and, let us fearlessly add, the immense prosperity by which she makes some people envy her, many admire her, and all respect her; in this direction may and must unfold the glorious destiny predicted for her by the enlightened minds of the old world and by her own great men, and of which the present splendor is perhaps only the dawn. The United States would not have had the honor, unparalleled in history, of having founded the League of Nations if they had not begun by joining with us for the defense of the essential principles of right; they can not in future by themselves alone, however strong they may be, assure the existence of the League, the most beneficent, but also the most delicate work that humanity ever undertook.

France, whom her heroism has borne to supreme glory, France too needs, in order to preserve her prestige—let us say more, in order to live—to keep in touch with the peoples she has led to victory, especially with the people of the United States, who are more numerous, richer, and more powerful than any of the others. If our country, to its great honor and its great peril, constitutes the vanguard of civilization, America forms the reserve; and in the always possible hour of danger we must be able, as we were this time, and quicker, to count on her help.

It is true that the Americans came into the fight only the third year of the war; but that was the time when we began to be most in need, and nothing obliged them to come to help us even then. And they have not done things by halves. However jealous of their independence they might be, however little inclined to military discipline, they took upon themselves the heavy law of conscription. A year later, at the time of the armistice, this people, so lately minus an army, had more than 2,000,000 men on the soil of France; and there would have been 5,000,000 this summer and 10,000,000 next year: "as many as are needed." We saw them in Champagne, in Lorraine, fighting beside our men; so, let me add, we have admired them in their homes, ready to do anything for France, and hailing everything that spoke of her. So, finally, will they remain, in our memory, in our hearts, in our history.

They not only sent us men, they sent us money; they denied themselves to send us food; and we shall not let this fair picture of what America has been to us be obscured by vain images of puerile difficulties, of passing and individual mistakes; we will not be the plaything of misunderstandings and false reports which the enemy, let us clearly realize, enlarges and exploits with care, when he has not made them up himself out of whole cloth. We do not want to fall into the error that was Germany's perdition in the United States—the refusal to believe in the disinterestedness, the idealism, the youthful power of enthusiasm that are at the bottom of the American soul. Beside all that their Red Cross has done and given, what could the unworthy behavior of one or two greedy merchants count for? What, beside St. Mihiel and Château Thierry, the too free manners or the turbulence of some soldiers whose idleness hangs heavy on their hands? And if it be true that their President has opposed one or the other of our claims, was it not in order to better assure the success of the whole, to maintain the principles for the good of all?—was it not to make more solid the foundations of this great League by which we shall be the first to benefit?

With these false grievances, these trivial complaints, the real France has nothing to do. Her President, her Ministers, her great philosophers, her learned men and her writers, her finest artists, her aristocracy and her workmen of the most advanced ideas preserve for the United States the ardent friendship of the days of trial and combat. The Ambassador of France in Washington has expressed the simple truth when he says at the end of his latest book: "The Americans have never forgotten 1778; the French will never forget 1917." And this is the just reply to the graceful act of Washington himself, who, on February 6, 1783, in order to celebrate the anniversary of our first alliance, gave as password: "America and France," and then as answer: "United forever!"

ABBÉ FELIX KLEIN

Meudon, near Paris, August 29

Self-Determination

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Returning to the subject of the psychology of Woodrow Wilson, it is plain from the speeches of Senators Borah and Walsh and the utterances of De Valera that the fire of self-determination, as an abstract dogma unqualified by considerations of expediency, is rapidly spreading. President Wilson's notion appears to have been that territorial conquest is always unethical, except that he considered Alsace and Lorraine to be reconquests, and recognized the right of Italy to enlarged boundaries, along lines of nationality. With these exceptions his approval of the Russian formula, "no annexations and no indemnity," appeared to estop him from imposing a fine on Germany expressed in terms of territory rather than money. Is this a sound and practical view? Territorial conquest appears at first view to be plain plunder, but the first view is not always correct.

It is necessary to look beneath the surface. Conquest as the motive for commencing or continuing war is unethical, but conquest as a punishment for a guilty and defeated country like Germany has no such taint. In fact, it has the advantage of being much more easily enforceable and much simpler than a great exaction of money payments running through many years, or payments in the form of so many tons of coal, or iron ore. There is already grave doubt as to whether the treaty can be enforced in all these respects. Time alone will show.

The old way of seizing and holding territory had its advantages, and it seems that President Wilson was averse to it for a single reason, namely, that it disregarded the rights of the population belonging to the conquered region, that is, the right of self-determination.

My contention is that such a question could not be settled by an abstract formula. As between the rights of the people of a locality to self-determination, and the general good of the world, including the rest of Germany, as well as the Allies, it may often happen that in a conflict of principles and of rights the greater interests should prevail over the less.

I fancy that much confusion of thought has arisen over the case of Alsace and Lorraine. The immoral nature of the German treaty imposed on the French in 1871 does not consist in the mere fact of territorial conquest and violation of popular rights. Technically, France began that war. On this assumption, a false one, Germany might have found justification for the annexation as a punishment of France, for punishment does not rest on the idea of revenge, but of deterring the guilty party, as well as all others, from a repetition of such crimes. The immorality of the Alsace-Lorraine conquest in 1871 lay chiefly in the fact, which we now know, that Germany planned the war, brought it on intentionally through Bismarck's fraudulent alteration of the Ems telegram, and did so for purposes of conquest and plunder.

This affords clear proof of the contention that the ethical or unethical nature of territorial annexation, through force, can not be determined by the mere principle of the right of self-determination. We must consider the origin, purpose, and method of the war itself. Since, in the present war, the Allies conducted a war of defense, their right to punish the aggressor by a fine of territory was one to be determined by questions of expediency and not by the dogma of self-determination, without regard to the particular facts involved.

AUGUSTUS LYNCH MASON

Little Bear's Head, N. H., July 10

Book Reviews

Frederick the Great

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK THE GREAT. By Norwood Young. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

BEFORE the war Germany had a multitude of Hohenzollern worshippers who were allured by the prospect of a chair at the University of Berlin or the title of Geheimrat, or were fired by a patriotic zeal which approved the condoning of the crimes of Prussia's heroes and the asserting of Prussia's destiny and Prussia's right to dominate Germany and the world. In opposition to these Hohenzollern hagiographers, now and then appeared a real historian who cared more for truth than for favor or for what was mistakenly supposed to be patriotism—a Max Lehmann insisting that Frederick the Great deliberately planned and caused the Seven Years' War in order to annex Saxony; or a Max Lenz proving from internal evidence and contemporary memoirs that Bismarck's "Reflections and Reminiscences" are full of errors and deceptions, and that the Iron Chancellor's account of the origin of the Franco-Prussian War is the most untruthful chapter of all. But these protests against the official and prevailing views were no more than voices crying in a wilderness. Lehmann was still refused permission to print Frederick the Great's "Political Testament" of 1752, presumably because it contained the incriminating evidence which Lehmann suspected. Lenz was not allowed a glance at the archives which contained the shady secrets of Bismarck's machinations. Even von Sybel, the official historiographer of the "Founding of the German Empire," was not permitted by Bismarck to see the documents relating to Prince Leopold's candidacy for the Spanish throne—documents which would have revealed the falsity of Bismarck's allegations. So in Germany the patriotic versions prevailed. And Hohenzollern heroes were set on pedestals in the Siegesallee to enforce the Hohenzollern legend upon the docile minds of gaping children from Berlin and of raw recruits from the provinces.

Now, after the war, when the fruits of Prussianism are patent, a new interpretation is as inevitable as it is desirable. The present volume is a valuable contribution to history because the author has freed himself completely from the facts and conceptions of Frederick's former biographers. He has created a new Frederick, based freshly on the sources—chiefly on Frederick's voluminous political correspondence (in 36 volumes) and his more literary "Oeuvres" (in 32 volumes). On the military side he checks up Carlyle's credulity by diligent use of the ponderous narratives recently published respectively by the Prussian and the Austrian General Staffs. His style is simple and clear. And he writes with conviction—the conviction that Frederick was a physical coward, an incompetent commander, an inveterate hypocrite, a treacherous friend, a cruel conqueror, an oppressive despot, and a vulgar braggart. He was "a false, hypocritical parvenu among kings," "whose incurable preference for trickery and deceit brought many misfortunes upon him" (p. 184). "Hypocrisy and fraud were outstanding features in the character of Frederick the Great" (p. 415). In fact, "Frederick enjoyed cheating" (p. 125). "A heartless and callous man, he cared nothing for the welfare of his subjects, save in so far as it ministered to his weakness for power and prestige on the European stage. He was a benevolent despot like Louis XIV, but with less benevolence and more despotism—save only in one direction, that of religion" (p. 378).

Frederick's supposed military genius evaporates when we are told that the numbers and strength of his enemies have been greatly overstated; that he twice fled in fright from the field of battle; that he was guilty of many tactical and strategical errors (which the vantage of a century and a half now enables Mr. Young to point out); and that Frederick, to conceal his deficiencies, published doctored accounts of his defeats which none dared to contradict.

As for being an "Enlightened Despot," Mr. Young does not for a moment deny that he was a despot. But except in the matter of religious toleration (and even here Frederick did not accord to Jews and Catholics all the rights enjoyed by Protestants) he was not "enlightened" at all. He was a century or more behind his times. In his literary tastes he declared that he admired nothing so much as the French classicists of Louis XIV's age. In politics his whole thought and action were based on the Machiavellian conception that all men are by nature base and deceitful. With Rousseau and the contemporary conception of the perfectibility of man he had no sympathy. Of the new German writers of his day—Herder, Lessing, Goethe, Kant—he had no appreciation at all.

The author has also discovered several curious matters in which the "Attila of the North," as Madame de Pompadour called the King of Prussia, was the precise prototype of the twentieth-century "Hun." As to responsibility for the Seven Years' War Frederick's subjects "believed what they had been told, that Prussia had been attacked by Powers who were jealous of her prosperity, and that their King had, single-handed, beaten off the whole of Europe" (p.

359). In the course of the war Frederick "sent officers with explicit commands to loot the palace of the Elector"; "he ordered his men to give no quarter," but "cashiered an officer who tried to save them, and then issued a statement deploring the inability of his officers to prevent the soldiers from murdering the wounded and the prisoners. Similar hypocrisy was shown when he bombarded the residential quarters of a besieged town, and made a particular mark of the Cathedral" (p. 349); and then alleged that the Cathedral tower had to be attacked, owing to its use by the enemy as an observation post.

The chief criticism to be made of Mr. Young's book, aside from some minor inaccuracies and the inadequacy of the maps, lies in his frequent practice of drawing inferences or imputing motives, always derogatory to Frederick, which are scarcely warranted by the evidence. If Frederick were really the kind of man he depicts, he certainly does not deserve the epithet of "the Great," which history has accorded to him and which the author, though with some embarrassment, still leaves him. Yet in spite of this criticism and the belittling spirit in which the book is written, we repeat that it is a valuable contribution, for it affords a much-needed antidote to Carlyle and the accepted Prussian legend. Mr. Young's selection of facts is fresh and his correlation of evidence is novel; they are buttressed by careful and exact citations of the King's own words, and are therefore beyond dispute. But in his inferences he has made the mistake of going to the opposite extreme from the hero-worshippers. The truth, as usually, will be found to lie between the two extremes.

SIDNEY B. FAY

Square and Sphere

THE QUERRILS. By Stacy Aumonier. New York: The Century Company.

LITTLE HOUSES. A Tale of Past Years. By George Woden. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THE "new novel" of England has not come through the war without change. It has given up something of its waspish brilliancy and taken on a friendlier humor. Dear old England (it says), she is in a mess. But the thing is not to be clever at her expense, it's to understand her. There is virtue somewhere among her foibles and frailties. Not all lords are wasters, not all new-made knights are bounders. Some workmen are neither sots nor paladins. Some modern daughters are neither window-smashers nor free-lovers. Middle-class respectability may have its place in the general economy. Even the family bond may not be altogether brutal or unmeaning.

The Querril family recall Mr. Walpole's Trenchards in "The Green Mirror" and Miss Sinclair's Harrisons in "The Tree of Heaven." The solidarity and isolation symbolized by mirror and tree in the earlier stories has no concrete symbol here. "Querrilism" is a condition to be felt rather than analyzed, yet worth analyzing since it is a British quality and, more, an Anglo-Saxon quality. "Don't imagine you only find Querrils dotted about these lime-washed villas in Surrey," says the young American, Tony MacDowell. "They're a by-product of an age which has been so long lulled by refinement and security that it has forgotten how it arrived. There are crowds of Querrils hunched around Boston and even way out at Los Angeles." The hallmark of Querrilism is an intense yet placid communal life within the family circle. A gay, unforced, yet carefully guarded contentment is its note. "Flee fro' the press" might be its motto. Mr. Querril thinks himself very modern, "alive to every social and religious development," but it is when he has slipped from business and other uneasy contacts into "the toga of his pleasant family life" that he chiefly lives. Yet this is not the whole story; for beneath the surface of Querrilism, sworn to quiet gaiety and against all display of emotion, is the swell of a contrary tide. Rodney, the eldest son, feels and consciously rides upon it. Pleasant acquiescence, he argues, has done nothing for the world. There has been progress "because people whom you despise as interferers have butted in, made themselves unpopular, and got their way. Everybody who has done anything, from Jesus Christ to Lloyd George, has been described as a busybody and a meddler at some time." So Rodney interferes—interferes with the Troon family and very nearly ruins his brother Peter in consequence; interferes by disobeying the orders of his superior officer, in France, and is disposed of by a firing squad. Even old Mr. Querril is a "passive interferer," according to the predestined rôle of the Anglo-Saxon, the Westerner.

A curious race, the Anglo-Saxon, restless, not quite knowing what it wants, with the genius of dissatisfaction more acutely developed than in any other race. He must crawl all over the earth and see what's doing. . . . Then he returns home and after a long time thinks about it all—he's rather slow in the uptake. And then one day—or more probably one night—something starts worrying him. . . . He wakes up and thinks: "No, but damn it all! babies in the Ganges! A bit thick!" . . . And he finds that this disturbs his nights. And one day it gets beyond him. He suddenly packs up and goes off to interfere. He takes his golf clubs, and his ridiculous clothes, his zinc chapels, his gramophones, and his evening dress. And being a practical man, he thinks: "Well, as I'm going, I might as well take a few pounds of tea to sell to the natives." . . . And of course the malevolent person will say: "Ah, yes! that's what he goes for!"

In this book, you observe, the Wellsian "idea" rears its head. Nice people, "real" people, as story-telling goes, but not quite free agents. "Little Houses" is a work of more ingenuous realism, or at least of a realism less moralized. For an analogue we must look not to "Mr. Britling," but to the "Old Wives' Tale" of Bennett, the responsible Bennett. A tale of the near past, but of the past. Here also we may take comfort in our detachment from an idea-provoking present. Like Bennett's Five Towns stuff, it is plainly built of the most intimate materials of memory. And the materials are similar. Pedley Hill and Selbridge belong to the same England, if not the same part of England, as Bursley and Hanbridge. The people, also, are chiefly of the lower middle class, average townsmen, none too safe from poverty and prone therefore to make a god of frugality. "Seest thou a man diligent in business?" reads the motto on the title-page. "He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men." Not the least engaging thing about the story is its demure refusal to confess in what spirit this quotation is made. What does the tale "mean"? Whatever you like, whatever it is in you to see in it.

One thing, however, you must see: that the author, however disinclined to manipulate or annotate his facts, is able to view them in a mode quite other than Bennett's cold-blooded, not to say fishy-eyed detachment. His irony is both slighter and warmer. He has an affection for creature man, an equal kindness for his follies and his high efforts. The "Little Houses" of his title seems to mean not only little dwellings, but little households and little persons—houses of life: "small souls" in the less amiable phrase of the Dutch novelist Couperus. Pedley Hill is this new novelist's microcosm, a Pedley Hill of the eighties and nineties, place and period of almost indecent security and comfort. Omens are not absent, challenges of authority, hints of industrial unease. But in general the ayes have it by a languid show of hands. There is nothing to worry about except one's own affairs and well-being, which includes, of course, pleasant relations with one's own world. . . . The Alldays, the Wheatleys, old Gentleman Binns, Sam Bloom, the Kingsnortons, the Benlows, give very thoroughly the range of Pedley Hill society. Is John Allday or Sam Bloom the "hero" of the piece (a piece it is, of course, for all its air of being a slice)? The answer hangs on your reading of it. Sam Bloom is the dreamer, the man of big discontent and warm vague hopes for his kind—by which he would mean primarily his class. John Allday is the unconscious egotist, well-meaning, sensitive enough to what he can see of other needs and rights than his own. It is he who "gets ahead," becomes the warm man and the solid man in his community, marries the nice girl that is bound to make him happy, instead of the devoted woman he is ready to marry for a sense of duty. Somehow, at the last moment, matters always "turn out right" for him. We have our last glimpse of him going off with the comfortable girl, while his two lovable and limited old parents gloat in their innocent way over their son's steady rise in the world. Sam gets the hard end of the crust, somehow marries the wrong woman (lucky John happens to own her heart, too), wastes his spark of genius on rebellion and drink, and at the moment when he is ready to forswear sack and ideals and put his shoulder to the wheel, a casual death foists upon him undignified release. . . . It is a piece, a story well-composed, but its characters give the illusion of reality in an unusual degree. We know them, and recognize our kind in them, for all their localism—or rather by natural consequence of their fidelity to time and place. For it is in this sort of compacted realism that we get, as in a crystal spherelet, our clearest images of the human world.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Status of German Socialists

GERMAN SOCIAL DEMOCRACY DURING THE WAR. By Edwyn Bevan. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

IT was a Marshal of France, we believe, who in reply to a question from his king as to what preparations were required for an enterprise against Milan, spoke the much-quoted words: "Three things, Your Majesty, are necessary, money, money, and still more money." The German Social Democratic party has tasted the bitter truth of that historic remark. For it was by its vote for or against the war-credits that the party had to proclaim its sanction or condemnation of the war, and that financial issue proved the wedge which split the organization into two irreconcilable divisions. "Give us 500,000,000 marks," said the Government on August 4 to the Reichstag, and the Social Democratic group of 110 membership to a man gave its vote for the war-credits. Still, the wedge had already been driven in: fourteen, among others the President, Hugo Haase, gave their vote against their own conscience, in obedience to party discipline. "Give us 500,000,000 marks," said the Government a second time, in December, 1914, and the wedge's point went in so deep that the split could no longer be concealed from the outside world: Karl Liebkecht, in defiance of party orders, gave a dissentient vote. "Give us 10,000 millions of marks," said the Government again, in March, 1915, and this time Rühle voted with Liebkecht against the credits. A year later the number of intransigents had grown to seventeen, constituting a new group under the presidency of Hugo Haase.

It is difficult for the outsider to do justice to either standpoint. At the time, Liebkecht and Haase were universally admired outside Germany, but there is some truth in the charge made by the majority that the applause gained by them abroad proved their attitude to be injurious to their country. For who knows the workings of his own mind so well as to decide whether his sympathy for Haase was actually based on pure appreciation of his logic, undefiled by any speculation as to the effects that it might have on Germany's power of resistance? Haase himself, however, shrank from the consistent straining of his own doctrine. To Liebkecht the possible defeat of his country as a consequence of the abstention of the Socialists seemed a lesser evil than the betrayal by the Socialists of the ideals of the Internationale. Haase was not brave or not reckless enough to go that length. He thought he owed it to his Socialist conviction to vote against the war-credits, but as a German citizen he dreaded the imputation that, by so doing, he played into the enemy's hands. To disarm his accusers and, maybe, to soothe his own conscience, he maintained, therefore, that he could not endanger his country by opposing the Government because the war was sure to end in a deadlock, victory being impossible for either side: "At the end of the tremendous conflict there will probably be neither victors nor vanquished—or rather, only vanquished nations bleeding from a million wounds," he said in March, 1916. The excuse is a flimsy texture, still the inconsistency which it fails to conceal is less to his dishonor than that of which the majority Socialists were guilty who, to screen themselves from the accusation that they betrayed the Internationale, had recourse to the fiction that Germany was waging a defensive war. This question of guilt, of who was responsible for the war, was the pivot on which all the debates between majority and minority turned. Only the extremists of either group denied to that question any weight. Liebkecht was for opposing the Government in any war, irrespective of its cause, and Wolfgang Heine would stand by his Government in any war, just or unjust. As early as 1907 this member of the right wing of the majority group foresaw the difficulty, of which the German Government was to avail itself, in drawing the line between a defensive and an offensive war: "The fight against military arrogance is one of the tasks of national civilization. The consciousness of this does not discharge us from the duty of defending German civilization, if it is menaced by outside enemies. And it is true that in such an event it is hardly possible to enter upon nice distinctions between aggressive and defensive wars."

This difference between fearless consistency and half-hearted conformity has caused a subdivision of both majority and minority, which, however, goes deeper and is of a more lasting nature in the latter group, the following of Liebknecht being now known and distinguished from those of Haase by the name of Communists.

Mr. Bevan's study, which gives a lucid and impartial account of the details of this disruptive process, surveys its history up to the fall of Chancellor Michaelis in October, 1917. Since then little has happened to alter the situation described at the close of his book, except that the Spartacus riots and Liebknecht's share in them have widened the breach between Haase's following and the Communists. The present shows no signs of any inclination of the three groups to reunite on a common platform; not even the fear of a counter-revolution has been able to bring about a reconciliation. Never was German Social Democracy so weak and disunited as when it saw one of its leaders raised to the Presidency of the German Reich.

A Journalist in the Far East

THE FAR EAST UNVEILED. By Frederic Coleman. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

MR. COLEMAN at one time or another has spent a great while in the Far East. The present volume, however, is the result of a special trip taken in 1916 for the Herald, of Melbourne, Australia. It is composed of a series of nearly sixty short chapters or notes dealing with different items of political and economic interest picked up in China, Korea, and Japan, and does not make pretense of being a comprehensive treatise on conditions in those countries. Mr. Coleman impresses one as an intelligent journalist and as without any thesis to prove. He does not seem to be especially anxious about the fate of China or the future of Japan, except in so far as the interests of the western world may be concerned. He is not indignant against the Japanese, but the facts which he saw and heard have led him to express few opinions favorable to that people and many to their discredit. "No Englishman will ever forget the anti-British campaign in the Japanese press when Britain was fighting for her life," he reports as the statement of one of the most prominent Englishmen in the Far East. This campaign, Mr. Coleman points out, was not conducted by an irresponsible section of the press, but was begun by the influential Tokyo Yamato, and participated in by all the other newspapers.

Mr. Coleman has much to say regarding the matter of the Open Door in Manchuria, and closes his chapter with the answered question: "Has Japan kept her pledges? I am afraid that the most charitable of us would be compelled to answer, 'Well, not exactly.'"

In the great railway shops at Shaha-kou, near Darien, Mr. Coleman was interested to find many Chinese workmen employed and to learn that the Japanese freely admitted that the Chinese were decidedly better workmen than their own countrymen.

Of the Koreans Mr. Coleman says: "You can hardly imagine the inherent gentleness of this people. They are so entirely helpless, so absolutely childlike, that no one but a brute would wound their feelings." This, of course, was written before the recent troubles in Korea.

The labor situation in Japan, our author finds far from satisfactory—long working hours, small pay, many women and children employed, and factory conditions in many cases very bad indeed.

In his last chapter, which is devoted to a discussion of Japan and American capital, he says: "My stay in Japan convinced me that American capital will find little opportunity for independent investment in China, however non-political its schemes may be, if Japan can get her own sweet way. Will she get her way? She will, unless the American Government makes a great fundamental change in its policy, which could only be born of a great change of heart."

The Run of the Shelves

ONE of the learned publishing institutions of the world which have continued to function steadily through the war is the E. J. W. Gibb Memorial, founded to promote researches into the history, literature, philosophy, and religion of the Turks, Persians, and Arabs. When Gibb died prematurely in 1901 he was easily the greatest Turkish scholar of his time, and his magnificent but unhappily uncompleted "History of Turkish Poetry" is his abiding monument. In the series, founded to his memory by his mother, thirty-seven volumes of texts and translations have already appeared, seven of them since the outbreak of the war. Of these last the editors have been Italian, Egyptian, Persian, East Indian, and English; the contribution of the East Indian was most curiously his Ph.D. thesis when studying at the charges of the English Government of India in a German university. The last volume, just issued, is a translation by Guy Le Strange of the work of Hamd-Allah, a Persian geographer of the middle of the fourteenth century. Like the sheep's head of tradition it is of a fine confused feeding. Its value to the scientific geographer is probably not great, but the student of more primitive geography, of folklore, and early voyages, of popular religion and traditional history will find his matter here. Its readers will realize that the Arabian Nights is not a book of fairy tales, of imagination all compact, but a record, behind a thin veil of romance, of the wonders of Allah in this earth of his.

Two years before the outbreak of the war, Miss Marie Corelli wrote as follows: "It needs no gift of prophecy and no special intuition to see that we are on the brink of some tremendous change in the destinies of the human race (pages 44, 45, "My 'Little Bit'": George H. Doran Company). The promptitude of the universe in fulfilling Miss Corelli's prediction seems to have pointed her out as its confidant and spokesman, and on the various topics handled in this collection of war-time miscellany her voice is authoritative, not to say imperious. Miss Corelli is a woman of the most unbending religious principles. She is critical of institutions, often disdainful of clergymen, and dogma in her mind has been volatilized into symbol. But she holds this reduced faith with an unimpaired fervency and defends her modernized God and Christ with the zeal of a Wesleyan and the rigor of a Covenanter. The war, for which we are to thank God but abhor the Kaiser, is the "punishment of nations for their unrepented wrongs to another" (page 204). Miss Corelli can lay her finger on the exact wrongs—so legible is the mind of Providence. Belgium erred in the Congo, and France excluded the name of God from the curriculum of her schools. In the last specification Miss Corelli is unfair to the general sanity and moderate liberality of her own mind.

There are obvious weaknesses in Miss Corelli, but we guess that the impartial reader who opens her volume with a smile will close it with a respect in which some penitence for that smile is mingled. She is masterful undoubtedly, but the excuse for mastership is service, and the book is conclusive as to the fact that service in many forms, by purse, pen, and voice, has been faithfully and bountifully rendered by Miss Corelli. In this nondescript handful of papers for the hour, some future Mommsen or Carlyle might almost read the war in epitome. He would find there the outbreak of hostilities, the martyrdom of Belgium, the faithfulness of the navy, the advent of America, the war work of women, the ingathering of recruits, the fidelity of Canada, the internment of aliens, the Red Cross and other charities, the traitors in high places, the restrictions on travel, the raising of loans, the persecution of alleged "hoarders," the vanishing potato and the deteriorating loaf. Miss Corelli's convictions are mighty, and her dealings with the transgressor (a person in whose company she finds herself with alarming frequency) are summary and drastic. Has some one mentioned Hindenburg's eye? "What have we to do with 'Hindenburg's eye,' except bomb it out if we can" (page 269)? Is it a question of sops for Bolshevism? "One does not offer a sop to a mad bull—one kills it" (preface ix). The style of these injunctions hardly suggests the vein of fervid, though florid, eloquence in which most of the book is written.

Messrs. D. E. Watkins and R. E. Williams have compiled a book of school declamations or readings to which they have given the vaguely exhilarating title of the "Forum of Democracy" (Allyn and Bacon). The contributors to this volume are drawn from America, England, France, Italy, Germany, Spain, Belgium, Russia, and other states. The names are distinguished—Roosevelt, Asquith, Mercier, D'Annunzio, Maeterlinck, Kerensky. All the selections pertain to the Great War, and the date of the earliest is confined by that boundary. The years 1914-1919 exhaust the historical perspective of this book. The past is shut off behind us as in those obsolete front scenes in the theatre in which the intervention of sliding doors cut off the background at a point six feet or so behind the footlights. Temporally we are left on a shelf, but at both ends this shelf is so far extended as virtually to circumscribe the world. The meeting of these two tendencies is illustrated with admirable clearness in the great temporal contraction and the vast compass in space or nationality of this otherwise not very salient little text-book. Culture once sought to liberate the human mind by giving it the freedom of the centuries, by making it, in a word, intersecular. Can the same result be brought to pass by making it international? In these days, when Broadway intersects the Strand and the Boulevard des Italiens runs into Fifth Avenue, are the Via Sacra and the street that is called Straight no longer necessary for the extension of our promenade? Can we trust to the nations to furnish to our sons the corrective and sanative variety which the ages offered to our fathers? The question is too involved for treatment in a random paragraph; a single observation must content us. Nations can profit by their mutual diversities only as they approach each other, and approximation means a reduction of that difference to which it owes its stimulus and value.

There are two ways of constructing a class-book of the history of religions. One is to use the services of a number of scholars, each an authority in his own field. The result will be comparative accuracy but lack of unity in method and even discord in fundamental ideas. If the teacher who uses the book knows his business these disadvantages will not matter greatly; for the sooner the student learns that in comparative religions, as in folklore, which is essentially the same, you can turn and arrange the evidence to make almost anything of it the better it will be for himself and for the subject. The other is to give it all into the hands of one scholar and to let him read up on the religions which he does not already know. The result will be unity in handling of a kind, possibly misleading, and certain inaccuracy in parts. At the worst it will be like the celebrated article on Chinese metaphysics, and at the best, when an eminent scholar of wide sympathy and common sense is chosen, it will be as in "The History of Religions," in the new "Religious Science and Literature Series" (Macmillan), by Professor Hopkins of Yale. Professor Hopkins knows India thoroughly; that is his business. He has followed, too, the recent investigations of Greek and Roman religion, that lies near to his business. For the others—and the whole religious world is surveyed, ancient and modern, from China to Peru, in these six hundred pages—he must rely on his training, insight, sympathy, and reading. The result in this case is wonderfully good, especially when Professor Hopkins looks away from his accumulations of supposed facts and abandons himself to his own ideas and generalizations. These are always interesting and stimulating; a good teacher will know how to use them and a lazy student will not be greatly injured by impressing them on his memory. As for details, Professor Hopkins seems to regard Methodism (p. 592) as a product of High Church ritualism, and Agreement and Analogy in Mohammedanism (p. 476) as "works."

Until Gertrude Atherton set it forth in a brilliant historical novel, the pathetic romance of Concepcion Arguello was little known outside of California. Rezanov, the dashing Russian cavalier, who came out to Alaska in 1805 to set in order the affairs of the Russian-American Company, sails into San Francisco Bay in his good ship Juno, and promptly falls in love with the daughter of the Spanish Commandante and they are betrothed. In California he sees visions of a great empire to be taken from the faltering hands of Spain over which he and his bride are to hold sway. He starts back to Russia promising a speedy return to claim his fiancée, but falls ill in Siberia and dies there, and she waits in vain. "Rezanov" deserves to be termed an American classic; Boni and Liveright have done well to add it to their Modern Library series.

The Redemption of Philadelphia

AMERICAN cities are misgoverned because American citizens do not vote. The machine rarely commands the majority of the voters. If it has done so in Philadelphia, the reason is to be found in the overwhelming control of the city by one party. Thus, at the primaries of the week before last there were nearly 300,000 Republican votes cast, but less than 15,000 Democratic votes. The Democrats have sometimes done better than this. At the presidential election of 1916 they rolled up 90,000 votes for Mr. Wilson. But the Democratic party organization has long been hopelessly discredited. It has become little more than a gang, ready to trade votes with the Republican factions. The position of the Republican organization has therefore been secure. When two parties are more or less evenly balanced, a comparatively small body of independent voters can turn the scale. Other cities have administered salutary defeats to bosses in this fashion. But Philadelphia could redeem itself only by action within the Republican party. That is what it has done at last. By a narrow majority Congressman J. Hampton Moore, backed by a Committee of One Hundred representing the party opposition to the machine, has won from Judge Patterson, the candidate of the machine, the Republican nomination for Mayor; and at the same time a majority of the Council has been secured for the forces of reform.

Those who do not understand what political conditions in Philadelphia have been for many years will not realize the extent of this victory. The Republican vote is large enough to afford the luxury of two political factions. Eight years ago, when they quarreled, an independent candidate for Mayor was elected. This was the late Rudolph Blankenburg, "The Rupert of reform," who had fought many a fight for civic virtue. But the factions had only to unite to regain control. Four years ago the city was theirs again. Fortunately, however, the Vare faction did not play fair with the McNichol faction. It captured the weak and inefficient Mayor and made him serve the purposes of the Vare contracting firm, which cleans (or does not clean) the streets and manages this and other lines of municipal business for its own profit. So McNichol, who has since died, and his friend Senator Penrose found themselves outside the breastworks. The dissatisfaction of the Senator was first expressed by an alliance with the "Town Meeting party" two years ago. The organization won then, though the usually apathetic public opinion of the city had been stirred to protest. This year the organization was attacked from a new angle. The battle for good government was fought in the Republican primaries.

It should be clearly understood that this battle was not like any previous one within the party. Senator Penrose stood against the Vares and with their opponents. That he has not been more scrupulous than they may readily be believed. That he was moved in the present case by any unquenchable zeal for reform may readily be doubted. But he threw all his influence on the right side, and for that he should have the credit. The impression that he had any personal advantage to gain by the election of Mr. Moore is quite unjustified. He did not select Mr. Moore as the candidate of the reform element. It was the Committee of One Hundred, men and women of light and leading, that did this. Senator Penrose might easily have preferred another candidate. The Congressman has been a strict, sometimes a narrow, party man, but he has never been tied to the Penrose chariot. Nor does his justification for leadership in a reform movement lie in his party services. His energy, honesty, and executive ability are his qualifications.

The fact that Mr. Moore carried the primaries by so small a margin that the result was for a time in doubt emphasizes the fact that reform in Philadelphia has a hard road to travel. In the past, thousands of voters have shown their indifference to disgraceful conditions by staying away from the polls. Others, who would not for a moment admit any sympathy with municipal corruption, voted for the organization as voters of the same class have voted for Tammany, because it bore the party label. Wealthy manufacturers supported it because they regarded Republican supremacy as essential to the maintenance of a policy of high protection. Yet the organization was always what Elihu Root once called it—"a corrupt and criminal combination masquerading under the name of Republicans." It was really a liability to the party, not an asset. Nevertheless, the difficulty of overthrowing it will readily be perceived. Even in this election, after its methods had been thoroughly exposed, after every newspaper in the city had taken a stand, and with one exception a firm stand, against it, there were eminently respectable citizens found to vote for its candidates. The greatest disappointment to the Moore forces came in the very wards where the strongest support was expected. The returns show positively that the "Contractor Combine" was defeated in the wards upon which its reliance had been mainly placed.

There are intimations that the vote has not been correctly counted and that in many instances frauds were committed by the Vare leaders. Whether this be true or not, two things are fairly obvious. One is that the agreeable personality of Judge Patterson exercised a strong influence over many who did not approve the methods of the Vares. They persuaded themselves to believe that he would be better than his backers, despite plenty of evidence from the history of municipal administration that the occupant of an office can not escape from a sense of obligation to those who put him there. Again, to some of these Mr. Moore was persona non grata because of his relations with a former city administration that went out in bad odor, of his record in Congress, of his pacifism, not to say pro-Germanism, in the early days of the war. Nor did union labor take to him kindly, regarding him as a "reactionary." These were some of the influences against him.

The other plain conclusion to be drawn from the vote is that Vareism owed no small part of its defeat to its own followers. If the Vare wards had given Judge Patterson the customary organization majorities, he would have won the nomination. In other words, the plain wayfaring man showed in many cases a better comprehension of the real issue than the philosophical reformer. He felt more keenly the burden of misgovernment. He realized the menace to his family in dirty streets, in filthy slums, in the protection of criminals and thugs by the police. Then, too, no machine can exist long without incurring the enmities of disappointed politicians. In this election more than one such openly or secretly worked against the "Contractor Combine."

These are the chief circumstances which make the Philadelphia primaries of more than local interest. No city has stood more preëminently in the public eye as an example of municipal corruption than Philadelphia. No city has been more firmly joined to its idols. Yet honest citizenship, although working against a strongly entrenched organization, although hampered in various ways, has at last achieved at least the beginning of its redemption.

EDWARD FULLER

Drama

The Re-Opened Theatre

THE cessation of the discord on Broadway and the reflux of an eager public into silenced lobbies and corridors leads one to remark with interest the very few cases in which the strike has proved deadly to a play. Off-hand, I could name but one instance, and it is curious that the most combative and irascible play on Broadway in August, Mr. Thomas Dixon's "Red Dawn," should have been the sole play to succumb, if indications are trustworthy, to the onset of the strike. The melodramas, naturally invulnerable to catastrophes, have revived with the facility of their own chloroformed or poniarded heroes. The re-emergent "Crimson Alibi" is once more gripping and dripping by turns at the Broadhurst. A "Voice in the Dark," profiting by a sightless and soundless interval, renews its exploitation of blindness and deafness at the Republic. "At 9:45," which kept on heroically ticking when all the other clocks on Broadway had run down, is still giving perpetuity to a fateful moment at the Playhouse. At the Selwyn Mr. Walter's "Challenge," whose attack on labor leaders found an appropriate nemesis in its own interruption by a labor strike, resumes its high place in the catalogue of plays which think that they think.

The war-play still hangs out its flag, though one doubts the continuance of its vogue, and the appearance of "Civilian Clothes" at the Morosco is suggestive of the nearness of a time when the theatre may doff the khaki. The "Better 'Ole" seems to have entrenched itself in the favor of the public, and one is glad to see that "Friendly Enemies," emulous of its young volunteer, has survived its own decease. I am rather sorry that it now advertises the end of its run, because, in the general paucity of desert, "Friendly Enemies" is a deserving play. It was rarely fortunate or unbelievably subtle in the fact that by portraying the revolt of a German against Germanism, it pleaded in a sense for the race by the very picture which intensified our horror at its conduct. In the humors of returned soldiery the "Five Million" at the Lyric has found excellent game, though its marksmanship seems to me less consummate than its delighted audiences suppose.

Even literature is here and there resurgent. Barrie's "Dear Brutus" was long since laid to rest, and no manager has anointed its eyelids with the potion which would arouse it from its midsummer night's sleep in the enchanted wood. The "Jest" will continue to offer to New York the sanguinary spectacle of the Italian Renaissance in the blitheness of its own renaissance at the Plymouth. I know no fact of more honorable substance or more cheering augury than the prowess of "John Ferguson," which, active in the July languors and peaceful in the August combats, now reaches the twenty-third or twenty-fourth week of its prosperity, at the Fulton. The three plays, taken together, may arouse some wonder at the type of play which beguiles New York into a momentary forgetfulness of its hostility to literature. "Dear Brutus" is acrid; the "Jest" is terrible; "John Ferguson" is lacerating. They seem at first sight remote enough from the sort of play whose office is to recommend literature to a non-literary public. Explanations, however, are not wanting. Barrie is Barrie, and perhaps the philistine mind forgives his literature in the same spirit in which the democrat overlooks his title. The virus of literature was largely expurgated from the "Jest" in its passage from Italian to English and from shelf to stage, though its other viruses withstood the purge. The case of "John Ferguson" is quite exceptional. The powerful and elementary appeal of home, a spring sparingly touched in contemporary literature, is here presented with a distance of setting and an originality of circumstance which takes off the odium of domesticity. One should be in no haste to draw glowing inferences from a single fact, however gratifying. New York in the act of homage to literature is a good deal like Hamlet's uncle on his knees. Disappointments and reverses are certain, and the final usefulness of any movement will hinge on its possession of the moral and material strength to outride reaction. The Theatre Guild is deserving of subsidy in both kinds.

In the newer comedies I note with pleasure certain instances in which zest combines in the friendliest manner with innocence and wholesomeness—a union the possibility of which seems to have escaped the notice of some managers and playwrights. I name three comedies without disparagement to others with whose merits I have still to acquaint myself. Messrs. Booth Tarkington and Harry Leon Wilson's "Up from Nowhere," at the Comedy, Messrs. Samuel Shipman and Percival Wilde's "First Is Last," at the Maxine Elliott, and Mr. Mark Reed's "She Would and She Did," at the Vanderbilt, are all, in their several ways and differing degrees, sound stage-ware; yet all are quite undefiled by that form of sexuality which has furnished many recent comedies with a passport to fame hardly distinguishable from the "Yellow Ticket." All three give pleasure; in the two last the pleasure is keen. It is interesting to compare the reception of these plays with those offered to Mr. Owen Davis's "Those Who Walk in Darkness" (not properly a comedy), at the 48th Street Theatre, and Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's "Scandal," at the 39th Street. Mr. Davis's play is low without being exactly base, and Mr. Hamilton's is base without being, in the class or caste sense, low. The first-named is not really welcomed, and the second receives a welcome which dissembles a rebuff. There is plenty of laughter and applause for Mr. Hamilton, but the crucial second act, in which the current stage, long studious in self-debasement, arrives at mastery in that facile art, leaves in the mind of the audience a question mark instead of the coveted exclamation point. Neither play is constructively sound. Mr. Hamilton, who was a diligent and provident artist in the "Blindness of Virtue," now reposes on the fortunate discovery that prurience is a dispensation from art. Some day the awakening may be rude. It is no more possible to content even sexualists with raw sex than to content drunkards with raw alcohol or gluttons with raw food.

What impresses me in the plays of the hour and of the crowd is less the failure of the public taste to refine itself, than its failure to define itself. Its first requirement, indeed, is definite enough; the public wants laughs, kisses, shudders, but its demand and its instructions cease at this point. The public mind is simple and mysterious like a child's, and like a child's its mind is a mystery to itself. It can give no orders; it can only give vetoes, and, what is worse, it does not veto practices or qualities or elements, but simply plays. The public, though vastly good-natured, though compliant almost to the verge of complacency, is nevertheless, finally, a hard master. Normally, a hard master is a good disciplinarian; a loose disciplinarian is a kind master; each state has its compensations. But the theatrical public is at the same time difficult and lax; it is a hard master and a loose disciplinarian; its refusals are many, but it has none of that constancy and consistency in refusal which is the essence of discipline.

Nothing is harder to meet than the demand which is exacting without being exact. No person is more troublesome than the man who, when asked what he wants to read or to eat, replies with a genial disavowal of preference, "Almost anything." Apart from its primary demand for shudders, laughs, and kisses, the public requirements and exclusions are unfixed. With the reservation just made, there is hardly a virtue which a dramatist is forced to regard as indispensable; there is hardly an enormity which he is called upon to abjure as fatal. Art is the adjustment of conduct to conditions; it thrives on conditions. High conditions make high art; many conditions and sharp conditions make exact art. The reason why our commercial drama, having sacrificed everything to pleasure, succeeds so indifferently in the task of pleasing is that the demand which it has to meet is almost a demand for unconditioned pleasure.

O. W. FIRKINS

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little farther into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available without much trouble, through publisher, book-seller, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles are in no sense bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

Treaties

THE treaty has been on the front page of the newspapers for months, but as the debate over its ratification comes to an acute stage it may interest some readers to look at a few books upon the general subject of treaties and their making.

Immediately we are in a different world. The pleasant and romantic sections of the book-shelves devoted to China and Mexico, which we looked through last week and the week before, have changed to austere rows of heavy volumes, bound in sheep and duck. If you ask their custodian for something "authoritative but popular" on treaties, he reminds you, pityingly, that international law is not a subject in which you may lightly dabble for a half hour to anything but your own confusion. And, if the spirit of the law has enveloped him, he will put in front of you some "digest" in ten or twelve fat volumes, or some compilation of "cases" wherein the foot-notes and references cover nearly all of each page.

Yet, if his sheep-bound books have not dried up his humanity, he may admit that Samuel B. Crandall's "Treaties; their Making and Enforcement" (Byrne, 1916) is an extensive study and an authoritative work. In this, the second edition (a stout book), the reader may pick and choose by aid of the table of contents, and learn what he wishes of the history of treaty-making in the

(Continued on page 438)

The Starting Point

"The executives of the present Crocker-Wheeler Company and Charles Curtis were the first to advocate and to adopt the individual motor drive—an idea that has since grown to immense proportions.

"The Individual Motor Drive eliminates all the waste and disadvantages of the old methods and provides economies and the increased efficiency so vital to the welfare of a growing concern."

W. B. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

PEARLS AND PEARL NECKLACES
A NOTABLE COLLECTION

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

The Truth about China and Japan

By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE, author of "Indiscreet Letters from Peking," "The Fight for the Republic in China," etc.

The author has lived in China since childhood and for the past twenty years has held official positions of high importance in the Chinese Government. He is one of the great authorities on the Far East and his book is of vital importance at this time. It lays bare the whole situation. Words are not minced and China's case is given a truthful and vigorous presentation. Ready Sept. 27. $2.00.

Industrial Mexico (1919 Facts and Figures)

By P. HARVEY MIDDLETON

An important book giving actual facts and figures. In detailing present-day conditions and trade opportunities in Mexico, opinions, impressions, theories can be had from any one. The actual facts and figures can only be given after investigation of the ground by a man qualified to see and find out. Mr. Middleton is such a man, knowing Mexico from the Texas border to Yucatan. He has only recently returned from an exhaustive investigation of the whole Mexican field. Ready Oct. 18. $2.00.

Mountain Paths

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK, author of "The Blue Bird," "The Life of the Bee," etc.

The first volume of essays by this famous author in three years. In the eighteen chapters a variety of subjects are treated, particular emphasis, perhaps, being given to the occult and the mystic. Ready Oct. 18. $1.75.

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY
Publishers New York

(Continued from page 436)

United States, and of the powers and relations each to each of the President and the Senate. The effects of treaties, and the treaty relations of this with the other countries are adequately described. The learned author tells of the first President's visit to the Senate and of his indignation at that body's firmness, but he does not consider it appropriate to mention the expressions said to have been used by General Washington upon that occasion. The reader will have to go elsewhere to learn that they were quite unlike "Tut, tut!". Coleman Phillipson, in his "Termination of War and Treaties of Peace" (Unwin, 1916), studies methods of ending wars, giving notable examples of armistices, preliminary negotiations, and treaties, from the Crimean to the Second Balkan War of 1913. "The Great European Treaties of the 19th Century" (Clarendon Press, 1918), by Sir Augustus Oakes and R. B. Mowat, is a book of modest and convenient size, giving in full, or epitomized, the important treaties from 1815 to 1913. Another book, not too long nor too technical for ordinary reading, is Sir Walter Phillimore's "Three Centuries of Treaties of Peace and Their Teaching" (Murray, 1917). Possibly useful, although hardly more than a large pamphlet, is Arthur Ponsonby's "Wars and Treaties, 1815-1914" (Allen & Unwin, 1918). It is good for the brief résumés of the treaties.

There are convenient, single volumes dealing with the whole subject of international law, and, of course, discussing treaties. Two of them are George B. Davis's "Elements of International Law" (4th ed. Harper, 1916) and Thomas J. Lawrence's "Principles of International Law" (Heath, 1912), while a valuable appendage to the latter is the same author's "Documents Illustrative of International Law" (Heath, 1914).

The rapidly increasing flock of books about the League of Nations is one of a librarian's problems to-day. Warm enthusiasm for the League (or for a League) is almost invariably their characteristic, and it may be cynicism which notes that so many of their authors were, fifteen or twenty years ago, touchingly confident about the powers of the Hague Court to abolish warfare. Two studies of a League, written before the one now under consideration was formulated, are Henry N. Brailsford's "A League of Nations" (Headley, 1917) and Ralph C. Minor's "A Republic of Nations" (Oxford Univ. Press, 1918). In "Some Historical Reflections on War, Past and Present" (Oxford Univ. Press, 1916), by Viscount Bryce, is an address briefly and calmly discussing the theory of a league.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

- Birmingham, G. A. Our Casualty. Doran. $1.50 net.
- Cabell, J. B. Jurgen. Robert M. McBride & Co. $2 net.
- Clémenceau, Georges. The Strongest. Doubleday, Page. $1.75 net.
- Clouston, J. S. Simon. Doran. $1.50 net.
- Doyle, A. C. The Doings of Raffles Haw. Doran. $1.50 net.
- Fraser, W. A. Bulldog Carney. Doran. $1.50 net.
- Garstin, Crosbie. The Mud Larks. Doran. $1.50 net.
- Hedges, M. H. Iron City. Boni & Live-right. $1.75 net.
- Marks, H. K. Peter Middleton. Badger. $1.75 net.
- Merrick, Leonard. The Man Who Understood Women, and Other Stories. Introduction by W. J. Locke. Dutton. $2 net.
- Norris, Kathleen. Sisters. Doubleday, Page. $1.60 net.
- Smith, H. J. The Other Side of The Wall. Doubleday, Page. $1.60 net.
- Taylor, K. H. Barbara of Baltimore. Doran. $1.50 net.
- Van Loan, C. E. Taking the Count. Doran. $1.50 net.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

- Abbot, W. J. The Story of Our Merchant Marine. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.
- Hyndman, H. M. The Awakening of Asia. Boni & Liveright. $2 net.
- Morse, H. B. The International Relations of the Chinese Empire. 3 volumes. Longmans, Green. $8 net.
- Vizetelly, E. A. Paris and Her People. Stokes. $4.50 net.

The Review is Established

as an organ of sane American opinion; it has found a definite place in American journalism; it is read in more than 600 libraries in every state in the Union; it is quoted every week by newspapers throughout the country.

Can you afford to be without THE REVIEW?

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

R.9.27.9

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

R.9.27.9

THE REVIEW

OCT 7 1919

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 21

New York, Saturday, October 4, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	439
Editorial Articles:
Results of the President's Tour	442
The Steel Strike	442
Revolution by Conspiracy	443
An Analysis of Mr. Bullitt's Testimony	444
The Latest Witness from Bolshevik Russia. By David Aronson	446
A Commissar Disillusioned. By Jerome Landfield	447
The Workings of Democracy. By F. J. Whiting	448
Poetry: A Ballade of Despots. By W. G. Tinckom-Fernandez	450
Correspondence	450
The Canadian Industrial Conference	452
Book Reviews:
A Good Intent Gone Wrong	453
Yarns, Medium Size	454
Lest We Forget	455
Orthodox Recent History	456
The Run of the Shelves	456
Drama:
Mark Reed and Eugene Walter	457
Books and the News: Crime. By Edmund Lester Pearson	458

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

THE people of the country will sympathize deeply with the President in the illness which has interrupted his speaking tour in behalf of the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations. Whether one accepts all the principles and details of the League or not, there can be no question of the high moral and political purpose of the statesmen by whom it was formulated. It is a sincere attempt on the part of high-minded men to relieve the world, so far as is humanly possible, from the constant danger of such stupendous tragedies as the war which has just ended. No one has been ardent enough to predict its unqualified success, but unqualified success does not ordinarily come to human undertakings. One may question certain features of it, even hold that it has points of possible danger, without attaching any real importance to the cries of some that it is either an inevitable breeder of wars or a shrewd scheme of England and France for the undoing of the United States. The Review has advised, and believes, that the condition of the world being at present what it is, the Treaty should be ratified, and without any such reservations as would either send it back to the Peace Conference or nullify any of its vital purposes.

FROM the standpoint of Anglo-American solidarity and good feeling it may be considered unfortunate that the first major issue raised by the opponents of the League Covenant in its present form relates to the voting power of the United States and the British Empire in the Assembly. But the question was bound to be raised, and it is perhaps better to clear the atmosphere by dealing with it at once. Three amendments have been proposed to safeguard the United States against possible prejudicial action as the result of the inclusion of self-governing British dominions in the League as independent members. The committee amendment provides that in disputes to which Great Britain is a party, and therefore ineligible to vote, her self-governing dominions and colonies shall likewise be debarred from voting. Senator Johnson's amendment is bold and direct. He would give to the United States a number of votes equal to the combined vote of Great Britain and her colonies. Practically, the adoption of this amendment would kill the League, and it may well be a gesture to this end. On the one hand, it would give England and America together a voting preponderance that could not be accepted by the other Powers, and, on the other, would permit on overwhelming combination of American and colonial delegates on certain issues peculiar to their special interests, particularly in the Pacific. Senator McCumber's amendment does not differ in principle from that proposed by the Committee, but puts it in better and less aggressive form.

Either the Committee amendment or the McCumber amendment would simply incorporate the interpretation voiced by the President in his recent explanation of Article XV and the votes of the Dominions. They contemplate, however, only negative action—exclusion of voting and the single veto in the Council—but there are other possible contingencies to be considered. Nothing is said about the combining of votes to elect members to the Council, a fruitful opportunity for clever political combinations. Nor does it seem to be realized that, in spite of the interposition of a single veto in the Council, the adverse vote of the remaining members can not but have great international significance. If positive action is to be expected, then positive votes are important. The weakness of the President's position seems to lie in the assumption that international friction is caused by disputes that come into the open and are amenable to debate and discussion. The deeper causes of friction must be removed by more positive action, and nations whose vital interests conflict will no doubt attempt to manoeuvre within the League. And unless the League is to be an association designed merely to postpone action, account must be taken of the voting power of its members and the future political alignments. These considerations are urged, not to raise insurmountable obstacles to an institution which with proper safeguards should be put into effect without delay, but to point out its limitations, lest the oversanguine should expect too much, and, relying upon it blindly, give too little heed to the realities of international relations.

IT is a shocking advertisement that Omaha has given to herself in her inability to cope with the lawless mob which terrorized her streets, tried to hang her Mayor, burned her courthouse, hanged a negro who was already in the hands of the law, with no indication that he would escape the penalty of his crime, and was finally reduced to the outward semblance of order only by having the streets filled with United States soldiers. The lesson of this tragedy and disgrace should impress not merely Omaha, but the whole country, with the need of a deeper realization of the vital importance of law and order on the part of all who really desire the maintenance of a civilized state, and the necessity of a more watchful and vigorous control of the elements whose wish and purpose are only too clearly revealed in the Nebraska outburst. It would be a mistake to account for the mob on the theory of mere prejudice against the negro. The color of the man lynched and the crime he had committed were, with a large part of the mob, nothing more than mere pretexts. The sooner we realize that we have a large element among us only waiting for some such spark with which to start a fire, the easier it will be to find the pathway to safety.

GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO appealed to the America of Lincoln when, "as an interpreter of the valorous sentiments of the whole Italian people," he proclaimed the annexation of Fiume to Italy. Seeing how difficult it is for contemporaries of the late Col. Roosevelt to agree as to the stand he would have taken towards Mr. Wilson's League of Nations, it is hardly worth while to guess at what President Lincoln would have thought of the Italian poet's coup de main. However, here is a quotation from a letter that he wrote to Mr. Hodges on April 4, 1864: "By general law life and limb must be protected, yet often a limb must be amputated to save a life, but a life is never wisely given to save a limb." Put to the test of this "general law" the poet's attempt would scarcely have found favor in the eyes of the man who formulated it. D'Annunzio claims Fiume to be a limb of the Italian body, an organic part of the whole. But Italy, in her turn, is a limb of the European body, and by refusing to give up Fiume, she is in grave danger of being cut off herself from the organism to which she belongs. And thus isolated, by her own waywardness, from the comity of nations, she would appear to have fallen into the very error to which Lincoln alluded of having given her life "to save a limb." For if the Italian Government is forced to give way to the spirit of bravura which D'Annunzio has aroused in the popular mind, the country will place itself outside the League of Nations and suffer all the hardships which a political and economic boycott entails.

THE applause into which the entire Italian Chamber burst when Deputy Eugenio Chiasa made an enthusiastic reference to D'Annunzio's adventure shows how far the poet's interference has vitiated the entire question of Fiume. For it never was, with the politically minded Italians, a matter of sentiment. If the city actually had a preponderantly Italian population, the Italian delegates at the Peace Conference need never have pressed the strategic reasons which made Mr. Wilson opposed to their demands. An appeal to the right of self-determination would have been a much stronger argument to base their claim upon. If Italy, as D'Annunzio asserts, could not live without Fiume, why then did she agree to its cession to Croatia under the secret treaty of London? At the time when that pact was concluded the Dual Monarchy was still a great Power, and Italy not yet the sole maritime ruler of the Adriatic. The fall of the Hapsburg Monarchy gave her the opportunity of gaining the hegemony over that part of the Mediterranean, and Fiume was deemed by her naval experts to be indispensable for the completion of its defensive organization. In the memorandum presented by the Italian delegation to the Peace Conference on this question, economic considerations are also urged for the cession of Fiume to Italy: "The competition of a Yugoslav or non-Italian Fiume would, by its competition, prove detrimental to an Italian Trieste. But the two ports, in the hands of Italy, could without any conflict of interests and to the common advantage of the respective 'hinterlands' become of great maritime service." We do not see why on these grounds Italy should have been denied the grant of the city, as the other claimants, the Yugoslavs, until the fall of the Hapsburgs was imminent, were enlisted against the Entente and had taken an active part in the Austrian attack against Serbia. The more is the pity that the Italians, by bringing sentiment to bear on the matter, have obscured the clear aspect of the issue.

IN the days when Becky Sharp went to school young ladies who had finished their education were presented by the headmistress with a copy of the Bible. In Germany the worship of the state has superseded religion, and in accordance with that change the adult Fritzes and Gretchens will henceforth see their happiness at leaving school completed by the gift of a copy of the Constitution. Such is the provision of Article 148 of the new fundamental law of the German Reich. Fritz and Gretchen will have better reason than Becky had to fling the present at the reverend feet of their late tutors. We do not say this from any disrespect for the document in question, for we admit that, as a sample of democratic legislation, it conforms to up-to-date requirements, including the nationalization of railroads and waterways serving general traffic. But apart from its political and educational value, it has little to attract the attention of youthful minds just released from the bondage of the classroom.

Still, they may find interesting passages among its 181 articles, which, read in the light of the history taught them at school, will make them realize their own happiness in living under the new dispensation. The sons and daughters of the Liebknechts and the Clara Zetkins will think of their parents in prison on reading that "all Germans have the right to form societies or associations for purposes not contrary to the penal law." "Every German has the right, within the limits of the general laws, to express his opinion by word, in writing, printing, by picture, or in any other way," begins Article 118, promising the growing generation a freedom which their parents never enjoyed. Provisions for the protection of children and motherhood, for the free development of foreign minorities among the nation, the recognition of the sacredness of the home, and of the right to complete liberty of worship and conscience, are only a few of the many features which will call up before the reader of this document the vision of a better, chastened Germany. It is for the youthful recipients of the constitutionally prescribed presentation copies to render life to the dead letter of this law.

IT does not appear that the drowning of young McCullough, at Colgate University, merits any severe censure of the Colgate authorities. So tragic an ending was only a very remote chance of a class prank which in itself was far milder than many such features of rough-and-tumble class activities in a large number of our American colleges. But the tragedy should not pass without impressing upon both college faculties and college students the duty of considering even the remoter chances in such cases. Any college man knows the real source of the difficulty in breaking up the sophomore-freshman "horseplay" that attends the opening of most colleges—the state of mind of the average freshman himself, who would feel just a little miffed, after all he had heard in High School, if his class were the first to be subjected to the indignity and notoriety of a quiet and dignified reception into college life. But there is no question that the general public is a little weary of any tendency in college students to treat lightly the common obligations of law and order. And to the favor of the general public the college owes too much not to treat its opinions and feelings with all reasonable consideration. What has been said applies also to much that occurs in connection with college fraternity initiations. The real tragedies in these frivolities are, of course, extremely rare; but each one that does occur should mark the rise to a higher level of college opinion and practice in such matters. Any one who has seen the gloom that overspreads a college community in such a case knows that no student body can justly be called careless of the lives of its individual members.

THE late Charles L. Freer, who died on September 25, in his sixty-fourth year, was one of the most successful art collectors of his time. He was born at Kingston, New York, and educated in the public schools. At Detroit he quickly made a fortune in manufacturing and in the operation of railroads, and the last thirty years of his life were chiefly devoted to collecting in many fields. These interests were the more intense as he never married and cared little for general society. He began by acquiring the paintings of the more advanced American artists, Tryon, Dewing, Twachtman. From them he passed naturally to their cosmopolitan affinity, Whistler. Between paintings, drawings, and prints his Whistler collection overran a thousand items, including such a rarity as the "Peacock Room," made for the shipbuilder Leyland. Whistler, again, was a link with the exquisite art of Japan. More than twenty-five years ago Mr. Freer was carefully buying, besides the color prints, the masterpieces of Sesshu, Korin, Sotatsu, and Hokusai. From them he passed to the graver painting of old China, his collection of which is equaled in the Western world only at Boston.

As Mr. Freer passed middle life, his habit became that of an invalid, and frequent journeys evoked new interests. He concerned himself with Egyptian excavation, purchased sagaciously Levantine objects of all periods, acquired rare early Christian pieces—manuscripts, miniatures, and metal work. About ten years ago he made a unique disposition of his treasures, deeding them to the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, for the sum of one dollar, but retaining possession of the collections (and adding to them) during his life. This remarkable donation, with attendant legal complications, was furthered by the tact and enthusiasm of that many-sided President, Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Freer, wishing the installation of the museum to represent his own impeccable taste, provided a building now nearly finished. It will be one of the most delightful museums in the world. A reserved and unexpressive person in general relations, Mr. Freer found his fullest expression only in the field of art. A chronicler of his doings would discover countless instances of covert generosity towards individual artists, teachers of art, and struggling enterprises of æsthetic intent. To dwell on this little-known side of his beneficence would not please him; he cared for results and not for praise. Mr. Freer combined in a rare degree independent taste with a capacity to take advice, whether from professional critics or his fellow-amateurs. Thus he was easily the most catholic of the great collectors of our time. He has left to the nation inexhaustible resources of instruction and delight. Of few contemporary Americans can one say as confidently that their memory is assured.

ACCORDING to the Census of 1910, there were in that year no less than 13,345,545 foreign-born whites in the United States, of whom about 3,400,000 were natives of English-speaking countries, about 3,000,000 natives of German-speaking countries, and, roughly, 7,000, 000 of other nationality. This enumeration does not, of course, include native-born Americans one or both of whose parents were foreign-born, nor does it take account of the fact that many of the foreign-born came to the United States when quite young and commonly used no language but English. It is evident, therefore, that there are many million people in this country who speak some language other than English or German, and who, if they read at all, prefer newspapers, magazines, and books printed in that language. A recent inquiry made for the Review confirms this opinion, as it indicates that there are, not counting the German, at least 1,225 foreign-language periodicals—dailies, weeklies and monthlies—issued in the United States, with a total circulation of about 8,000,000. The list includes 212 Italian periodicals, 150 Spanish, 101 Polish, 81 Swedish, 75 Bohemian, 67 Jewish, 48 French, 44 Slovak, 39 Magyar, 36 Japanese, 30 Greek, 30 Lithuanian, 27 Finnish, 22 Dutch, 18 Chinese, 15 Russian, 14 Serbian, 10 Ukrainian, and many others representing nearly all the European and several Asiatic languages. It is frequently assumed that the foreign-language press in general represents very radical views, but such is not the case, as in this list only 80 periodicals can be classed as Socialist, Bolshevik or Anarchist, and they have a circulation of only 631,000, whereas there are in the United States about 350 radical or red publications issued in English, with a circulation of about 10,000,000. Of even the Russian periodicals only 2 are Socialist and 5 Bolshevik or I. W. W., out of a total of 15. Evidently, the foreign-language press exists primarily for the instruction and consolation of strangers in a strange land, rather than for the propagation of un-American views. It may have some tendency to retard the Americanization of aliens and even of their children; but it may also serve a good purpose in tiding over the danger period in the moral life of the younger generation who, ceasing to be foreign, have not yet become American.

MAN might, it is true, have invented a better game than baseball, but it is pretty certain he never did. It is not a "gentleman's" game—no flannels and afternoon tea about it. Nor is it, like golf, a long, lonely struggle with one's own personality; nor, like football, a swift Homeric clash of young and godlike heroes. It is a game of the people—of the American people who have made it and who love it and who in their hearts feel that they have no greater blessing to bestow upon the rest of the world. It is a game that can not possibly be played so badly as to be uninteresting, yet can be played so well as to fascinate by its broad strategy and thrill by the speed and perfection of its detail. It affords an outlet for much instinctive human energy which otherwise finds expression in all sorts of nationalistic and economic madness. In a world's championship series (note the calm assumption—America first and the rest nowhere!) there is a preliminary weighing of chances, balancing of resources, "dope," in short, enough to soothe the most active-minded political intriguer and keep him out of mischief. If a small part of the energy that has gone to creating—and destroying—a League of Nations had been expended in an initial effort to make the National League international, the American League universal; if our munitions factories had been set to turning out baseballs and bats and gloves for a whole world of rooters, a planetary fandom, the prospects of democracy would be considerably brighter than they are at present.

THE ex-Kaiser is reported to have bought, besides a castle for himself, a number of villas in the village of Doorn, which, according to local gossip, will be used for various members of the ex-royal staff. The Hollanders will, doubtless, view this German inroad of hangers-on of dethroned royalty with anything but pleasure. Doorn is the Dutch word for "thorn," and a thorn in the flesh of Holland the village will be if it becomes the fixed residence of the ex-Kaiser and a hearth of counter-revolutionary intrigue.

THE representative of the Associated Press at Vienna is, evidently, of the stuff that Bolsheviks are made of. In a despatch, or shall we say Bullittin, dated September 18, he refers to acts of brutality committed by the Hungarian White Terrorists, giving as his authority "such conservative newspapers as the Neue Freie Presse and Arbeiter Zeitung."

If the standpoint of this latter organ of Labor is, in his eyes, averse to progress, any policy will appear stagnant to him which does not conform to the practice of Lenin and Bela Kun.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION

140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President

MAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN

MAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Results of the President's Tour

MINGLED with the great regret which is felt over the President's illness there must be no little satisfaction, even on the part of his warm friends, that his series of speeches was cut short at this juncture. He had ample time in which to stir the country, if it was to be stirred, and the last few days of his tour did not show the President at his best. Unfortunately, the public is still in doubt as to the impression which Mr. Wilson made. He himself is certain that fully eighty per cent. of his fellow countrymen are solidly behind him. Yet judging by the press reports, one would probably be justified in concluding that the country at large is, even yet, somewhat in the dark as to the significance of the Covenant but holds that, if this country can be properly safeguarded, it would be glad to see the business in hand dispatched without further delay. In short, as the situation stands to-day, the President could probably come off with a real victory if he would yield to the position of the moderate reservationists.

Compromise of some sort seems inevitable, and Mr. Wilson would work to his own interest by taking magnanimously what is here so clearly offered him. According to his own reasoning, our obligations will not be weakened by setting down in black and white, as interpretation, the manner in which the United States Government is almost sure to approach its duties under the treaty. This procedure must strike the average citizen as being merely sportsmanlike. The President, apparently, has no great objection to such moderate reservations. He describes them as futile expansions of clauses which are already plain to the eye. He would prefer to sign the document as it now is and to allow us to interpret our moral obligations in the light of our best judgment as each case arises. To our thinking, it speaks well for the country that it is not ready to agree to a contract which it feels instinctively it will not live up to, save by a method of interpretation which must inevitably set the rest of the world to thinking that America is not playing the game.

Taken as a whole, the President's speeches in the West can not be said to have added much to the people's education. The proof of this is the applause at Salt Lake City which greeted his reading of the proposal for Article X offered by the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee. The President had to use strong language to bring the audience back to a proper respect for the authoritative version of this article. One is reminded of the profane laughter in the House of Commons which followed Mr. Lloyd George's mention of the League. At this stage, it seems clear that the country does not wholly understand the bearings of the League of Nations; that it is quite ready to enter a League if such an organization is for the world's best interests; and that it does not wish our entrance to be niggardly. What has Mr. Wilson done to clarify the subject? He started by using generalities and by putting into words a glowing vision. This may have been a good introduction. The country usually responds to what it gladly accepts as idealistic purposes. But in such cases it is the man behind the words which counts most, and there are many in the West, as in the East, who are not entirely convinced that the President's leadership, especially up to our late entrance into the war, has been of the wisest. It is not pleasant to be forever calling up the past, but this is the more necessary since the League of Nations, so far as this country is concerned, is bound up with the President. And faith in it, while any real understanding of its workings is popularly lacking, is predicated upon faith in him. The President, for example, has been using as an argument for our unqualified acceptance of the Covenant the aims for which we took up arms. Has he forgotten that it was but a short time before we declared war that he desired to be told what the aims of the Allies were?

Under his sweeping generalities must be classed his statement that the only organized forces opposed to the League of Nations are the pro-Germans. This remark proved to be a disastrous boomerang. For it brought a hot protest from Mr. Henry A. Wise Wood, president of the League for the Preservation of American Independence, an organization having for its purpose the support of members of the Senate opposed to the Covenant in its present form. Any one who knows of Mr. Wood's efforts to induce the President, prior to April, 1917, to assert our rights towards Germany in the most vigorous manner must appreciate the folly of the President's reckless statement. Equally unfortunate, from the point of view of the past, were his implication that opponents of the League are actuated by a spirit of cowardice and his statement, "I can not understand hesitation."

Even when Mr. Wilson descended to a discussion of details, he was not effective. Frankness was lacking from his explanation of the manner in which this country could always protect its interests through its vote in the Council. He allowed Senator Reed to furnish the information that one or another of the British Dominions might be seated in the Council. This fact, to be sure, did not overthrow his point, but knowledge of it might better have been given to the people by him. He has been silent on the question whether, in a given instance, the veto of the United States in the face of unanimity on the part of the other members of the Council might not breed a serious antagonism. He proposed the Irish problem as a proper subject of discussion for the League and said nothing concerning the League's duties as to the Philippines. He reminded us that we did not protest when Germany acquired the rights in Shantung which have now passed to Japan, forgetting that we look to a justice-loving organization like the League of Nations to improve upon the old diplomacy. He asserted that the League would greatly help the condition of labor without setting forth any reasons for his belief. A careful discussion of this interesting question would have been most helpful.

These animadversions upon Mr. Wilson's argumentative methods are made in no cantankerous spirit. What the country most needs to-day is buckling down to the business in hand. The treaty should be ratified as soon as this can safely be done, and it is to be hoped that, when the President recovers from the exhaustion resulting from his most arduous tour of the country, he may seek to effect the compromise which is probably his for the asking. He can be conciliatory without abasing himself, and as a result can almost surely see the spirit of the League triumphant, even if the letter is a bit altered.

The Steel Strike

IT would be unsafe as yet to predict either an immediate collapse of the strike of the steel workers or its continuance over any long period. Events of a day may hasten or retard the end. But whether it comes sooner or later, there is so far no indication that it will bring success to the plans of the leaders by whom it was forced. No statement made in advance, nothing brought out by the labor leaders who have appeared before the Senate committee, has convinced the average unprejudiced observer that the men called out had any such real grievances as to justify a strike at this time, when the need of continued production is so acute. The talk about the "terrible conditions" of laborers in the steel plants was not backed up by evidence, and not in accord with the great increase in the rate of wages which has marked the steel industry during the war period. Furthermore, the events of the past week have made it increasingly plain that the strike never would have occurred but for the long and energetic efforts of men not in the employ of the plants against which it was brought. Nor has the theory that these outside organizers were merely going to the rescue of men sorely distressed and unable to help themselves made any headway in public opinion. Such a claim finds no easy progress against the ample evidence that many thousands of the workmen directly involved did not want the strike at all. In the circumstances, it was inevitable that the movement, once launched, should find itself destitute of any material popular support.

Yet to say that it lacks positive support is but half the story. Opinion could rest at this neutral point only if the situation concerned merely the employers and the workmen. But perhaps no industry in the land extends its ramifications in more directions than that of the production of steel. The inconveniences caused by its violent interruption are countless, and wherever they occur they arouse a feeling of resentment which could be removed only by proof that the strike was so clearly a last resort to secure justice that all good citizens ought to submit to whatever inconveniences it may bring. As no such proof is forthcoming, the growth of these attendant inconveniences, as the strike drags on, marks a corresponding growth of positive disapproval. But popular disapproval does not rest merely on the material inconvenience of the strike. There is a growing conviction that the leaders who forced it were not moved by any particular concern over conditions in the steel industry at all, but are merely using that industry as a tool for ulterior purposes. Mr. Foster, the leading spirit, specifically identified himself with a widely revolutionary programme only a few years ago. His closest associations are not with those who would seek betterment of the laborer's position through conciliation, but with radical revolutionists, who would be only too glad of an opportunity to knock the supports from beneath the whole system of private enterprise in productive industry. It is clear enough to the careful observer that this radical wing has been making a desperate effort to get control of all organized labor.

This feeling that the strike is not a sincere movement for the benefit of the workers in the steel plants at all, but that it is allied with just the same revolutionary movement which has brought the ruin of Russia, furnishes a heavy weight of support to Judge Gary and his associates in their refusal to negotiate with the men by whom the strike was organized and is directed. As was said in these columns last week, American sentiment was never more ready than to-day to listen with favor to any just demand for betterment of the condition of those who toil; but American intelligence is a little too keen to be convinced that the betterment of the toiler, or of anybody else, is to be found in knocking the foundations from under the edifice of civilization which centuries of thought and toil have built up.

It is not asserted, of course, that the masses of men who go out on a strike of this type are consciously bent upon revolution. Many of them are wholly unaware of the deeper designs of their revolutionary leaders, and would shrink back at once if a clearly revolutionary purpose were openly declared. Indeed, if Mr. Foster were to come out now with a statement that his immediate aim was to bring about what he declared as his programme a few years ago, the chances are that the strike would collapse in a day. But this does not remove the danger. The seeds of revolution thrive in the soil of violence and disorder, and at a time when Bolshevistic ideas find so many agencies of distribution, sober-minded people can not afford to countenance any course of action which naturally leads to violence and disorder.

The labor leaders, including Mr. Gompers along with the more radical, do not help their cause in public opinion by the growing tendency to scoff at the "welfare work" undertaken in recent years by so many employers. One can not believe that the rank and file of laborers themselves are wholly unappreciative of these efforts to give them pleasanter surroundings in their work, to provide healthful forms of recreation and entertainment, and to help them in various other ways which are ordinarily considered as contributory to the comfort and pleasure of living. A large manufacturing concern can provide far more of these good things of life than could be obtained individually for the same amount of money distributed to the employees to spend for themselves; and it is a well-known fact that the companies which do most in this way are also the companies which are most liberal in the matter of wages. No question of pauperizing the recipients arises here, any more than in connection with similar work done by so many churches. And yet Mr. Gompers can join with men usually less thoughtful than he in sneeringly referring to such efforts as "hell-fare work." It is hard to find any explanation of such an attitude. It does not seem to originate with the laborers, but rather with the professional labor agitator. In him, the dislike of the system can very readily be explained as due to the feeling that welfare work actually does tend to make the laborer contented with his lot, and its prospects, and less inclined to be continually at swords points with his employer, less easily led into strikes, less accessible to revolutionary propaganda. To arrive in peace and good will at a really stable concord between labor and capital, allowing the latter sufficient profit to stimulate enterprise, and keeping an ever open pathway by which the laborer of thrift and energy may himself become a capitalist, would not suit those leaders whose tastes and talents are developed along the one line of agitation and conflict. And it is this class of leaders which has forced itself to the front, not only in the steel strike but in a fairly large share of the epidemic of strikes that has followed the closing of the war, both in this and other countries. We are aware, of course, that Mr. Gompers has confessed a change of heart on behalf of Mr. Foster, but the confession can hardly be accepted as satisfactory in view of Mr. Foster's utterances subsequent to the alleged date of recantation, to say nothing of the normal interpretation of his present course of action. And it is a notable fact that the committee of twenty-four now advising with Mr. Foster in the conduct of the strike is putting no brake whatever on his radicalism, but aiding him in its worst features, such as the attempt to paralyze the activity of the Pennsylvania State Constabulary in maintaining order.

Revolution by Conspiracy

ONE of the most notable features of American life was the sense of security in which our people lived. In pioneer days, when savages and wild beasts abounded, and the cold and famine of winter threatened destruction to the careless and improvident, danger was ever present, and fear was a powerful stimulus to industry, frugality, and untiring vigilance. Now, however, that those obvious dangers are gone and we have a continent to ourselves, with friendly Canada to the north, harmless Mexico to the south, and broad oceans to east and west, we dwell till recently in a paradise of security, sitting at ease under our own vine and fig-tree, none daring to make us afraid. Doubtless the American people were more care-free than any that the world has known—except possibly the British people before the war and some islanders in the Pacific Ocean.

Even the World War did not altogether awaken us from our pleasant dream. For three years it was to us hardly more than a terrible spectacle. It was not until the ferocious German drive in Picardy began that we had a real tremor of fear, as it occurred to us that our own life, liberty, and property might be at stake; and as soon as the Central Powers were crushed we laid aside our armor and resumed our ordinary way of life, fearing no enemy, without or within. The people of Continental Europe, trained in another school, were not so easy in their mind; hence they demanded all the guarantees they could get against the recurrence of war, and they were keenly alert to the danger of a social revolution that might destroy what is left of modern civilization.

Now the western world is beginning to see how badly it has been fooled by the parlor socialists. Not only did they lull people to sleep with their song of peace when there was no peace, but they described the social revolution in such terms as to make it appear as an angel of light. By a sort of intellectual sleight-of-hand the fearsome word revolution was made to disappear and the magic word evolution took its place. The jugglery is simple: "Verbally, revolution is but evolution with the addition of a single letter; scientifically, it is merely the last step in a long and gradual process of evolution, like the emergence of a butterfly from the chrysalis or the breaking of a chicken from the egg; politically it does not come until the majority want it, when by the simple casting of a ballot they quietly take control. Moreover, capitalism is even now preparing the way by the socializing of one industry after another—the municipal monopolies, the railways, the trusts—and presently there will be almost complete state socialism; whereupon the property owners, having already parted with the substance of their power, will hand over the shadow also—with their blessing—to the educated, civilized, regenerated proletariat."

When this theory is applied to particular countries, it follows that those which are the most highly developed, industrially and capitalistically, like Great Britain and the United States, must be well along the road to socialism; while those that are industrially backward, like Russia, must be very far from the goal. Marx, in fact, had little hope of a successful revolution in Russia until the peasants should be reduced to utter poverty by the growth of large estates; and even Lenin, who poses as an orthodox Marxian, said, as late as July, 1917, that an agrarian revolution was all that could be expected at that time. Marx, in his later and more evolutionary mood, states the theory thus:

No social order ever disappears before all the productive forces for which there is no room in it have been developed; and new and higher relations of production never appear before the material conditions of their existence have matured in the womb of the old society.

But theorizing such as this, while it may be good for purposes of propaganda among the propertied classes, does not go far with the proletariat, who demand stronger doctrine and the promise of more speedy results. This also socialism can supply, for while it speaks the language of persuasion and sweet reasonableness to the timid bourgeoisie, to the proletariat it speaks the language of hate and violence, bidding them arise to destroy and spare not. Marx, with all his scientific poise, speaks both languages with equal fluency, although his intemperate utterances are found chiefly in his earlier writings. In the Rheinische Zeitung, in 1849, he said:

When our time comes, revolutionary terrorism will not be sugar-coated. . . . There is but one way of simplifying, shortening, concentrating the death agony of the old society, as the bloody labor of the new world's birth—revolutionary terror.

Marx was no parlor socialist at any time of his life, and if he were living to-day he would probably give substantial assent to the following quotation from Lenin's "Soviets at Work":

It is not hard to see that during any transition from capitalism to socialism a dictatorship is necessary for two main reasons, or in two main directions. In the first place, it is impossible to conquer and destroy capitalism without the merciless suppression of the resistance of the exploiters, who can not be at once deprived of their wealth, of their advantages in organization and knowledge, and who will, therefore, during quite a long period inevitably attempt to overthrow the hateful (to them) authority of the poor. Secondly, every great revolution, and especially a socialist revolution, even if there were no external war, is inconceivable without an internal war, with a state of the greatest uncertainty, instability and chaos.

In fact, the doctrine of the class struggle, compounded of real grievances with a large admixture of prejudice, misrepresentation and hatred, is not a harmless beverage which people can take with impunity and remain as they were; it is rather a strong poison that works powerful changes in the brain of all who indulge in it, and drives men of unstable mind to mad attacks upon the society which they have learned to hate and despise. It is all very well to tell such people to be calm, to restrain themselves, to wait for the day of evolution, which may not come for a thousand years. They have been taught to believe that it was coming soon; they have worked for it, hoped for it, had visions of it by night and by day; and now it appears just ahead, with only a feeble, contemptible little group of capitalists standing in the way. What wonder if they rush ahead, like the dogs of war, to destroy what they can never re-create. Meanwhile, the parlor socialists are aghast at the havoc which their disciples have wrought, and would fain stop them in their mad career. In vain! They have sowed the wind and they reap the whirlwind.

Conspiracy is an essential and inseparable feature of revolution. It is the activity of an impatient minority of believers trying to hasten the day of their dreams. And their plans frequently succeed—as may be seen in the history of many revolutions and coups d'état—but over the after-effects of their achievements they seem to have slight control. Rigid evolutionists to the contrary notwithstanding, there is place in nature for the cataclysm, the catastrophe, for what Marx would call the mortal leap, but what prudent people who have something to lose call the leap in the dark. If the prudent people of Russia, after the revolution of March, 1917, had been able to agree on a definite policy and had been wise and courageous in carrying it out, they might have forestalled the conspiracy of Lenin and Trotsky and the Petrograd Soviet which resulted in the coup d'état of November 7 and all the misery and chaos of Bolshevik rule.

Such calamities, we may even yet believe, can never come to us. Revolutionary conspiracies have no place in a country so great and prosperous as ours, where there is no poverty-stricken working class and no intellectual proletariat to manufacture discontent. The foundations of European society may be rocking, but ours are built of other material. Thus we soothe ourselves with comfortable words, and turn a deaf ear to those who would disturb the spirit of our dream. And yet when we consider certain symptoms of discontent—the discontent over the high cost of living, the demands of organized labor, the threats of the I. W. W., the epidemic of strikes, the strange outbreaks of violence here and there, the semi-revolutionary movements in Seattle and Winnipeg—we must find reason to doubt the completeness of our immunity.

An Analysis of Mr. Bullitt's Testimony

PERUSAL of the testimony of Mr. William C. Bullitt before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate gives one a feeling of eavesdropping, or of opening and reading a letter addressed to someone else. The dominant impression is that of the caddishness of the dapper young millionaire who had been employed in a most confidential capacity and entrusted with the details of the most delicate negotiations, pouring forth with evident relish the piquant gossip gathered in his association with the chief figures at the Conference. But, after all, what else was to have been expected? Half-baked young radicals have standards peculiar to themselves, and are bound, sooner or later, to abuse the confidence placed in them.

The testimony brought out by the examination of Mr. Bullitt falls into three classes—documents bearing on the treaty; Mr. Bullitt's personal comment on the negotiations to which he was privy; and the reports on the situation in Russia made by himself and by his associates, Mr. Lincoln Steffens and Captain Walter W. Pettit. Among the documents presented are several of importance bearing on the Covenant. These include the plan of Lord Robert Cecil; a typewritten draft of President Wilson's original plan; a printed draft of the same with advice, comment, and suggestions by Mr. David Hunter Miller and Mr. Gordon Auchincloss; a draft of another proposal by the President, incorporating changes made by him in his original plan; and also what was known as a composite draft, largely based on Lord Robert Cecil's recommendations and prepared by the British law experts and Mr. David Hunter Miller. All of these documents are of importance to the Senate Committee for its proper understanding of the Covenant and the intentions of its makers, and should have been furnished by the President in accordance with the spirit of his replies at the White House conference in March. It is evident from them that the President had not clearly formulated his ideas in regard to a League of Nations before leaving America or taken into consultation on the subject competent experts. The surprising fact is brought out that the President stood strongly for a body of Delegates made up of the diplomatic representatives of the members of the League, and opposed the suggestion that there should be representation of the congresses of the several nations. Yet Mr. Bullitt's own comments on the negotiations, coming from a disgruntled employee, should not be taken at their face value until opportunity has been had to hear the testimony of other parties concerned.

Considerable light is thrown upon the confusion that reigned in the Conference in regard to Russian policy. The Peace Delegates were evidently at a loss to know how to deal with this menacing situation. One extremely unfortunate gesture had already been made—the proposed Prinkipo Conference. The petering out of this proposal was followed by the Nansen plan for feeding Russia, and an important part of Mr. Bullitt's testimony deals with the history of this plan, and its failure. In this, however, his testimony is quite at variance with the facts. He fails to point out that the so-called Nansen plan was suggested originally by the Russian Committee, and that the object of the proposal was simply to feed Petrograd, on condition that the Soviet Government would not interfere. This plan was set in somewhat more general terms when Dr. Nansen wrote his letter to the President on April 3, and indicated an organization along the lines of the Belgian Relief Committee. According to Mr. Bullitt, he prepared a reply to the Nansen letter at the request of Col. House. This reply introduced a host of new considerations of a political nature, including a general armistice on all Russian fronts, the immediate withdrawal of Allied and American troops, the lifting of the economic blockade, and the utilization of Russian transport facilities. This, of course, changed the simple scheme of food relief into a big political plan for settling the Russian problem, and it is difficult not to come to the conclusion that it was designed to assist the Soviet Government in maintaining its power. Mr. Hoover put his finger upon the weak spot instantly, for he pointed out that the transport agreement was tantamount to a recognition of the Bolsheviks, and he vetoed the proposal.

It is not quite clear from Mr. Bullitt's testimony who originated the project of his mission to Russia, or whether it was in any way connected with his earlier mission to the Socialist Conference at Berne, concerning which the Foreign Relations Committee might well have interrogated him. At any rate, he went to Russia fully authorized by Secretary Lansing and took with him Mr. Lincoln Steffens, well known as a Bolshevik sympathizer, and Captain W. W. Pettit, of the Military Intelligence Division, formerly a social worker. That Mr. Lloyd George was privy to Mr. Bullitt's mission and his proposals for an agreement with the Soviet Government is sufficiently evidenced by the letter from Mr. Philipp Kerr, in spite of the fact that the opinions expressed therein are insistently declared to be personal and unofficial.

The reports on conditions in Russia made by the three precious investigators are illuminating. The callow Bullitt, utterly ignorant of Russia and Russian matters, spent a whole week at Moscow under the personal direction of the Bolshevik leaders, and was completely taken in by them. He swallowed without question their statements and displayed a credulity only explicable by his ignorance and his Bolshevik sympathies. Captain Pettit did not go to Moscow, but paid three short visits to Petrograd, and his report is likewise a striking example of how a man can be taken in if personally conducted through carefully prepared surroundings. It reminds one of Comte de Ségur being taken through model peasants' villages by Catherine II. One point in his report is sufficient to indicate its character. Commenting on the improvement of food conditions, he states that the suspension of passenger traffic from March 18 to April 10 had resulted in the Government's bringing to Petrograd sixty to one hundred cars of food each day, and that one saw large quantities of food being transported about the city. By his own showing in the same report, he left Petrograd on March 31 and sent his report from Stockholm on April 4. As a matter of fact, passenger traffic was suspended, as he describes, and a vast supply of grain was requisitioned from the peasants and collected near Viatka, but so incompetent were the Bolshevik authorities that no cars were available for transporting this food and it was all ruined. Not a single carload reached Petrograd.

The most illuminating of the three reports, strangely enough, is that of Mr. Lincoln Steffens, because inadvertently he admits the whole case against the Soviet Government. Naturally he misrepresents the soviet idea, because he does not understand it, and believes the silly theories that had been circulated concerning it, but he indicates clearly enough that Lenin's effort to utilize a system which was designed to destroy the established institutions of Russia has failed. The result of the revolution he describes as follows:

The effect is hunger, cold, misery, anguish, disease—death to millions—but worse than this was the confusion of mind among the well and the strong. We did not realize, any of us—even those of us who have imagination—how fixed our minds and habits are by the ways of living that we know. So with the Russians. They understand how to work and live under their old system; it was not a pretty one; it was dark, crooked and dangerous. But they had groped around it all their lives, from childhood up. They could find their way in it, but now they can remember how it was, and they decide for the old ways. . . . And the poor, in their hunger, think now how it would be to go down to the market and haggle and bargain from one booth to another, making their daily purchases, reckoning up their defeats and victories over the traders, and they had good food then. And now—it is all gone. They have destroyed all this and having destroyed it, they are lost—strangers in their own land.

Mr. Bullitt did more than report on conditions in Russia—he brought back with him a proposal for peace—a proposal which was to be offered by the Allies to the Soviet Government, which would accept it, provided it were received by April 10. Fortunately, this proposal died a natural death. Had it been considered seriously, it would have been even a greater blunder than the Prinkipo suggestion. It would have alienated for all time the Russian people, of whom not two per cent. were in favor of the Soviet Government.

The deductions to be drawn from Mr. Bullitt's testimony are that the interests of the United States would have been far better served had the President called into consultation to pass upon the knotty problems of the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations, not inexperienced and second-rate advisers, but the ablest legal minds of America.

The Latest Witness from Bolshevik Russia

[Mr. David Aronson, the author of the following article, is a Russian engineer who, before the war, spent several years in America. He did military service in Russia during the war. A year ago, he was able to send out of the country his wife, who is an American, and their infant son. He himself was obliged to take service under the Bolsheviks, and for nine months worked as an engineer in the Commissariat of Public Constructions. This gave him an exceptional opportunity to observe the workings of the Bolshevik system, not only in Petrograd, but in other parts of Russia as well. He had the good fortune to escape from Petrograd the middle of last July, and brings to us the latest eye-witness account of conditions behind the veil in Bolshevik Russia.]

SINCE July, 1919, when I escaped from Russia, so little time has passed that I can not yet accustom myself to freedom, to the idea that I am not still in Bolshevik Russia.

The other day I ran across the "Metropolitan" magazine and in it the article entitled "The Climax of Raymond Robins' Sensational Story, as told to William Hard."

I read this article over and over again, and can not make out whether this is a story of what Colonel Robins saw or of what he imagined—it must be his imagination. I lived there in Bolshevik Russia, I worked for the Bolsheviks for nine months, and in Mr. Robins' account I fail to recognize the Bolshevik Russia of reality.

Colonel Robins relates that "there was more law and order, gentlemen, in Petrograd and Moscow under the Bolshevik Nikolai Lenin than under the anti-Bolshevik, Alexander Kerensky." No one has a right to speak of order in Petrograd and Moscow and give credit for this order to the ability of the Bolshevik Government. There never was any order, and up to the time I came away, there was no hope of any. Mr. Robins speaks about law being enforced by the Bolsheviks. He must certainly have forgotten or overlooked the decree issued by Lenin, for whom he seems to have such a warm admiration, denouncing the existence of any law and setting up instead the "revolutionary conscience." To recall this decree to Mr. Robins' mind, let me say that it was issued at the same time he abolished the legal profession and did away with lawyers.

He says more, that he saw with his own eyes how they did enforce law and order. It must be that by this he refers to lynching on the streets.

Why did Mr. Robins fail to mention in his article the many cases when the Commissars and Red Guards were caught in highway robbery and, to save themselves, shot innocent persons down, in order to claim that these persons had perpetrated the crime?

He tells how the Bolsheviks stopped the use of alcohol. I am sure he must refer to the raids of the Red Guard upon wine cellars throughout the town, when the Red Guard not only drank themselves full, but literally drowned themselves in the cellars of wine and had to be dragged out by the fire department. After these happenings, all the wine left in Petrograd was confiscated by the Lenin Government and stored at the Bolshevik headquarters, and now, after eighteen months of that order so admirable in Colonel Robins' eyes, it is still possible, by approaching some Bolshevik officials with sufficient money, to obtain the prohibited beverage.

To quote Colonel Robins: "Orderliness was produced. I saw it with my own eyes down to May, 1918." Colonel Robins must have had this conviction produced in him by the sight of the dead lying in the streets of the town after a night's "enforcement" of law and order. I will tell even more to Colonel Robins, that, up to the time I left Petrograd, no one cared to venture out in the streets after dark, especially during the months of February and March, 1919, when the Chinese employed by Lenin as official murderers kept Petrograd in terror of street robberies, not only by night but even by day. Further on, Mr. Robins relates of Mr. Hunt and Mr. Levine: "They saw what I saw. They see a population in which the instinct of personal self-preservation in hunger and agony is held in steady and successful check by the social control of the Soviet power." He must have been helped to this conclusion by a speech made by Zinoviev in Petrograd, who said "there is no hunger; there is no starvation in Russia, in Petrograd in particular, as I will consider that we are afflicted by starvation only when I see a crowd in the streets of Petrograd fighting to death for a dead rat lying on the pavement." If Colonel Robins means this, I agree with him. People were pretty well checked up by the social control.

Colonel Robins says the Soviet system does not consist of riots. I agree with him! But that the Soviet system is plain robbery, I do not believe Colonel Robins in his heart can deny.

I agree with Colonel Robins when he says that Bolshevism is a system that can put numbers together in groups, but I will prove to Colonel Robins that they failed to make from such a group an orderly group, and that they succeeded in grouping only because they find criminal sympathizers with their system of robbery and destruction.

In the months of February, March, and April, 1919, and up to the time of my escape, scarcely a week passed that Lenin, Zinoviev, and Trotsky did not, through the medium of the Bolshevik papers, implore, and unsuccessfully implore, the different Soviets, especially those of Petrograd and Moscow, to refrain from usurping the authority of the Central Power. I must mention to Colonel Robins that in Petrograd alone there are over twenty Soviets which have been substituted for the former police stations. Sometimes law enforced by Soviet No. 1 will be outlawed in Soviet No. 2. So, for example, in one part of Petrograd my passport was suspended and search was being made for me, while at the same time, in another part of town, I was working as a Bolshevik official. Among the pictures illustrating Mr. Robins' article is a photograph of the pass issued to him by Lenin. Mr. Robins speaks with much commendation of the power of this pass, which was so greatly respected all over Soviet Russia and facilitated his travel to Vladivostok, and, incidentally, he sees in this proof of the great popularity of Lenin and understands it as a real power. May I suggest to Colonel Robins two explanations? First, it was well known among the Bolsheviks of Russia that Colonel Robins was an admirer of the Lenin-Trotsky-Zinoviev policy, and furthermore that he would carry in his report to America the records of his admiration, and that in case America should recognize the Lenin-Trotsky-Zinoviev Government, the Bolsheviks felt they could even guess who might be delegated to them as American Ambassador. Secondly, even Bolshevik Russia, regardless of the signature of Lenin, dared not at that time tamper with the head of an American Red Cross Mission.

When Colonel Robins says that the condition of the railroads under the Bolshevik régime was better than under Kerensky, he makes a deliberate misstatement. I hate to put it more strongly. The situation of the railroads from the first day of Bolshevism to the present moment displays the most outrageous anarchy. This I can say with authority, since for nine months I served the Bolsheviks in the railroad department.

To quote Colonel Robins: "If Lenin had been allowed to work his idea out into practice, there would now be no poverty in the world and no misery." Granted, there would be nothing left existing in the world at all.

It is rather a hard task to cover all points in a short review of an article dealing with such a vast subject. It would be necessary to take it up sentence by sentence. But there are a few more things that I feel bound to call attention to.

Speaking of the Bolshevik army, he remarks that the men were more "socialists than soldiers, poorly equipped and poorly trained, under the inspecting eye of a little pacifist Jew." I suggest to Colonel Robins he might possibly admit that they were neither soldiers nor socialists but simply cut-throats in uniform, and that he does not need to point out that Trotsky is "a little pacifist Jew." That is all too well known in Russia.

Speaking of the failure of the Russian church, Colonel Robins does not seem to realize that the terrible persecution it has suffered has had an effect unlooked for by Bolsheviks: that of filling the churches with vaster and vaster crowds.

I wish the people in America, especially the working classes, would really find out the truth about Russia (and this they can do only when they learn how they have been deluded by the peddlers of Bolshevism in America), that poor, bleeding Bolshevik Russia is far, far away from being a land where the proletariat rules; and for this Bolshevism is to blame. I wish they could rightly learn how the Russian proletariat is cheated and how dreadfully they are suffering under Soviet rule, which pretends to be the sole friend and savior of the proletariat. There has never been a moment in the whole history of Russia under Czarism that the working classes have been so oppressed as now.

I know workingmen in America, for I have been a worker myself for several years in America. They might fight governments and capital to better their lives, but they would not fight women and children. They would not torture, for the mere pleasure of torturing, a human being because he happened to belong to a different station of life, as happens now every day in Russia. They would not desecrate and destroy churches, tearing down altars and installing instead moving-picture shows in the places which have been for centuries held sacred by nine-tenths of the Russian people. Nor would they persecute parents and teachers for desiring to bring up children in religion. These things the American proletariat would not do, even if they themselves were unbelievers. The sect of "Holy Jumpers" has as much right here in America to demand toleration for their meetings as has any socialistic convention. It is not so in Russia, in the land of Lenin, Trotsky, and their associate rascals.

The American proletariat must know that to "strike" in Russia, where the so-called friends of the proletariat are in power, means death by execution to the strikers and revenge upon their families.

Everyone ought to know that while the workingmen in Petrograd and Moscow are starving and freezing to death, the leaders of Bolshevism in Russia are living in palaces and know starvation only through the death statistics.

The Russian proletariat which shed its blood during the four years of the great war, and in the struggle to overthrow czarism, has got as its reward the reign of Lenin-Trotsky-Zinoviev and a dozen other despots and thieves.

Russia always looked upon America as a superior friend and now, in this time of misery, hopes that America may help her to get rid of anarchy. But these hopes are not fulfilled if America simply eases up a bit her starvation and so prolongs her agony, for in the end, under Bolshevism, all life must perish.

DAVID ARONSON

A Commissar Disillusioned

THERE has been considerable confusion in the public mind as to the nature of the Soviets in Russia and the attitude of the vast peasant population towards the Bolshevik Government. Much of this has been due to the myth industriously circulated by Col. Raymond Robins and other superficial or disingenuous observers, who alleged that the Soviet was a natural Russian democratic institution to which the Russian people were passionately devoted. People in America who have been obsessed with this totally erroneous idea are incredulous when told that the Bolshevik power represents the tyrannical authority of an infinitesimal minority and is bitterly hated by the overwhelming majority. With some plausibility they assert that if this were the case, the Government would be speedily overthrown, but they do not understand the peculiar conditions in Russia, whereby a small group, ruthless in its terroristic methods, with a monopoly of arms and ways of communication, can maintain absolute domination over the hungry and inert masses.

Russia contains few real Bolsheviks to-day, and those who are exercising authority in the name of the Soviet Government now feel themselves beyond the pale, the objects of universal hatred. How true this is is shown by a remarkable letter that has just come out of Soviet Russia. Nicholas Lopoushkin was a well-known revolutionist who suffered under the old régime. Like many other revolutionists, he became a radical Socialist and joined the Bolshevik wing of the party. After the Bolshevik revolution, he was made the President of the Soviet in his native town of Kirsanov, in the Province of Tambov. Gradually he came to see the light and to realize what a fraud the whole system was. His colleagues charged him with lukewarmness in the cause and lack of revolutionary energy. Knowing that these complaints had been sent to Moscow, he addressed, on April 24, 1919, the following letter to the National Soviet of People's Commissaries:

Comrades:

My colleagues of the Kirsanov Soviet are writing to tell you that I am no longer fit to hold the position of President of the Soviet, that I am a counter-revolutionary, that I have lost my nerve, and am a traitor to our cause. Perhaps they are right—I only wish I knew. In writing this letter I have no wish to justify my behavior or exonerate myself in your eyes. I am too old a servant of the Revolution to plead at the bar before men who were not born when I was serving my first sentence in a Czarist prison. I think also that my past speaks for itself, and that no one of my comrades will have the audacity to accuse me of insincerity, of want of stability, or of taking a hasty decision. After twenty-four years spent in exile, in close confinement, in every kind of revolutionary work, and in different forms of legal expiation for the same, I escaped abroad, and became an ardent Bolshevik, and a sincere believer in the doctrines of Lenin and his party. But of late my experiences in Petrograd and Moscow, whence I have just returned, coupled with the horrors of the ghastly nightmare of the sort of existence which I found on my arrival in my native town, have combined to shake my faith in the suitability of Bolshevism for our country, and, as a consequence, in the logic and stability of Bolshevik theories and tenets in general, which we have signally and dismally failed to prove. Speaking frankly, we are, in my opinion, on the brink of a terrible disaster, which will leave its imprint, not only upon Socialism, but upon our nation for centuries, a disaster which will give our descendants the right to regard us Bolsheviks at the best as crazy fanatics, and at the worst, as foul impostors and ghastly muddlers, who murdered and tortured a nation for the sake of an unattainable Utopian theory, and who in our madness sold our birthright amongst the peoples for less than the proverbial mess of pottage.

All around me, wherever I look, I see unmistakable signs of our approaching doom, and yet no one responds to my appeals for help; my voice is as the voice of one crying in the wilderness. In the towns I have just come from, chronic hunger, murder, and the license and libertinage of the criminal elements, who undoubtedly hold numerous executive positions under our Soviets, have reduced the population to the level of mere brute beasts, who drag out a dull semi-conscious existence, devoid of joy in to-day, and without hope for the morrow. Surely this should not be the result of the earthly Paradise which the Soviets were to introduce into our lives? Nor did I find the position any better on the railways. Everywhere a people living under the dread of famine, death, torture, and terror, everywhere groaning and utter misery. My countrymen, whom I love, and whom I had hoped to assist to render happy above all nations, look at me either with the mute uncomprehending eyes of brutes condemned to slaughter, or else with the red eyes of fury and vengeance. It is these latter whom I fear—they are so certain that we Bolsheviks are in the wrong, that immediately they can do so without fear of punishment they will kill me, in the firm conviction that they are thereby doing their country a service. It is terrible, and there must be something wrong somewhere. While our brethren in the big towns are starving, the whole population in our district is engaged in distilling alcohol from surplus grain in their possession, grain which we can not find, and which no amount of threats or punishment will ever make them give up.

Speculation is rife amongst even the most humble inhabitants in the country villages, who have forced a lump of sugar up to four rubles, and a pound of salt up to forty rubles. And the Bolshevik militia and the Soviets? When they are called upon to deal with various infringements of the Bolshevik Decrees, they either try to get out of taking action altogether, or else they pretend that there is insufficient evidence to commit for trial. As a matter of fact, these men too are tired of the position of outcasts and lepers amongst their fellows, which service with the Bolsheviks imposes on them, and would gladly give up their official status, were it not for the fact that they have now cut themselves off from all return. If they fall singly, or even in couples, into the hands of the villagers, they are always murdered. No member of the Red Guard dare risk his life by returning to his native village, where his father would be the first to kill him. I maintain that there must be something wrong with a régime which has aroused such universal hatred, in such a comparatively short time; and amongst whom? Amongst the very class it strove to uplift, to free, to benefit, and to render happy.

I have been closely connected with this region all my life, and it is no exaggeration to say that the peasant population never felt one hundredth part of the hatred and hostility towards the representatives of the Czarist régime and the gendarmes that they do towards us members of the Soviets and our militia. Our aims have been misunderstood, our actions have been misinterpreted, and once we have failed to win the support of those very masses we set out to save, we may as well confess that our failure has been complete. There is a curse upon our party. Ruin and desolation follow in our train, the innocent blood of thousands cries out for vengeance against us. Our doom is fast approaching. Counter-revolution stalks openly amongst us, the gaunt spectre of utter famine and complete nakedness mocks us in the towns and villages alike. But worst of all is the consciousness of failure; we, the would-be liberators of the world, who are execrated openly by the populace; we, who see no safety in the grim looks and expectant glances of our guards; we, whose names are used by the dregs of the town as the foulest epithets; we, who set out so confidently to climb to the sun, and have ended by falling into the cesspool in our own back-yard! I was always against the Red Terror, and bitterly shall we pay for it. Not thus did we plan in Paris, Geneva, and Lucerne, not for this did we swelter and freeze alternately in Czarist prisons in Siberia, or rot in salt mines. This is not the end we had in view when we risked our lives, breaking our prisons, and traveling illegally across the whole of Russia to pass the Western frontier. Then we were always upheld in our weak moments, in our privations, and in our sufferings, by the thought of our glorious cause, by picturing to ourselves the day when we should free this great and glorious nation of ours, and take our place as old and tried Revolutionary veterans at the head of our countrymen in their triumphant march towards peace, progress, and plenty. This is what we visioned, and the actuality is what I have already described. I feel tired and depressed. I know that the Red Terror was a mistake, and I have a terrible suspicion that our cause has been betrayed at the moment of its uttermost realization.

Yours in fraternal greeting,
N. LPOUSHKIN

It is needless to say that this letter created an unpleasant sensation among the Commissaries. They passed a resolution that Lopoushkin should be replaced by a more courageous and determined Bolshevik, of less wavering tendencies. When this resolution was communicated to the Soviet at Kirsanov, it transpired that Lopoushkin had committed suicide immediately after sending his letter to Moscow.

JEROME LANDFIELD

The Workings of Democracy

MAX MUELLER declared a generation ago that the study of philosophy had resolved itself into a study of terminology. This was merely to say that in philosophy the critical faculty had usurped the place of the creative, or, with a closer approach to scientific definition, that synthesis had given place to analysis. While, in view of the fact that so many of our young men are seeing visions and so many of our old men are dreaming dreams, it would be rash to assert that the study of democracy has entered this stage, there is evidence, nevertheless, that the concept of democracy is being steadily and even rapidly divested of certain of its old elements and clothed with new ones that are calculated to transform it.

Democracy, indeed, as a subject of contemplation, has in all its bearings pursued a course parallel to philosophy. To-day it is, in serious minds, approaching the point, if it has not already reached it, at which Kant found metaphysics. Time was, says the Königsberg professor, when metaphysics was the queen of all sciences; and if we take the will for the deed, she certainly deserves, so far as regards the high importance of her subject-matter, this title of honor. Now, he continues, it is the fashion of the time to heap contempt and scorn upon her. At first her government, under the administration of the dogmatists, was an absolute despotism. Gradually her empire broke up, and interecine wars introduced the reign of anarchy; while the skeptics, like nomadic tribes, who hate a permanent habitation and settled mode of living, attacked from time to time those who organized themselves into civil communities. In recent times, Kant further says, the hope dawned of seeing those disputes settled, and legitimacy of her claims established by a kind of physiology of the human understanding. But it was found that—although it was affirmed that this so-called queen could not refer her descent to any higher source than that of common experience, a circumstance which necessarily brought suspicion on her claims—she persisted in advancing her claims to sovereignty. Thus metaphysics necessarily fell back into the antiquated and rotten constitution of dogmatism, and again became obnoxious to the contempt from which efforts had been made to save it. At present, as all methods, according to the general persuasion, have, says Kant, been tried in vain, there reigns naught but weariness and complete indifferentism.

Admitting at the start the danger that lurks in the use of analogy, Kant's sketch of philosophy, in its broad outlines, is equally applicable to democracy. Springing, as a subject befitting the modern intellect, from the dogmatism of the eighteenth century, democracy has pursued an antithetical career and is again an expression of dogmatism.

It is a question how far a theory that will not work may be considered divine. Seventy years ago De Tocqueville, while asserting the divine origin of the principle of democracy, admitted that the most powerful, the most intelligent, and the most moral classes of France had never attempted to take hold of it to guide it. The democracy, he added, had consequently been abandoned to its wild instincts, and had grown up like those children who have no parental guidance, who receive their education in the public streets, and who are acquainted only with the vices and wretchedness of society. Stopping merely to ask if the picture is any brighter to-day, it may be pointed out that we have here what appears to be a contradiction in terms. Intelligence and ignorance have nothing in common, nor have equality and subserviency. It may make some difference whether the dictating influence proceeds from the White House or from Fourteenth Street, but the principle of pure equality is vitiated in either case.

And the fact that the most powerful, most intelligent, and most moral classes have never attempted to take hold of and guide democracy may possibly merit more than a gibe. Assuming that the thing under discussion is pure democracy, and that anything less than that is a contradiction of the term, such effort might properly be stigmatized as condescension, or even disingenuousness, and thus unbecomingly self-respecting minds. The cause of democracy is not furthered by self-deception.

The revolution to which the world has applied the name democracy is a persistent force in human affairs, a fact which it would be fatal to ignore. De Tocqueville is right in asserting that the gradual development of the principle of equality is a Providential fact, if he means equality of opportunity rather than equality of action. In reality, we find him advocating the intellectual and moral guidance of the many by the few, and we hear him asking, "Whither then are we tending? No one can say, for terms of comparison already fail us."

Curiously enough, this reminds us of a remark of the cleverest and most bitter reactionary of the nineteenth century, the late K. P. Pobjedonostseff, chief promoter of the Holy Synod of Russia. What, he asks, is this freedom by which so many minds are agitated, which inspires so many insensate actions, so many wild speeches, which leads the people so often to misfortune? Forever extending its base, the new democracy now aspires to universal suffrage. By this means, the political power so passionately demanded by democracy would be shattered into a number of infinitesimal bits, of which each citizen acquires a single one. What will he do with it then? How will he employ it? In the result it has undoubtedly been shown that in the attainment of this aim democracy violates its sacred formula of "Freedom indissolubly joined with Equality." The history of mankind, Pobjedonostseff further declares, bears witness that the most necessary and fruitful reform—the most durable measures—emanated from the supreme will of statesmen, or from a minority enlightened by lofty ideas and deep knowledge. And he says that what the ultimate consequences will be, Heaven only knows.

Here we have the reasoned utterances of two men as far apart as the poles. When dealing with the facts they speak with almost one and the same mind. How, then, may we account for the diametrical conclusions embodied in "Democracy in America" and "The Reflections of a Russian Statesman"? Undoubtedly by the different temperaments of the two men, and by the tendency of the one to overestimate the capacity of human nature and that of the other to underestimate it. With all his reasonableness, De Tocqueville was enmeshed in the dogmatism which gave birth to the modern theory of democracy, a theory which, on the other hand, was repellent to Pobjedonostseff, notwithstanding his great learning and profound sympathy.

On the surface, at least, time has not mitigated the circumstances which these two reflective minds deplored with almost equal vehemence. To-day democracy is admittedly the greatest problem confronting mankind, yet we seem farther from an effective solution of it than we were seventy years ago, though the world has grown restive and even reckless, for the want of such a solution. Confusion reigns in all minds, born of ignorance or fear, and in countless instances of both.

To this pass has the world been brought by pure dogmatism. The divine right of peoples is as easily acceptable as the divine right of kings, but in neither case is the claim admissible without proof. Government was imposed, or imposed itself, on mankind for the sake of the ends it was capable of effecting. The study of democracy should therefore begin with a more or less careful ascertainment of the ends desired, and should proceed to a rigid scrutiny of the means which democracy offers for their attainment. If the ends are universally desirable, we may be prepared to admit that they sanctify the means.

If we should attach any importance to the phrase "making the world safe for democracy," we should be forced to conclude that at present democracy is incapable of standing on its own legs. In reality, we are burdened with a confused terminology which obscures rather than clarifies our vision, and which is an inevitable product of dogmatism. Thus, any study of democracy that is undertaken with a serious intent must imply a study of terminology.

A Critique of Pure Democracy has long been needed, analogous to Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason." Kant said that by this title he did not mean a criticism of books and systems, but a critical inquiry into the faculty of reason. In other words, he aimed at the solution of the question regarding the possibility or impossibility of metaphysics and the determination of the origin, as well as of the extent and limits, of this science, and all this must be done on the basis of principles. On a less ambitious scale W. H. Mallock has attempted something of the kind in "The Limits of Pure Democracy." While lacking the form of the Socratic irony, his discussion is impregnated with its spirit. A remorseless logic, exercised upon indisputable facts of experience, runs through the work and imparts to its conclusions an appearance of finality.

Pure democracy never has had, and never can have, any counterpart in experience, except possibly in communities of smallest extent and most primitive character. Cecil Chesterton, who has been engaged in a very temperate attempt to harmonize the dreams of revolutionaries with the bald actualities of life, defines democracy, in its essence, as government which, by whatever means, is actually in accordance with the general will of the governed. Ideally, this result might be realized by an ideal despot. Practically, however, ideal despotisms are impossible; and no less impossible, except in microscopic communities, is government by the extreme alternative—namely, the voice of all the citizens assembled under the same tree. The only device, therefore, which is practicable in the great states of to-day is the election by the many of a small number of delegates, to whom the mass of the citizens specify what the "general will" is, and whose sole business is to execute it in accordance with the terms specified. True democracy exists, Chesterton declares, in proportion, and only in proportion, as the correspondence between the action of the delegates and the general will is complete.

A critical analysis of this statement brings to light a difficulty from which there appears to be no way of escape: if the judgments of the average mass are cumulatively to constitute a "general will," it is necessary that these judgments shall be, in all important respects, identical. But this is impossible except as the units of the average mass are influenced by select minds of greater intelligence or forcefulness than the rest. In the end, therefore, we find an oligarchical content in the concept of democracy. And this is as manifest in industrial democracy as in political. Karl Marx appears to have framed the International with that very end in view. Lassalle, too, boldly declared that, if the wills of the laborers were to be effective, they must be "forged into a single hammer," and that this hammer "must be wielded by the sinews of one strong hand." And Labriola, prominent as a preacher of syndicalism, says that true democracy is the concentrating of power in an élite, who can best judge of the interaction of social cause and effect. Such conceptions amount, as Professor Michels observes, to a deliberate denunciation of democracy in any sense of the word, or, as Mallock prefers to say, to a conception of democracy founded on a new conception of the Demos, the implication being that of any given population a certain minority alone is found to be endowed with the peculiar energies which exhibit themselves in connection with social and public questions as the subject-matter of politics.

There still remains the immemorial question of what the force or sanction is which renders the orders of the few operative. The common answer, even among thinkers, is that the force in question resides ultimately in the people. But Mallock easily shows this to be a mistake. For example, the first thing which the masses of the people must do, when they are hoarse with proclaiming their freedom to do whatever they like, is to cringe to an authority which enforces them to a continuous production of food, and dictates the primary terms on which alone food can be procured. If the power of the people is thus limited in respect of the production of necessaries, it is limited no less stringently in respect of the production of superfluities.

The argument applies with equal force to political government and war. The power of governmental oligarchy has its basis in the fact that, unless the many submit to it, even the simplest industries are paralyzed, the higher made impossible, the welfare, the freedom, the lives of all will be at the mercy of any foreign aggressor whose armies, vitalized by obedience, put them to flight, or make them sane by enslaving them. Thus, the power of the few in reality has its basis in the permanent needs of the many.

F. J. WHITING

Poetry

A Ballade of Despots

NOW that the Freedom of the Seas
Has knelled the submarine's fell sway,

Now that the Lamb and Lion cease
Becoming one, and twin-like stay;
Now that the World's dark evils may
No longer face the League's just light—

Would that we had, the gods I pray,
The Great Mogul—a day and night!

If he could see my landlord's lease
What would the Emperor Akbar say?

Our incomes dwindle and decrease,
Yet all the world is making hay!
Where is the League that should allay
The evils of the Meat Kings' might?
If East is West, then let me play
The Great Mogul—a day and night!

The greedy Grocer—all who fleece
You daily, you might hale away
To my just Durbar, where the crease
Of hemp their necks would soon display:

Nightly in dreams I hang and flay
These despots of usurious height—
Powers of Four, sans more delay,
The Great Mogul—a day and night!

Envoi

Fellow Determinists, why bay
The League that looms through soft moonlight?
Our only hope 'gainst Powers that prey—
The Great Mogul—a day and night!

W. G. TINCKOM-FERNANDEZ

Correspondence

The Votes of the British Empire

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the criticism of the League of Nations Covenant that centres upon the disproportion in voting power as between the British Empire and the United States, there appears an underlying assumption that the members of the Empire are always going to vote in the same sense, and, the chance arising, against our interests. It is assumed that because the Empire made common cause against Germany it will make common cause anywhere and everywhere. This view is childish, if it is candid. Why should the constituent states of the Empire not have developed unanimity against Germany? The whole civilized world did that. It was a token of right feeling and trustworthiness. There would have been legitimate ground for suspicion against any one of these states that had kept out; it would have been well to have stood on guard against such a state, as some Senators now want us to stand guard against anything remotely British.

Anyone who harbors in his mind even the most elementary knowledge of the Empire knows that its younger constituents have recurrently made themselves felt in ways not at all pleasing to the mother-country. The latter has had to let them have their way, not alone with their own destinies, but also with hers. It is an enduring tribute to British methods that the former colonies, and even dependencies, rushed so wholeheartedly to her aid when it was a question of a big and righteous cause. None of them had been thwarted in their more local interests so as to have retained a sense of resentment engendering a hesitancy about loyal coöperation. The notion that these independent and self-governing communities can be dragooned into aggression upon us, or upon anyone else, is evidence of crude thinking; for they will follow their interests, and those interests are more than likely to fall into alignment with ours rather than with those of the older country.

For years we have been under the domination of a tradition as regards England. It has been nursed up in our school-books and transmitted as a heritage of unfairness to succeeding generations. The procedure has been largely unconscious; but the tradition has always been susceptible of revivification at the hand of parties with ulterior motives. Many of us do not like the English as represented by the specimens we have encountered; but they deserve our respect, nevertheless, for their doughty working-out of institutions of liberty. If they had not wrought these out, we should not have been enjoying them these many decades. This outcry about the Empire's preponderant voting-power is, in part at least, an attempt to enlist the ancient tradition and prejudices. If one is inclined to apply reason to the matter he will find that there is nothing to be alarmed about. If he is playing politics or seeking to stir the people up against England, he ought to be hunting out a less readily collapsible instrument of in-direction.

A. G. KELLER

New Haven, Conn., September 25

The Peace Commission's Point of View

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

"Italy's Point of View," as explained by Mr. H. Nelson Gay in the Review for September 20, is quite clearly also Mr. Gay's own point of view, and the point of view which he thinks should have prevailed at Paris. I am not writing to challenge this point of view, or to dispute Mr. Gay's facts; but merely to call attention to Mr. Gay's misapprehension of the point of view from which the Fiume problem was actually envisaged by those who were responsible for the decision which was reached. I was at Paris, attached to the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, and although I was not intimately in touch with Adriatic problems, I know something of the different proposals that were made for the disposition of Fiume, and of the general lines which the discussion of those proposals followed.

It was a matter of the degree in which Italy on the one hand and the Jugo-Slavs on the other merited a "premium"; no concerted attitude towards Italy's national growth and expansion was involved; there was, I believe, no suggestion, even on the part of the Italians, that the disposition of Fiume had any important relation to the very different question of Italy's naval safety on the Adriatic. In particular, the problem was not one of deciding between two claimants on the basis of past support or expected future allegiance or of the special national interests of the parties to the decision. Mr. Gay presents the problem in the conventional terms of the interplay of "foreign policies." Forces that might properly be so described played a part in some of the settlements made at Paris, but the Fiume decision was not one of them.

The disposition to be made of Fiume was, as a matter of fact, a difficult and disturbing problem, honestly faced and honestly examined in the light of all the different factors that might bear upon the justice of the decision and the welfare of the peoples affected by it. Questions which Mr. Gay does not even hint at were deemed important at Paris. For example: Was it possible to dispose of Fiume apart from the whole urban district (including Susak), in which the Croats are a majority? What were the real desires of the people of Fiume, not as represented by official resolutions obtained in one way and another, but as indicated by investigations, made on the ground? Were the larger affairs of the city and the port in the hands of the Italian residents of Fiume, or was small retail trade, for example, a more characteristic employment of those residents? Was there danger that in Italian hands the interests of the port of Fiume might be subordinated to those of Trieste? Of the various alternative outlets for the Serbo-Croats on the Adriatic was there any one where the construction of a safe harbor, adequate port facilities, and the necessary railway connections was, beyond doubt, practically feasible? Would the interests of Austria, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia in a trade outlet to the Adriatic be better safeguarded if both Trieste and Fiume were in Italian hands or if one of those two competing ports was held by another state? What arrangement would be most likely to attract the capital needed to enlarge and develop the port of Fiume? Did Italy ask for Fiume when the Treaty of London was made, or was this claim an afterthought? Is the physical conformation of Fiume such as to make practicable a solution like that reached for Danzig, by which sovereignty and the actual control of the facilities of the port were separately apportioned?

To offset the flavor of innuendo unavoidable in a list of questions like the foregoing, I hasten to say that I do not assert that every one of these questions was answered in a way unfavorable to Italy's contentions. I say merely that the Fiume decision was a balanced judgment, based on considerations such as those I have listed. The opinion of Italian experts was not, as Mr. Gay intimates, disregarded, and neither were the findings of competent Italian scholars that were published before the Fiume controversy arose.

May I suggest further that the controversy whether Fiume should be viewed as an Italian colony or a Serbo-Croat port, may be explained in some measure by an easily understandable Italian tendency to think of the State in terms of cities, and by the natural tendency of an agricultural people like the Serbo-Croats to think of a city as related to its hinterland?

ALLYN A. YOUNG

Ithaca, New York, September 22

The League of Nations and Siberia

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In your issue of the 20th Mr. Jerome Landfield contributes a full-page discussion of the Siberian situation. Now, while I neither agree nor disagree at present with Mr. Landfield's practical conclusion, I still feel justified in protesting most earnestly against his whole treatment of the subject.

Mr. Landfield nowhere mentions or even remotely alludes to the League of Nations. How he has achieved this feat is to me incomprehensible. Surely even in the phase of a mere possibility, the League of Nations plan must vitally affect the Siberian as well as every other international tangle. Your contributor has chosen to ignore the most essential and significant feature of his topic.

If Mr. Landfield will only tell us what the supernational League could do and should do in Siberia, he will have told us something of surpassing interest and thoroughly to the point.

MALCOLM C. BURKE

Montgomery, Alabama, September 23

[To treat the Siberian situation from the standpoint of a future League of Nations would afford opportunity for interesting theoretical speculations. In the light, however, of immediate practical needs, it is putting the cart before the horse. The restoration of the national Russian state is a prerequisite to any effective international organization for peace, and to postpone the settlement of the Russian problem in the hope that a League of Nations can handle it, is both to misjudge the seriousness of the present situation and to attribute to the League un hoped-for powers. While Russia remains in a state of disorganization and a prey of rival interests, there is ever present the danger of a combination that would render powerless and futile the League of Nations planned at Paris.

EDS. THE REVIEW.]

Daylight-Saving Time

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

It would seem that enough and more than enough had been written on the subject of time adjustment, yet I have failed to see anything that seems to take into account all the circumstances that deserve to be considered, especially as the question affects the prairie northwest. It makes a vast difference whether the hour of daylight is added to clocks keeping sun-time, or whether those clocks are already a half hour off from sun-time. To illustrate precisely: We are in longitude 97 degrees and use central time; that is, our clocks are already a half hour slow; add the hour for daylight saving and we are one hour and a half off from sun-time. The condition becomes more abnormal farther west; at Pierre, still using central time, the longitude is over 100 degrees and the difference between sun-time and daylight-saving time is nearly two hours. Such is the condition throughout the Dakotas east of the river. Now, since the Dakotas lie between 43 and 49 degrees latitude, our measure of sunshine in the long summer days is great and our nights hardly long enough for the sleep that growing children need. With daylight-saving clocks at midsummer it is just twilight at ten o'clock, making bedtime an hour too late. Gardens can still be hoed at that hour and farm chores be attended to without lanterns. I think we are all agreed that for us there is no advantage in daylight saving and there are some serious inconveniences.

I suspect that opinion is the same in all places lying much west of the meridian from which their time is reckoned. Some relief could be secured by breaking the coincidence of the daylight-saving change and the standard time change. All the clocks from Cleveland to Pierre at present are alike, using in the winter approximately the time of Chicago, standard central time; in the summer they are still all alike, but use the time of New York. Now suppose that during the summer months the clocks were made uniform from New York to Chicago, using the time of meridian 82½, approximately that of Cleveland, places between Cleveland and New York undergoing no change, places between Cleveland and Chicago setting their clocks an hour ahead. In like manner, have all places between Chicago and Denver agreed to use the time of the meridian 97½, approximately that of Omaha. The railroads might find some difficulty in determining the points at which changes should be made, but no greater difficulty than was experienced in determining the limits of standard time. It is well, however, to bear in mind that those limits have in some cases, such as the Dakota prairie, not been determined consistently with the convenience of the local public. If the division points between central and mountain time were placed as near the western boundary of Minnesota as possible, our condition would be much improved.

The suggestion that the change in the fall should be made at the end of September instead of the end of October is certainly sensible. With us, from the first of September, the sun begins to rise about seven (daylight-saving time), and thus for two months work begins with artificial light; there is no saving; electricity may as well be used at the end of the day as at the beginning and with a great deal pleasanter feeling to all concerned, for it seems to be human nature to object to getting up before the sun.

The further suggestion that even without the daylight-saving law the benefit of the arrangement can be obtained is doubtless true, but to expect municipalities to take individual action is not in accord with common sense. And unless there were practical unanimity the inconveniences would offset most of the gain. Before the adoption of standard time it was necessary in one city to keep different times in mind and make the necessary reductions. Even after the change many communities still experienced, in a less degree, the same difficulty from the reluctance of the people, especially the rural population, to adopt the standard time. Even to this day there are communities where one must calculate the difference, if one wishes to take a train or attend church, between sun and standard time. To expect communities of themselves to make a change in harmony with other communities is more than human nature will justify. If a Federal law can not be secured, there must be some concerted action under leadership of a national organization. But Federal law could probably be secured, if painstaking care were exercised in working out details to suit as far as possible varying conditions.

WILLIAM H. POWERS

Brookings, South Dakota, September 18

The Canadian Industrial Conference

THE results of the conference at Ottawa between members of the Dominion and Provincial Governments and representatives of labor and capital will, of course, be interpreted by different men according to their individual points of view. Some, perhaps oversanguine, will be disappointed because those results were not more tangible and positive. Others may be astonished that the conference did not end prematurely in a free fight between employer and employee. It may be said, however, with some authority that those responsible for the meeting are satisfied that it has brought the warring elements of industry closer together than they ever have been in the past, and this at a time when the possibility of a rapprochement seemed peculiarly remote.

A word or two as to how and why the Canadian Conference was brought about may be timely in view of the approaching conference at Washington. Last spring the Canadian Government appointed a Royal Commission on Industrial Relations. That Commission held public hearings in industrial centres from Victoria to Sydney, and in June last submitted its report embodying a number of important recommendations, which may be very briefly summarized: Fixing of a minimum wage, especially for women, girls, and unskilled labor; a maximum workday of eight hours and a weekly rest of not less than 24 hours; state insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity, and old age; proportional representation; the regulation of public works to relieve unemployment; assistance in building workers' homes; establishment of a bureau for promoting industrial councils; restoration of the fullest liberty of speech and of the press consistent with the interests of the community; recognition of the right to organize; payment of a living wage; recognition of collective bargaining; extension of equal opportunities in education. It will be seen that some of these recommendations are much more contentious than others, and it must be said at once that while five of the seven commissioners signed the report, two put in a minority report giving only a guarded approval to some of the recommendations, and one of the five thought it necessary to explain his views in a supplementary report.

As the carrying out of some of the recommendations involved legislation by the provincial legislatures rather than the Dominion Parliament, and the success of practically all of them depended upon the attitude of capital and labor, the Commission suggested that a conference should be held of representatives of the Provincial Governments and those of capital and labor, for the purpose of considering the whole question and, if possible, arriving at a unanimous decision. In adopting this suggestion, the Dominion Government broadened both the personnel and the programme of the conference. It also very carefully avoided any future suggestion that the delegates were hand-picked. Acting through such national bodies as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada—the latter corresponding to the American Federation of Labor—the Government invited all the recognized organizations of employers and employees to send delegates to the conference. These formed two of the three groups into which the conference was divided. The third, designed as far as practicable to represent the remainder of the people—that long-suffering middle class trampled on impartially by both capital and labor—included delegates from the Union of Canadian Municipalities, the Great War Veterans Association, the Engineering Institute of Canada, the Canadian Mining Institute, the Canadian Reconstruction Association, members of the Labor Sub-Committee which acts in an advisory capacity to the Cabinet, members of the Royal Commission on Industrial Relations, representatives of various Federal and Provincial departments, etc. The farming community was not directly represented, because it would have been hopelessly one-sided, farm labor being unorganized, but indirectly it was represented by delegates from the Federal and Provincial departments of Agriculture. A fourth group embracing members of the Dominion Government, the Leader of the Opposition, Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, and members of all the Provincial Governments, took part in the discussions, but not in the committee work.

Much of the success of the conference was due to the careful preparatory work of the Chairman and the Secretary, Hon. Gideon Robertson, Federal Minister of Labor, and Gerald Brown, Secretary of the Reconstruction and Development Committee of the cabinet. Acting throughout in coöperation with a joint committee of employers and workmen, they compiled and had printed in advance for the use of the delegates a pamphlet containing information as to the various items of the proposed agenda, the text of the labor features of the Treaty of Peace, statistics of industrial disputes in Canada, legislation as to industrial disputes, hours of labor, and minimum wage in Canada and other countries. In addition to this general information, data of a more detailed character, on each of the subjects brought before the conference, were prepared and distributed to the delegates during the sessions. While everything was done in this way to supply the material for intelligent discussion, the committee as carefully avoided the preparation of resolutions beforehand, or any of the other familiar expedients designed to lead public meetings in the way that they should go.

The procedure of the conference was simple, and apparently worked very smoothly. All questions introduced were discussed for a limited period and then referred to one of nine committees, each consisting of three representatives of the employers, three of the employees, and two of what was known as Group 3, the latter to have fullest right of discussion but no voting power, as the conference was primarily one of capital and labor. The committees reported back to the conference, and the question was again debated, and, if possible, crystallized in a resolution. The conference met during the day, and the committees at night, an arrangement which made it possible to dispose of the many important questions on the agenda in six days, although in one case at least it involved an all-night sitting.

One who followed the discussion in the conference could not fail to notice the very remarkable change in the mutual attitude of capital and labor as the days went by. At the beginning there was a sharply drawn difference of opinion between the representatives of capital and labor on nearly all questions, and a certain atmosphere of distrust and suspicion. The frank exchange of views, however, by men, and also by women, who showed themselves not only remarkably familiar with the questions they discussed, but also sincere, fearless, and in the main fair-minded, inevitably brought the two sides within measurable distance of a mutual understanding. And while it would be idle to say that the conference has broken down the wall between capital and labor, it has unquestionably made wide breaches, and probably paved the way to a basis of coöperation that will be fair and equitable to both sides, and perhaps even to the large intermediate group.

It must suffice here to note that the committees and the conference reached unanimous conclusions on the following points: recommending the establishment of joint industrial councils, but without endorsing any set plan, and the creation of a Federal bureau to gather data and furnish information and assistance; recommending the appointment of a Federal board to enquire into the subjects of state insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity, and old age, and widows' pensions; recommending the adoption of minimum wage laws for women and children in provinces that have not yet enacted such legislation (five have already taken action), the adoption of a uniform law and method of application throughout the Dominion, the minimum to be determined from time to time with due regard to local living conditions, and the appointment of a royal commission to investigate wages of unskilled workers; commending the action of the Dominion and Provincial Governments in their united efforts to improve housing conditions; and welcoming the declaration of the Prime Minister that a Speaker's Conference would be called to investigate the merits of proportional representation; urging the Governments of the Provinces to establish compulsory education for full time at least up to and including the fourteenth year, and for part time in cities and towns for the two ensuing years, and that education in all grades should be made free (these provisions already in force in most of the provinces); recommending adequate provision, by public works or otherwise, by Federal, Provincial, and municipal governments, to avert serious unemployment during the ensuing eight months, and commending the policy agreed upon by the Provinces of centralization of labor supply and demand in one agency;

recommending the appointment of a board composed of representatives of the Federal and Provincial Governments, of the employers and the employees, to bring about uniformity in the Provincial laws relating to industrial labor. On some of the more contentious questions—hours of labor, employees' right to organize, recognition of labor unions, and collective bargaining, the committees were not unanimous, but it may fairly be said that the representatives of employers and employees were not very far apart in principle, and that a common basis of agreement is now within measurable distance. The session closed with two notable addresses by representative bankers, who sounded a warning to both employers and employees that they must get together and speed up production, or both they and their country would come to grief.

L. J. B.

Ottawa, Canada.

Book Reviews

A Good Intent Gone Wrong

CARNEGIE PENSIONS. By J. McKeen Cattell. With extracts from letters from two hundred and fourteen college and university professors, and an article on the History of the Carnegie Foundation, by Joseph Jastrow, and the reports of the Committee on Pensions and Insurance of the American Association of University Professors. New York: The Science Press.

PROFESSOR Cattell takes up in this volume the history of perhaps the only serious disappointment among the benevolent enterprises of one of the greatest benefactors of modern times. The announcement that Mr. Carnegie had given ten million dollars to establish a foundation for the advancement of teaching, through a system of retiring pensions for college teachers, seemed at first to herald a distinct advance in the comfort, dignity, and safety of the teaching profession. It was felt that a better spirit and a higher measure of success would thus be put into the work. If the plan had developed as intended by the donor, showing the results that he and so many others so confidently anticipated, it would have met no serious setback in the final discovery that ten million dollars was only a fraction of the money which would be required to bring all worthy institutions within its scope and carry it to permanent success.

But troublesome questions began to arise almost immediately. Mr. Carnegie had not wished to include "sectarian" colleges in his benefaction. It was, and remains, the belief of most men connected with "denominational" colleges that this exclusion grew out of a mistaken idea as to the real nature of the management and teaching in such colleges. But with the donor's right to make the limitation admitted, the trustees never succeeded in drawing the line in a way which met with general approval. Certain colleges became "non-sectarian" by slight changes in their charters and by-laws which did not in any essential particular alter their educational practice, but did subject them to more or less criticism from patrons who felt that they were in some degree forsaking connection with the body of men to whom they owed their existence and endowments. Others which refused to make any change, and thus denied themselves the expected benefits of the endowment, though not a whit more sectarian than the denominational schools which had complied, were criticised by certain elements in their constituency as unduly narrow. It was not a pleasant situation for either the colleges or the trustees of the Foundation, and in the insurance work to which the Foundation has finally turned its attention, the attempt to distinguish between sectarian and non-sectarian has faded away. This feature, however, Mr. Cattell's book does not treat. We have mentioned it only as an element which may, even if only as a subconscious influence, have had something to do with the fact that it was finally determined to turn the work of the Foundation into a new direction rather than raise the necessary funds to carry it through in accord with Mr. Carnegie's original plan.

Again, a doubt arose in many minds, almost from the start, whether the plan was fundamentally sound, as a means for "the advancement of teaching" in our colleges. A certain proportion felt that the receiving of a pension, except perhaps in case of disability arising from accident rather than age, would detract from the self-respect of the recipient, and the respect in which he was held by others—that it would come to be regarded as a badge of pauperism rather than of honor. This is a point wholly beyond the power of argument to decide. A larger number have felt that the one right way to provide for the old age of the college teacher is to put his salary on a basis more nearly commensurate with the real value of his services, so that he may have no less opportunity to provide in advance for his old age than that enjoyed by men of equal ability, character, and training in other callings; and leave provision by pension merely to teachers who through some misfortune break down at too early a period to have made their own provision. And each college should have fixed upon it by public sentiment, if not by spontaneous right feeling, the moral obligation to take care of all cases of this type. But it has been thought that a general retiring pension fund, supplied by outside philanthropy, tends against the due appreciation of the necessity of a heavy increase in all college salaries. Trustees and donors naturally regard the pension as the equivalent of an increase in salary, and let the matter rest there. In the meantime, the professor to whom that increase will come only after a long series of years, and when his regular salary shall have ceased, has to meet the always increasing cost of living. It is no wonder, then, that the younger men, all along, have been ready to say, "Throw away your pension system that will normally not help me for years to come and give me now a salary on which I can live in reasonable comfort, spend enough on books, travel, etc., to enable me to do my real duty to the college, and lay by a reasonable sum for my own old age, or for those who may be dependent upon me." There can be no question but that this position, when fairly put, is much more convincing than anything which can be said for a pension system. The question which many would regard as the more debatable is, whether the pension plan as things now are really stands seriously in the way of reaching a proper salary basis.

But even that question has lost its immediate importance through the fact that the trustees of the Carnegie Foundation have abandoned the pension system, except for the carrying out of definite engagements made before the change was decided upon. In Mr. Cattell's opinion (in agreement, it must be said, with that of many others) they have not properly drawn the line in determining what they will regard as definite engagements already made. We do not choose, however, to go into a discussion of that matter here, or to thresh out the question whether the trustees have done an injustice in expressing the opinion that many college professors have been unduly ready to avail themselves of the pension privilege at the earliest possible moment. It is the opinion of the author of the book that the trustees have sought to create that impression as one means of bolstering up their determination to change from the pension plan to that of providing insurance and annuities. But we doubt whether a discussion of motives in that connection would interest college teachers and the public generally quite as deeply as it seems to interest the author. The larger number are concerned rather with the merit or demerit of the new proposal. Is, or is not, the proposed system of insurance policies and annuities a thing to commend itself to the good judgment of the college world?

The judgments expressed in this volume are almost wholly against it. It must be said, however, that these judgments are based partly on an original feature from which the Carnegie board has now receded, largely because of the criticisms of the men whose views the volume expresses. The objectionable feature in question was that the taking of policies was to be obligatory on all members of the faculties of participating colleges, except those in service before the plan was adopted. The unwisdom of this requirement should have been clear to the Carnegie managers from the start, and the fact that it was not seen by them helps to increase the growing presumption that neither the Carnegie board nor any such exterior board can wisely attempt to interfere with the internal policies of educational institutions, as a condition of doing them some service. To kill the genuine independence of such institutions with the hand of kindness is about the greatest unkindness which could be done to them. The standardizing hand is all right within its proper limits; but when it is laid upon the things of the mind (and education has hardly as yet ceased to be a thing of the mind), it is wholly outside its legitimate province. Let us not forget that the land where standardization has had its way more completely than in any other lies to-day in a heap of moral and political ruin.

The naturally vigorous resistance to the now abandoned obligatory requirement may have led to a frame of mind a little too sensitive to other objections. But there are others, as to the weight of which men will differ. It has been shown, we think conclusively, that the cost of the insurance which is offered by the Carnegie authorities differs so little from that of existing sound insurance companies that the Carnegie system can hardly be considered as a "benefaction" at all, and that therefore Mr. Carnegie's laudable desire to do a really important service to the cause of education has been allowed wholly to miscarry. It is also claimed, by Mr. Cattell and many others whose views are recorded in this volume, that the glaring miscalculations which have been made in the past by the Carnegie managers in connection with the pension system give little promise that they have the special qualifications necessary to the safe management of a great insurance company. Here again, we enter a field where proof is impossible, one way or the other. But the mere fact that it is impossible will, of course, deter many from taking the Carnegie policies.

As to the book itself, it would be pleasanter reading if Mr. Cattell were capable of controlling his unremittent and exasperating spirit of belligerency. Belligerency for its own sake grows exceedingly tiresome to most well-balanced minds. This criticism does not apply to the part of the book written by Professor Jastrow, or to the two reports signed by Professors Arthur O. Lovejoy and Harlan F. Stone, of the American Association of College Professors. And the more reasonable tone of these portions gives to their strictures the greater weight. Naturally, this material had already appeared, at different times covering a period of several years, and had accomplished at least a part of its purpose in influencing the Carnegie board to change certain features of its plan. American college life, however, is not through with its dealing with such external agencies as the Carnegie Foundation, and it is well that this record of certain pretty serious mistakes should be preserved and studied, if our higher education is to get the great benefit intended by such benefactions without suffering the harm which is always possible from errors of judgment or purpose in the human agencies established for their administration.

Yarns, Medium Size

YELLOW MEN SLEEP. By Jeremy Lane. New York: The Century Company.

SORCERY. By Francis Charles MacDonald. New York: The Century Company.

THE SIAMESE CAT. By Henry Milner Rideout. New York: Duffield and Company.

ALL THE BROTHERS WERE VALIANT. By Ben Ames Williams. New York: The Macmillan Company.

TO its disadvantage, "Yellow Men Sleep" is the bulkiest of these tales of exotic adventure. A yarn loses by every page it is strung out beyond its natural proportions. Its best effect hangs on the utmost economy and compression. It has to beware not only of dull moments but of the minute slackenings which give threat of dullness. The author of "Yellow Men Sleep" seems to have chosen Will Levington Comfort as his model. He inscribes this book to that romantic author, mentions him in the text, calls his hero Levington, and spins a yarn according to the master's recipe. Con Levington is son of a wanderer who has picturesquely disposed of himself with drink and "dope," out of grief for his dead wife. The process has taken many years, in course of which Con has grown to boyhood. He associates the memory of his father with a strange odor, spicy and heady, that has hung about him in his later years. That smell you might call the villain of the piece. It belongs to a heavy, oblivion-bringing drug, produced only in a hidden kingdom of the Chinese deserts. To destroy this traffic in koresh, the "soul-dark," the kingdom must be found; and our friend Levington is the predestined lad for the job. Fortunately the kingdom is so hard to find that its only human link with the world has to carry a map. This is Chee Ming, Vizier and sole koresh-distributor for the secret realm. We steal his map, we beat him to the kingdom, we rescue the princess (an American kidnapped in infancy), we take, as it were, the cake. We are a trifle elaborate and long-winded about it. We make phrases when we ought to be getting on. The tale begins with "a quiet urge in her veins," and "a gray-feathered night in spring," and when at the last the lovers approach each other for the kiss-curtain, "she was magic upon him; his voice was dry in a mutiny of nerves." As in the work of W. L. Comfort, there is something both hectic and mincing here, both acrid and syrupy—a smell, above all, but what of?

Our other yarns are swifter, less musky-flavored, more masculine. "Sorcery," for all its central motive, is less a tale of Hawaiian magic than of East and West trying conclusions, and less that than a brisk fable of adventure. The author is vastly sophisticated; as knowing (in a later manner) as the young Kipling was. Undergraduates should adore his form, and we suspect his own undergraduate days are not long past. In his opening pages he nearly persuades himself and us that he is concerned with character-study, "psychological" reactions, and so on, working towards a tropical tragedy of some weight. And there is no change in his manner when, very shortly, we find ourselves racing through the doorways and tumbling down the staircases of romantic farce. Nor, unhappily, does he let up on the man-of-the-worldly accent even during the preposterous episode which wrecks the joyousness of our adventure—brutal as well as farce because it is too preposterous—that episode which sees our enlightened Americans torturing to death with hot irons an old Kanaka in order to get a confession out of him. A group of fairly representative White Men engaged in torturing an old native to death with hot irons can not be made an amusing episode of polite comedy or even farce. It is altogether out of order. It violates the code of the White Man, as Kipling taught it to us—of the creature who might be a mischievous boy and an overbearing master, but could never pass the bounds dividing the sad dog from the cur, far less the bounds dividing the West from the East, the White Man from the Black. But, worse for our purpose, it also violates the crudest sense of artistic decorum. On the whole, "Sorcery" leaves us with the feeling of having been let in for a not altogether savory confection which might have been slyly concocted by Edith Wharton, Jack London, and Henry Miller Rideout.

Not that Mr. Rideout, for one, would have taken a hand. For he has a well-nigh unerring sense of the decorum of the yarn. Improbabilities are his stock in trade, but only as they stop short of the preposterous. There are fishy episodes and coincidences in "The Siamese Cat"—if you look for them. But you are unlikely to have time or inclination to look for them: too much is "doing" and you can't afford to be left behind. In this tale, also, the action concerns a few Americans in the Far East. There is a youth some time exiled, in the name of commerce, "a solitary white man lost in the flux and flow of the yellow myriads." A chance glimpse of a pretty patriot compatriot on a holiday in Japan sets him dreaming. In due course they meet (in China) and queer things begin to happen, involving a sacred cat, a stolen ruby, and other gratifying matters of that romantic order. Of course the cat and the ruby, however elusive, are not lost, and the little comedy ends as such journeys should. The plot, you may say, is slight and artificial enough. What makes it "go" is largely the easy charm of Mr. Rideout's style, which never strains and is never common. Nobody else now writing this special kind of thing writes with equal grace and ease and vigor:

The cat, sitting beside Owen's feet, blinked sagely at the night-lamp with goblin eyes of changing fire. He yawned hungrily, jingled his silver bells, then in slow revolution trod out a lair and curled down to sleep. Owen lay wakeful; or, dozing wearily, started at every flutter of bats without, every stir of geckoes on his chamber wall. But the pink mists of dawn glimmered at last through his doors: nothing had happened.

"All the Brothers Were Valiant" is a yarn of "red blood" which the publishers naturally compare with the sea-tales of Jack London. The picture on the jacket of the pair of hulking brutes assaulting each other with harpoon and handspike gives gory promise, not to be unfulfilled. Here are tempest, mutiny, and sudden death. Here are brothers at odds, a woman between them to battle for. Here, even, is a hidden treasure to turn men's hearts against each other. Yet the tale as a whole is quite different from what London would have made it. He was the romancer of brute force; he would have had Mark Shore win, by dint of his thews and inches and ruthless heart. But Mark Shore's heart is not ruthless: in the end it yields to the right, as his body has yielded to the fist, of his younger brother Joel. And it is Joel, who loathes force, and loves decency of life not less than his Priss, who survives to carry on the brave tradition of the House of Shore. Finally, the love-element or "heart-interest" of the story is sound romantic stuff, instead of the perfunctory commodity London produced to order. The style of this narrative, also, is worth making note of, for its simplicity and solidity and, as it were, its fine dull finish. The yarn has always been a form worth the highest pains, and a fresh devotion to it on the part of responsible writers is a good sign for any literary generation.

H. W. BOYNTON

Lest We Forget

HELPING FRANCE. By Ruth Gaines. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

NOWHERE in post-war books has the appeal of France to the world been given with a surer sense of reality than in this little book. The author was a member of the Smith College Unit in France, the first to be sent to France by a woman's college. It worked as a part of the French Service de Santé, until transferred to our own Red Cross early in 1918. The unit of sixteen members had charge of a district in the Somme of thirty-six square miles embracing sixteen villages. Its duties included the supply to the inhabitants of the first necessities of life—clothing, beds, stoves, milk, and livestock. The unit devoted itself particularly to the care of the children of the district; doctors and nurses made weekly rounds of the districts, holding dispensaries and visiting sick children in their homes. Classes in sewing and carpentry were opened and a children's hospital was established at Nesle. It is characteristic of the German treatment of the districts they abandoned in the spring of 1917 that the old hospital of the Sisters of Charity in that town had been stripped bare by them before their retreat. The one remaining civilian doctor had "literally no instruments, no drugs, and no means of conveyance." During the terrible days of the German drive in 1918, the unit actually took charge of a military hospital at Beauvais. Miss Gaines, then, is writing of a work in which she herself took part.

Of the systematic and thorough nature of the devastation we get repeated record in Miss Gaines's book. It is written for the most part in an impersonal tone. It is largely, perhaps even too much for the casual reader's interest, concerned with organization and interrelation of the various bodies concerned in the work of relief. But no one can have lived through the author's experience without having something to tell at first hand of the ruin the Germans wrought in the regions they occupied. From the beginning they proceeded on the plan of systematically wrecking whatever fell into their hands. "We are not making war solely against the French army," a German officer told the Mayor of Noyon in 1914, when that official protested against the violations of the Hague convention, "we are making it against the whole of France; our aim is to weaken it, to ruin it by every means possible. If we spare ever so little of the civil population of the war, and do not compel them to undergo all its consequences, it is because we are not barbarians; such are methods of war. The harder they are, the more inexorable, the shorter will be the war."

The devastated area extended over something like six thousand square miles, inhabited by two million people, the most thickly populated, most fertile, and most highly developed industrial part of France. Something like a quarter of this region was reclaimed in 1917, only to be again submerged in the flood of the German drive in the spring of the following year. At the time of the German retreat in 1917, skilled mechanics wrecked all agricultural machinery by removing the same essential part from every machine; expert foresters girdled the fruit-trees, trained chemists poisoned the wells. The harvests of 1914-15-16 were seized by the Germans. In 1917 there was no cultivation whatever, the futile attempt to resume work in 1918 was completely wrecked, and as late as January, 1919, only ten acres of the 750 of arable land had been sown for this year. It is estimated that it will take five years to restore the land to its pre-war cultivation, and that two-fifths of it is unusable for the present, because of trenches, fragments of shells, and unexploded projectiles.

It was into such districts that the Red Cross section for civilian relief came with its warehouses, its trucks crammed with supplies for distribution, its doctors and nurses.

The Red Cross combined with a host of societies, French, English, and American, which were engaged in assisting the refugees and rebuilding the ruins, opened its stores to them, used them whenever possible as a means of distribution, and took their place in districts which till then had lacked a helping hand. It cooperated in every way with the efforts of the French Government and worked in harmony with the French officials. But the work of the Red Cross did not end with the armistice; in fact, the ending of hostilities only opened new fields. The vast region abandoned by the Germans in the last months of the war was in pitiable condition. In the Département du Nord alone it was necessary to provide at once the means of life for over a million persons, a number increased daily by thousands of returning exiles. The situation called for prompt and energetic action. Working under the direction of the French Government, the Red Cross now devoted itself to emergency relief. It established six huge warehouses in northern France into which it poured the stores no longer needed for its service with the army; it organized a transport service to take the place of the ruined railroads and tramways in the devastated region, and drew on the accumulated stores of the Belgian Relief Commission in exchange for other necessities. The Children's Bureau of the Red Cross devoted itself with special zeal to the care of children in the liberated towns, stunted and weakened by four years of insufficient food, and established a chain of school canteens where it was possible for them to get at least one hearty meal a day. The task is not yet accomplished. It will be long years before the ruin the Germans left behind them is rebuilt, but every day sees some part of the task performed, and every day deepens the hold which the Red Cross of America has on the affections of the people of France. It was no spirit of boasting, but a true consciousness of work well done that led a director of the Red Cross to reply, when asked what monument the organization would leave behind as a memorial, "Our aim has been to help France in their own way, our monument will be in their hearts."

Orthodox Recent History

FIFTY YEARS OF EUROPE. By Charles Downer Hazen. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

WHERE does history leave off and journalistic narrative begin? This has been a moot question ever since French scholars over a generation ago pointed the way to a conception of history based on the scientific evaluation of the evidence afforded by documentary materials. From this point of view it is evident that a prerequisite for the writing of history is the release from the seal of secrecy of the archives and diplomatic correspondence of the nations concerned. Naturally such indispensable documents are not available until the danger of embarrassing contemporary political relations is past.

Manifestly, therefore, an attempt to tell the story of the last fifty years can not be regarded as serious history. But this does not mean that such a narrative must be classed as journalistic. A solid background of history of the preceding period makes possible an ad interim account, subject to some corrections as additional primary material becomes accessible, but on the whole sound and dependable. Looked at from this point of view, Professor Hazen has rendered a real service. He has set forth in readable form a well-balanced account of the development of international relations and of political changes since 1870. Professor Hazen's interpretation of these political movements is essentially orthodox, and one looks in vain for any attempt to place them before us in a new light. Not that novelities are necessarily desirable or that we should welcome the upsetting of cherished theories or prejudices, but one naturally expects that as additional material becomes available, it will place a new aspect on many of the accepted accounts from which we have been all too ready to draw general conclusions.

From the economic interpretation of history, a hobby which some of our sophomoric historical and political writers have ridden nearly to death, Professor Hazen steers clear. While this is restful to the complacent soul, it is by no means an unmixed benefit. An overdose of economic interpretation is fatal to any historical work, but to treat the recent development of the British Empire, the relations between Great Britain and Ireland, the rise of the Balkan States, or the Russo-Japanese war, without placing the economic factors in their proper perspective, is to detract somewhat from the value of the volume as a whole.

On the other hand, the author has shown an admirable fairness and freedom from bias. In arrangement and proportion his narrative is excellent. The general reader will find it a handy book of reference with an amazing amount of information compressed within its 400 pages. The author has no pet theories to set forth or prejudices to exploit, and what his book lacks in freshness and novelty it makes up in balance and freedom from partisanship. For the benefit of those who will use this book as a manual, we may venture the suggestion that in a later edition Professor Hazen include a bibliography that will guide the general reader in his selection of authoritative supplementary material and aid him in avoiding, in the overwhelming mass of recent publications, that which is ephemeral and unworthy of credence.

The Run of the Shelves

IT may be possible to quarrel with Theodore Roosevelt, but it is impossible to avoid a fondness for the author of "Theodore Roosevelt's Letters to his Children (Charles Scribner's Sons). Perhaps the fondness may not suffice to conquer stubborn disapprovals or ingrained dislikes, but the fondness itself is likewise unconquerable, and the lion and the lamb must lie down together henceforth in one's estimate of the many-sided President. The letters deal with matters of fact set down in the most straightforward and unhesitating manner. Affection scallops their edges in openings like "Darling Little Ethel" and "Blessed Archikins," or globes itself into pellets of sugar-like hardness and sweetness, such as "I loved your little letter." Of course the letters have not the bad taste to be exceptional. When Skip, the dog, is described as "bathing himself in the companionship of the only one of his family he has left," the reader marks the phrase as the one adventure of its kind in a plain-spoken, crisp, and energetic book. The topics are mainly animals and sports. The parents are half children, and the girls are half boys, and the children are half animals, and the animals are half-human. The life reminds us of some primitive elder day, of the fraternity of man and child, of man and beast, in some caravanserai of "Ben-Hur," some court-yard of Homeric Ithaca.

The man whom some thought an autocrat in democratic America seems to have been truly democratic in that dictatorship to which he was called by fatherhood. His paternity is not wholly unlike the parenthood of animals—it is so quiet, so assured, so undespotic, and so unpretending. Here is no chasm to be bridged, no presidency for the children to surmount; the level on which the father met the sons and daughters was a part of his nature as really as it was the whole of theirs. Advice is forthcoming, but not forthrushing. When Ted (now Colonel Theodore Roosevelt) is balancing the claims of the professions, the father writes to the son with priceless good sense, but without any eagerness or pride in counsel, rather with a deference to the boy himself, which is possibly a phase of the good sense. When there are no dogs or horses or rabbits or badgers or lynxes or cougars to write about, he sometimes writes to Kermit about Dickens. He is very fond of Dickens, not minding the detail that "Dickens was an ill-natured, selfish cad and boor, who had no understanding of what the word gentleman meant" (page 220). That fondness need not prove a bar to diatribe is a discovery very consoling to former foes who are beginning to be fond of Mr. Roosevelt. As for Dickens, one who remembers Betsey Trotwood's nine words of counsel to her departing nephew: "Never be mean; never be false; never be cruel," will think twice before denying gentlemanliness to the parent of their parent.

Sometimes the contact of inequalities in these letters is curiously and amusingly reflective of the neighborhood of diversities in the man's life. On page 132, in a letter to Kermit, he is expansive on Mrs. Roosevelt's approval of the chicken which he fried in camp; on the next page, in the same letter, he is pacifying Russia and Japan. After chickens, one has time for empires. He is reasonably modest about his world-famed Russo-Japanese achievement, but elation peeps out in his record of the cookery. A wife's praise of his fried chicken is a test through which no man's humility can pass unscathed. The allusions to Mrs. Roosevelt, who appears, sometimes as Edith, much oftener as Mother, are always proud and fond. Her good looks appear to have been a family treasure to which the housebreaker, Old Age, must never filch the key.

In that war of opinion which fairly dwarfed that of the battlefields, cartoons played almost as important a part as the printed word. Our Government found it worth while to prompt the draughtsmen for the daily press through a Bureau of Cartoons. The director, George J. Hecht, now brings together a hundred of the more effective designs under the title, "The War in Cartoons" (Dutton). Cesare, of the New York Evening Post, is most fully represented, and for imaginative power well deserves his prominence. Kirby, of the World, touches certain moods of pathos with a distinction quite his own. The incomparably just and genial Briggs, of the Tribune, has only one sketch, concerning reconstruction. He merits a fuller representation. Ding, Sykes, Gibson, Flagg, McCutcheon may be signalized among other notable contributors. The album suffers somewhat from incoherence. Cartoons are made to be seen separately. Probably a better selection could have been made from pre-war caricature and cartoon. Much earlier than the country at large, the artists from the press grasped the horror of German aggression and the shame of our neutrality. It was not rare to find papers neutral in the editorial column while the cartoonist expressed a fine indignation against the words and deeds of the Hun. The cartoonists helped loyally in the war, they helped more to make the sentiment that brought the war home to us as our concern, and they did this without the aid of Mr. Creel's artistic advisers. It will awaken a thrill to relive the war with the present volume in hand, but the definitive record of the service of our cartoonists still remains to be made.

Few words are needed about Raemaekers' "Cartoon History of the War," the third volume of which now appears in the Century Company's popular edition. The period is that immediately preceding America's intervention. With his strong and sensitive imagination Raemaekers has made visible the verdict of all civilization. It is a terrible judgment, for it meets the German on his own chosen ground of Kultur. It shows Deutschthum in action, and withal the spiritual forces it evoked to its own undoing. Perhaps the severest retribution Germany has incurred is the permanency of this record. Every German will shrink from a Raemaekers album long after the world shall have learned not to shrink from a German.

Drama

Mark Reed and Eugene
Walter

MR. MARK REED, said to be a nestling or nursling of the Harvard dramatic course, is the author of "She Would and She Did," Miss Grace George's vehicle at the Vanderbilt. The play is a regular three-act comedy, and its theme is the suspension of a young woman from a golf club for two months in expiation of misconduct. Let no one suppose that Mr. Reed is making quiet appeals to select people; his end is the common person's common pleasure, and in his skillful hands this straitened theme becomes roomy and populous. Incident is fertile and movement swift. The courage of this beginner, who is hardly a neophyte, is conspicuous in another point. The subject naturally bristles with legalities and technicalities, meetings, motions, petitions, minutes, which the instinct of the reactionary dramatist would shirk or slur. Mr. Reed meets this adverse material in a hand-to-hand conflict in which its defeat is manifest. No golf-links is exhibited in his play, and the satire is implicit, not overt. Other mockers of sport show its worshipers making fools of themselves by speech and action in its behalf. Mr. Reed's satire, sensible everywhere but tangible nowhere, lies in the irony of the placid assumption on everybody's part that golf is one of the conceded magnitudes of life on which it would be as silly to rhapsodize as to be dithyrambic about food and clothes.

All these things interest me sincerely in Mr. Reed. His work is mechanism, but he is an original mechanic. If dramatic art among us were creative, if it gave us new substance, we could dispense with new themes and new methods; renovation, not innovation, would be our avenue to force. But in the absence of the creative faculty, the untried in the form of theme or method becomes indispensable. The minute is one section of the untried, and Mr. Reed is to be thanked for the revelation of its possibilities.

Miss George borrows youth from Frances Nesmith and lends her buoyancy, versatility, and dash. The part is one of sallies, retreats, and resiliences, and is acted with a glancing vibrancy which finds an appropriate symbol in the flutter of plumes and play of tassels in the costume worn by Miss George in Act II. Criticism—if pleasure and thankfulness could be critical—might possibly suggest that the final impression on the mind is little more than a memory of sweeps and flashes. Perhaps this is Mr. Reed's fault; perhaps he left no option to Miss George except to act as convoy to a flotilla of moods. I think he did blunder in giving his Frances Nesmith so much chicane with so little finesse; finesse is the dramatic justification of chicane. When Molière in "L'Etourdi" wanted to depict the partnership of fraud and precipitation, he made the partners two persons; Mr. Reed, outdaring Molière, embodies both in one individual. A chasm results, and Miss George has not succeeded in closing the gap, though she delights us by the agility with which she leaps from side to side.

The other parts were generally well taken. It was a notable and creditable fact that the portrayal of an entire social class by the entire company was better than the work of any single player, if we leave Miss George out of the count. In the committee scene in Act II, the ensemble reached a distinction to which all the players contributed and to which none of them, individually, attained.

For Mr. Eugene Walter I have a slighty shamefaced kindness. "The Easiest Way" left its notch in my memory, and I never lose a chance of seeing "Paid in Full." My motives in this regularity may not redound to my own honor or Mr. Walter's, but it is only just to add, in defense of myself and in praise of him, that the same lures in other hands have been far less successful in controlling my movements. In the "Challenge" (Selwyn Theatre) we are far indeed from the succinct force, the almost cube-like compactness, of "Paid in Full." As a play, a story, an argument, as any sort of entity to which the article, definite or indefinite, could reasonably be prefixed, the "Challenge," for all its vaulting title, is defenseless. It is a loitering and rambling play, of meagre content and half-apposite situation which hardly begins till it is half over, and which dies upon a kiss in a trailing epilogue. The real characters are three: the young girl, who does nothing; her millionaire brother, who bribes a governor; and her radical lover, who elects the governor, renounces the girl, and is ejected by his infuriated party on the baseless charge of complicity in the bribe. That is about all. This scant material is spread out into six acts, which contract into three in the skillful tabulations of the programme. Six acts are admissible in fact, but intolerable in theory. Many people will take food five times between sunrise and sunset who would be shocked at the proposition of five meals a day.

The design of the play, then, is naught, but the very looseness of its fabric has favored the insertion of certain pictures of manners and conduct which, in their independence as pictures, have an evident value. These are the so-called first act, in which wealth, for once, smells less of greenbacks than of the morocco and mahogany in which its genial tolerance is framed; the newspaper scene, forced into the piece by a ramrod, but stimulating in its irrelevance; and the conglomerate of types in the radical-committee scene in which the spectacle is so much more eloquent than the uproar. There is a realist in Mr. Walter, who sometimes obtains a half-holiday from the sensationist in whose factory he works.

The word "factory" reminds me that this play is a discussion of the labor movement. One fact is remarkable. On views, measures, policies, on the "isms" of the subject, Mr. Walter has simply nothing to say. He deals with men. Bad men can not do good things, and he means to show by report and picture that the men who marshal the laborers are venal and brutal. Now it is hard for a drama to convict a class. It is hard in practice for the very reason that makes it seem easy, to wit, that every large class of men includes members who are recreant to its principles. Men, for instance, are often inhuman. The proof, accordingly, requires an accumulation of instances to which the concentration of drama is opposed. Mr. Walter's confession of this fact is implied in a strange inconsistency which he has allowed to drift into his play. He feels that the class of labor leaders is condemned in the conduct of the bribe-taking governor, but not for a moment does he feel that the class of capitalists is condemned in the conduct of the bribe-giving millionaire. The crimes of our enemies are always typical. The millionaire, on the other hand, remains so agreeable to Mr. Walter that he is even intrusted with the enunciation of the concluding moral, which may be paraphrased as follows: Eat your bread-and-cheese between kisses, and leave the cure of the world to time. That Doctor Time sometimes carries specifics, or at least narcotics, in his wallet no one will deny; but he drives a slow nag, and his fees are sometimes ruinous.

The performance was creditable. It was physically too loud; its lungs were sometimes more audible than its heart. Mr. Holbrook Blinn as Harry Winthrop exhibited an easy and affluent charm. I thought the silk hat an indiscretion. A silk hat suggests gloss over hollowness, and that is precisely the association that is perilous for the courtly millionaires. Miss Jessie Glendenning's* powers were tested only in the first act; they met the test with delicate discretion. Mr. Allan Dinehart as actor, like his feigned self, Richard Putnam, as reformer, rather struggles than decisively achieves; but the gallantry of the fight in both arenas leaves the beholder touched and sympathetic.

O. W. FIRKINS

*Miss Louise Dyer has taken over the part.

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little farther into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available without much trouble, through publisher, book-seller, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles are in no sense bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

Crime

INTERNATIONAL politics and industrial troubles seem to be tied for first place in the news. Next comes the ugly outburst of crime, the raids upon banks and bank-messengers, the robbery and embezzlement, which have so unpleasantly forced themselves upon public attention.

That section of any large library which is devoted to criminology always stirs my sense of the incongruous, not to say of the ridiculous. Compared with other parts of the library it is like the mixed crowd of passengers who might be found in a life-boat after an ocean disaster, as contrasted with the orderly and respectable gathering in the first cabin the night before. Fundamentally, of course, the causes which lead to the collection of books on crime are melancholy, but the results are strangely varied. Side by side upon the shelves may stand the gravest scientific treatise and a lurid work, differing little from a dime novel in appearance and contents. For the writings of fifty to seventy years ago—often the only guide to the thought of that period—were usually sanctimonious to the last degree, with a frontispiece symbolizing the fruits of virtue and of evil, honored old age or the gallows, or else they were vulgarly sensational. So, for the most part, one must come to the books of the past thirty years to read the conclusions of the men and women who have tried to avoid both sentimentality and harshness in studying the causes and treatment of crime.

Burdette G. Lewis's "The Offender and his Relations to Law and Society" (Harpers, 1917) is a good work for American readers, treating, in one medium-sized volume, crime and its punishment in the United States. "Criminology," by Maurice F. Parmelee (Macmillan, 1918), is of convenient size, comprehensive, with references to further reading. Professional students of criminology find

The World's Largest Wireless Station

"At Honolulu, H. I., is located the largest wireless station in the world. This station is equipped with a 300 K. W. Crocker-Wheeler radio generator.

"Radio generators were specially designed by the Crocker-Wheeler Co. for the Marconi around-the-world service in sending messages from Funabashi, Japan, to Bolinas, California, 6512 Nautical miles."

Alb Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

DIAMONDS IN MODERN SETTINGS

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Deadham Hard: A Romance

By Lucas Malet

Author of "Sir Richard Calmady," etc.

This talented author (Mrs. St. Leger Harrison, the daughter of Charles Kingsley) may always be counted upon to give her readers an intellectual treat. Her new story will not prove disappointing to her many admirers. It is a splendid example of what a well-constructed novel should be.

$1.90

Maeterlinck's Dogs

By Georgette Le Blanc-Maeterlinck

Author of "The Children's Blue Bird," etc.

A highly entertaining account of some of the dogs owned at various times by the great Master. The book will appeal not only to dog-lovers, but to all devotees of Maeterlinck, because of the intimate picture it gives of the home life of the Belgian mystic. Mme. Maeterlinck's animated style makes the book most enjoyable reading, and she has enlivened her text with a large number of amusing sketches of the dogs included in the book.

$2.50

The Truth About China and Japan

By B. L. Putnam Weale

Author of "The Fight for the Republic in China," "Indiscreet Letters from Peking," etc.

The author has lived in China since childhood and for over twenty years has occupied high advisory positions in the Chinese Government. His very timely book presents China's case in a fearless manner. Many facts concerning past and present conditions in China and Japan heretofore known only to a few insiders are given a lucid presentation in this book. It should be read by all who aim to keep up to date on current affairs.

$2.00

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY
Publishers New York

that it attempts too much in one volume, but the average reader will prefer it to the more minute studies in the Modern Criminal Science Series, mentioned below. A brief and inexpensive handbook is Charles R. Henderson's "The Cause and Cure of Crime" (McClurg, 1914). The former Police Commissioner, Arthur Woods's, monograph "Crime Prevention" (Princeton Univ. Press, 1918) is commended. For a scientific study of not too great compass, Charles Mercier's "Crime and Criminals" (Univ. of London Press, 1918) is by a frequent writer on this subject, while James Devon's "The Criminal and the Community" (Lane, 1912) has received high praise. The author is medical officer in the prison at Glasgow, so his conclusions are drawn from conditions in Scotland. "Criminal Responsibility and Social Constraint" (Scribner, 1912), by a teacher of social ethics, R. M. McConnell, is a philosophical work. Every reader should look at the famous and terrible study of heredity, "The Jukes" (Putnam), by R. L. Dugdale. Criminal anthropology is the subject of Havelock Ellis's "The Criminal" (3d ed., Scribner, 1910).

If you wish extensive and scholarly researches, the Modern Criminal Science Series (Little, Brown) is indicated. Among others, the series includes Lombroso's "Crime, Its Causes and Remedies," Hans Gross's "Criminal Psychology," Aschaffenburg's "Crime and Its Repression," and (important to-day) William Adrian Bongers's "Criminality and Economic Conditions." One or two books upon the allied subject of prisons may be mentioned: "The Prison and the Prisoner" (Little, Brown, 1917), a symposium, edited by Julia K. Jaffray and "Within Prison Walls" (Appleton, 1914) by Thomas Mott Osborne. "Juvenile Courts and Probation" (Century, 1914), by Thomas Mott Osborne. "Jud Baldwin. The fact that Arthur Train's "The Prisoner at the Bar" (Scribner, 1906) is always readable and often amusing does not decrease its value.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

- Bottomo, Phyllis. A Servant of Reality. Century. $1.75.
- Chauvelot, Robert. Carvati. Century.
- Day, Holman. The Rider of the King Log. Harper. $1.75 net.
- Orczy, Baroness. The League of the Scarlet Pimpernel. Doran. $1.60 net.
- Putnam, N. W. Believe You Me! Doran. $1.50 net.
- Robins, Elizabeth. The Message. Century.

ART

- Giles, A. F. The Roman Civilization. London: T. C. and E. C. Jack.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

- Grelling, Dr. Richard. The Crime. Vols. 3 and 4. Doran. $2.50 each.
- Haight, E. H. The Life and Letters of James Monroe Taylor. Dutton. $3.50 net.
- Thayer, W. R. Theodore Roosevelt. An Intimate Biography. Houghton Mifflin.
- Theodore Roosevelt's Letters to His Children. Scribner. $2 net.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

- Inman, S. G. Intervention in Mexico. N. Y.: Association Press. $1.50.
- Leitch, John. Man-To-Man. The Story of Industrial Democracy. N. Y.: B. C. Forbes Publishing Co. $2 net.
- Logio, G. C. Bulgaria: Problems and Politics. Doran. $2 net.
- Pepper, C. M. American Foreign Trade. Century. $2.50 net.
- Smith, Snell. America's To-morrow. N. Y.: Britton Publishing Co. $2 net.

POETRY AND DRAMA

- Aldington, Richard. Images. London: The Egoist, Ltd. 3s.6d.
- Dreiser, Theodore. The Hand of the Potter. Boni & Liveright. $1.50 net.
- MacKaye, Percy and Barnhart, Harry. The Will of Song. Boni & Liveright. 70c.

SCIENCE

- Stratton-Porter, Gene. Homing with the Birds. Doubleday, Page. $2 net.
- Thomson, J. A. The Secrets of Animal Life. Holt. $2.50.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Mayo, Margaret. Trouping for the Troops. Doran. $1.25 net.
- Mr. Punch's History of the Great War. With 170 Cartoons and Illustrations by Famous "Punch" Artists. Stokes. $4.

THE REVIEW is Recognized

as an organ of sane American opinion; it has found a definite place in American journalism; it is read in more than 600 libraries in every state in the Union; it is quoted every week by newspapers throughout the country.

Can you afford to be without THE REVIEW?

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

R.10.4.9

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

R.10.4.9

THE REVIEW

LIBRARY
OCT 20 1919
UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 22

New York, Saturday, October 11, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

An Open Letter to Senator Hitchcock	461
Brief Comment	461
Editorial Articles:
The Labor Conference	464
Ratification with Caution	464
The Crises at Vladivostok	465
Another Week of the Steel Strike	466
A Moment's Halt	467
As to Deporting Undesirables. By Sydney Reid	468
The Spirit of Washington's Foreign Policy. By Elbert J. Benton	469
Courts Martial. By George W. Martin	471
Correspondence	473
Book Reviews:
Alfred Noyes, James Oppenheim, and Others	475
Two "First Novels"	476
The Run of the Shelves	477
What's Hoover Going to Do?	478
Impecunious Idealism. By William Archer	479
Books and the News: Foreign Visitors. By Edmund Lester Pearson	480

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

An Open Letter to Senator Hitchcock

THE country wants the treaty ratified, and is tired of delay. The evidence is all in. There are no new arguments to be heard. Senators who were undecided at first have had ample time to reach a decision.

The treaty cannot be ratified unless the act of ratification embodies reservations safeguarding our country in certain matters of vital concern to its permanent welfare. To such reservations, drawn in so moderate a form that the acquiescence of the other Powers of the world may be counted on as a certainty, a strong group of Republican Senators have long been committed. The President has himself unequivocally expressed his approval of their substance. His opposition is only to their being embodied in the act of ratification.

Your present position appears to be that of a stubborn adherence to this opposition. But it will evidently be unavailing. The Republican Senators who have shown the firmness of their convictions by standing out against changes that would imperil the treaty are equally firm in their determination that the treaty shall carry no peril to our country's honor or safety. They can not be intimidated by the threat that the adoption of reasonable reservations will bring with it the rejection of the treaty by the Administration forces. Upon those who refuse a rational compromise, and not upon those who propose it, will rest the guilt of wrecking the treaty.

President Wilson's illness has laid upon you, and upon the Democratic Senators of whom you are the leading spokesman in this great emergency, a heightened responsibility. It is impossible, and will obviously for a considerable period continue impossible, for him to take full charge of the situation. It is well that the country was not rushed into a precipitate acceptance of the treaty; but further delay would be not only useless, but dangerous. It would be dangerous as prolonging the period of uncertainty and disturbance throughout the world, and it would be dangerous as imperiling the adoption of the treaty itself.

It is in your power to end all doubt and delay. You have only to accept the basis of ratification upon which the moderate Republican reservationists stand. They have shown the sincerity of their desire to put the treaty through by standing out against the leaders of their party on every proposition that boded danger to it. Can you afford to spurn their aid, at the cost of imperiling the whole treaty? You can prolong delay and make ultimate ratification doubtful by continued opposition to their moderate and reasonable proposals; by accepting them you can make ratification certain and make it prompt. Which is your choice?

KING ALBERT'S welcome in America has view in enthusiasm with that which greeted Cardinal Mercier. In times less troubled, and less fraught with grave anxieties, the manifestations of our affectionate regard would have been even more general and more conspicuous, but they could not have been more sincere. In both cases, the reception was but the outward expression of an admiration and sympathy to which no outward evidence could do adequate justice. Rarely, if ever, has history furnished an instance in which the splendid self-sacrifice of a nation has been typified in two figures of heroism at once so superb and so simple.

IT was like the sudden clearing of a dismal London fog when the statement was issued in Downing Street, on Sunday afternoon, that the great railway strike was at an end. Secretary Thomas, of the National Union of Railwaymen, proceeded to Albert Hall and before an audience of 5,000 railway workers declined to announce a "victory" for the Union, but preferred to call it rather an "honorable settlement." And with admirable courtesy he paid a hearty tribute to Premier Lloyd George for his aid in reaching such a settlement. The real victory is evidently with the deep-seated British instinct for moderation and self-control, when any crisis seems to be endangering the foundations on which their civilization has been built up. After Secretary Thomas had made his statement, and the roar of applause had died away, the audience rose to its feet and sang, "Abide with Me." This itself, in an audience composed of members of the Railwaymen's Union, says much for the British solidity of the masses employed in Great Britain's industries. It is not good seed-ground for the plant of "red" revolution. Work was at once resumed on the railways, and negotiations for permanent settlement of remaining differences are to continue through the year. Wages are stabilized at the present rate until September 30, 1920, and no adult railway laborer is to receive less than 51 shillings per week, so long as the cost of living remains as much as 110 per cent. above the pre-war level. The Railwaymen's Union promises that its men shall work harmoniously with all who remained at work, or returned to work, while the strike was in progress, and assurance is given that strikers will not be punished. On resumption of work, arrears of wages will be paid.

A PART of Judge Gary's testimony before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor excited considerable attention. The part which the newspapers played up is as follows: "Speaking for myself and not the corporation, I would not object to a law for the Federal incorporation or licensing of business which would result in the establishment of a disinterested commission who should determine under what conditions the corporation receive its charter or license and would have a supervision of questions even including labor." Here, apparently, would be a big gain for labor. But notice that Judge Gary concluded this passage with the clause, "providing that questions of principle and law might be reviewed by a legal tribunal." It is very evident that capital is ready enough to make concessions, if labor is willing to regulate its activities according to a reasonable principle and to make itself responsible to the law in the same degree to which corporations now are. Labor will no doubt fight any such step, but the public, we believe, is tired of strikes called by ambitious minorities, and hopes that now may be the time for a careful examination of union propaganda with a view to ascertaining not only what responsibilities labor may properly be expected to assume, but also how the great majority of laborers may be freed from the politics of unscrupulous leaders.

IN General Wood's opinion the real "nigger in the wood-pile" at Omaha was not the man who was lynched. It was stated in these columns last week that it would be a mistake to attribute such an uprising to mere prejudice against the negro, and that there are disorderly elements among us only waiting for any possible spark with which to start a fire. General Wood, after careful examination, has made the deliberate statement that the I. W. W. was behind this disturbance. This may pain the Parlor Bolshevik press, so fearful of injustice in charging any wrongdoing against these distant relatives of toil, but natural probability is in collusion with the evidence in General Wood's possession. Any revolution which the I. W. W. type of mind can understand thrives on riot and disorder, and its promoters go for counsel to men like Foster, whose book on Syndicalism boldly advises utter disregard for all such hampering ideas as patriotism, religion, duty, or honor, when they stand in the way of any effective weapon which falls within their reach. They have learned that prejudice against the colored man is such a weapon, and when a chance to use it comes to hand there is no reason to suppose that such men would scruple to do so. Omaha itself has responded promptly to the presence of General Wood and his troops, and seems now thoroughly disposed to right itself in the eyes of the country. The quick relaxation of the stringent military regulations at first imposed could have been based on nothing but the most reliable evidence that this is so.

SECRETARY BAKER, in a statement issued through the League to Enforce Peace, declares that if the proposed League does not go through, we shall have to "arm to the teeth" in order to keep ourselves protected from "any combination of aggressors which may be formed against us." This deserves to be put beside President Wilson's equally startling statement that failure to accept the Covenant will mean that "we must stand apart and be the hostile rival of the rest of the world" and become militarized in thoroughly German fashion, throwing our democracy to the winds. Surely if the bonds of friendship that bind us to our Allies can be snapped so easily it bodes ill for the future of the League of Nations, whose success must depend far more upon the spirit that governs the members in their relations to one another than upon the letter of the Covenant. But are these statements more than wanton recklessness of speech? There are certainly no indications of our adopting a hostile attitude towards the rest of the world. Are there any indications that the rest of the world is likely to adopt a hostile attitude towards us? Are we really more in danger of aggressors than we were before the war broke out? If so, we should like the evidence. We had supposed that our effective military support of the Allies, our lavish and generous assistance given to the suffering peoples of Europe through the Red Cross and other relief organizations (which was not confined to the Allies), and the spirit of fraternity in which that assistance was given, had resulted in creating mutual trust and respect based upon mutual understanding.

WE have been repeatedly told by the President in the past few weeks that with the League of Nations in force it will never again be necessary to send America's sons to shed their blood on foreign soil. Yet the Secretary of War, speaking for the Administration the other day, declared that in order to meet the military responsibilities which we are expected to assume in the new order of things, we must have a standing army of half a million men, with reserves of a million more. Possibly these two propositions can be reconciled. But the perplexed citizen would like to know how. He would be grateful to Mr. Baker if he would condescend to give the details of the reasoning that brings him to his conclusion.

THERE is some analogy between the case of D'Annunzio in Fiume and that of General von der Goltz in the Baltic region. Both hold their own in defiance of the Supreme Council in Paris and find their strength in the strong appeal which their insubordination makes to the masses of Italy and Germany. And there is little doubt that the sympathy openly shown by the masses is secretly shared by the responsible men in power who officially disapprove of their independent attitude. Both the German general and his Government make show of a willingness to comply, under certain conditions, with the wishes of the Entente, but conditional compliance by a defeated enemy differs little from the more open disobedience in which an ally can indulge. The lurking pleasure with which the responsible Italian statesmen must view the growth of the patriotic movement under the inspiring leadership of the insurgent poet will compensate them for the loss they suffer in international prestige. The only sufferer who finds no comfort to make up for his loss is the Supreme Council in Paris, whose remonstrances, followed up by equally ineffective threats, fall upon deaf ears.

VON DER GOLTZ has, naturally, his most ardent admirers among the members of the Alldeutscher Verband, the Pan-German League of which little has been heard since the armistice dealt the death-blow to its ambitions. But, emboldened by the general's example, the noisy agitators have crept out of their holes and are again as busy as ever. They call their union, with characteristic German modesty, "the Parliament of the consciously German intellectuals," and have formulated the following demands, which may serve as an illustration of their intellectual standing: (1) the return of a German Emperor in his former glory; (2) the restitution of everything Germany has been robbed of by the Entente; (3) a union, at any cost, with German Austria; (4) the liberation of the Flemings and the Balts; (5) the abolition of the unbearable domination of the Jews. We had been under the impression that King Albert had liberated the Flemings so thoroughly as to make any further action of the Pan-German League superfluous. And as to a union with German Austria at any cost, we believe that the cost would have to be paid by Austria, which, for that reason, might be less anxious to take her share of Germany's financial burden. And to couple the reference to "a German Emperor in his former glory" with an incitement to anti-Semitic agitation shows such a lack of good breeding that we sincerely doubt whether this appeal of the "consciously German" gentlemen will meet with a favorable reception at Amerongen.

AS Admiral von Tirpitz goes on with his story of the war, three thoughts are pressed with never-ceasing reiteration. First, a war at that time should have been avoided. This does not mean that the Admiral had no ambition for German dominance, but that he considered Germany to be rapidly approaching the point where she could have acquired that dominance by the mere showing of a stick so big that none would have ventured to oppose. And, of course, the Admiral is in no doubt as to the identity of the stick. The second point is that the war which never should have been brought on was lost by continual blundering. The discredit for this is distributed with a free hand, the Kaiser getting the most abundant allowance for keeping himself surrounded by incompetent politicians. And finally, at every available opportunity, the Admiral presses home his conviction that even after the war had been so unwisely forced, it might have been won if there had only been the disposition to follow his advice and unchain the German fleet for a life and death struggle with the British at the very start. It is a sad tale of blunders, all the way through, though in view of the wealth of material many are likely to disagree with von Tirpitz as to the points where the art of blundering reached its highest "efficiency." In view of our habit of referring to the British conduct of the war as "muddling through," it is interesting to hear von Tirpitz confess that "at the end of July, 1914, we found ourselves in a state of confusion, and that with a talent on the whole not equal to the British gift for improvising methods."

ON another page we publish an article on "Courts Martial" which, it may be hoped, will give some comfort to those who are concerned over injustice and hardship suffered by private soldiers through the action of the military courts. The writer insists that he saw no innocent man convicted. But there are at least two phases of the system, as it operated during the war, which Congress should investigate thoroughly. First, although an offence by an officer is supposed to be more reprehensible than that by a private, returning soldiers assert that officers were let off easy. One case has come to our special notice. A private was sentenced to a year of hard labor for using a Government motor car with which to take some Y. M. C. A. and Red Cross girls to a dance. Nothing was said about the colonel of this man's regiment, who came to the same dance in a Government car. An officer who was detailed to investigate the court-martial system at Brest has informed us that, if strict justice had been followed, officers high in command would have been court-martialed and discharged from the service. In the circumstances, dishonorable discharge is not taken very seriously by the soldiers.

The other phase has to do with the treatment accorded to conscientious objectors. The newspapers have been telling us recently of the dismissal from prison of large numbers of these persons. Obviously, the Secretary of War, acting by himself, is not justified in putting his veto on the courts' decisions. A special committee should attack this problem. Conscientious objectors were not dealt with properly during the war. It was outrageous that they should have been permitted from their sheltered cages to jeer at soldiers sweating in the sun; they should have been segregated, and in regions where the outlook was not too satisfying.

TWENTY MILLION DOLLARS placed by Mr. Rockefeller at the disposal of the General Education Board for the improvement of medical education promises much for the side of human health and happiness in the age-long battle with disease. The donor has specified a period of fifty years within which both principal and accruing interest shall be expended. This will leave to the Board a wide range for experiment, making it possible to draw back from positions which do not promise well, on fair trial, and to strengthen those which do. It is apparently the intention to use a large portion of the fund for developing the resources of the medical colleges of recognized worth already in existence, though a statement attributed to Dr. Abraham Flexner that the needs of the various sections of the country are to be considered may point to the establishment of a few entirely new centres of medical education. The men who are to administer this gift will have a great opportunity. The point in which they might most easily and most dangerously err would be in laying the money-holding administrative hand of the General Education Board too heavily upon the strictly educational policies of our medical schools. Unless unquestioned freedom is left to the schools in this respect, the confidence of thinking men will not be retained, the prejudices of the thoughtless against all such benefactions will be increased, and the possible good in this particular case greatly diminished.

THE plight of the professor has "got across" to the public. Everybody knows it, and that is the best guarantee that something will be done about it. Harvard, Princeton, and the rest will beyond all reasonable doubt raise their quotas. Then they will presumably raise the professors' salaries—the professors', and not merely the instructors'. But those of the public who are interested enough to contribute to the desired result will wish to know very precisely what proportion of salaries has been raised and how much. They will be interested for some time to know how much money is going toward new appointments and new courses—the false glory for which college faculties have allowed their trustees to sell their just inheritance—and how much of it is going to the men who have earned it by years of self-denying devotion. If the public can be convinced that the colleges contemplate something like a moratorium, to be devoted to consolidation rather than expansion, its generosity, or rather its conviction as to its duty, will be found entirely adequate to the demands of the situation.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24 Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.

Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

EDITORS

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

The Labor Conference

THE most fortunate circumstance regarding the great labor conference which assembled in Washington this week is that the possibilities before it are viewed by the nation in a spirit at once sober and hopeful. It is only in a few hectic minds that the duty before the conference, or any element in it, is regarded as being that of introducing a brand-new order in the industrial world. On the other hand, it is felt even by cautious people that the opportunity before the conference is one which presents rare possibilities of substantial progress toward placing the relations between employers, employed, and the public upon a better footing. This has doubtless been in the main the state of mind that has existed ever since the conference was announced by President Wilson on September 1; but two large facts in the immediate situation have contributed powerfully to the accentuation of that attitude. The long-accumulating terror of the great British railway strike has just been brought to a close in a manner surprisingly sudden and surprisingly satisfactory, and the great steel strike in our own country is just entering upon its most critical stage. The facts of both these situations conspire to produce a feeling inimical at once to unreasoning fear and to Utopian expectations.

The most conspicuous lesson of the British settlement is that what looks like a battle to the death may in reality be something much milder, and that public sentiment can, if it chooses, assert a commanding influence under even the most threatening conditions. Whatever else may be said about the compromise that was attained, it was a magnificent triumph of order and reason. Secretary Thomas, of the National Union of Railwaymen, after referring to the struggle just closed as "the greatest fight of organized workers in history," expressed his pride that it had been conducted loyally and peacefully, and that in this the railwaymen had given an example to the world. Whether all the credit for the peaceableness and order is to be assigned to the strikers, it is unnecessary at this moment to inquire too curiously. To the more sober leaders of the labor forces a great portion of the merit of the achievement must unquestionably be ascribed; but to lookers-on upon this side of the Atlantic it seems evident that the splendid public spirit shown by the people as a whole in preparing, by extraordinary and efficient arrangements, to meet the worst that could happen to the country in the way of economic obstruction was the factor of dominating importance. And every American should take pride in feeling that in this resource our own country can, if need comes, prove itself equal to the best.

The meeting of the Conference at Washington coincided with the appearance of armed forces of the United States at the scene of strife in the Gary district. This might seem on its face ominous of trouble. The truth, we take it, is precisely the opposite. Not promptness, but delay, in a threatening situation is the breeder of disorder and violence. Nobody is being coerced at Gary to do anything except obey the law; and, unless we are to abandon the law, that kind of coercion must be resorted to, sooner or later, in any such situation as that which had developed in the Gary district. The only difference between an early and a late resort to it is that a very little suffices if promptly applied, and a great deal is necessary if there is weakness or hesitation in the first stages. A notable feature in General Wood's orders is that, while they prohibit open-air assemblies, no restriction is placed upon orderly meetings in theatres or other public buildings. To prevent meetings which are obviously calculated to result in disturbance of the public peace is a means not of suppressing, but of preserving, the right of free speech in a time of crisis. Thus the first note in the steel-strike trouble is that of a firm insistence on the supremacy of law, combined with a sober regard for the fundamental rights of the people.

The speech of the Secretary of Labor in opening the Conference is deserving of unqualified praise. Closing, as he properly did, with an eloquent expression of hope that the Conference will result in an achievement "that will promote the welfare of mankind down through the ages," there was no word in his speech indicating an expectation, or even a desire, that the Conference would attempt anything in the nature of a change in the fundamentals of the existing order. Whether by accident or design, President Wilson's phrase—indefinite though its meaning was—about "putting the whole question of wages upon another footing" made no appearance either expressly or by implication in Secretary Wilson's address. In tone and substance, the speech was permeated by the idea that industrial relations are capable of being vastly improved by reasonable understandings and efficient arrangements directed to the avoidance of strife and the equitable settlement of those questions which now so constantly disturb industrial relations and impair the general prosperity. All this is of good omen; and the more so when we remember that Secretary Wilson's prominence in labor matters took its rise from his connection with the original organization of the United Mine Workers of America.

The hope of solid achievement for the Conference rests equally on the avoidance of any futile search for a panacea and on an earnest and effective belief that results of great beneficence are within our reach if men of good will and good sense combine their efforts for the purpose. For such a combination of effort the Conference at Washington furnishes an opportunity which the conditions of the time make extraordinarily promising. Let us hope that the outcome will realize the just expectations of reasonable optimists.

Ratification With Caution

THE vote by which the Fall amendments were defeated in the Senate has apparently left each of the two parties well satisfied. We need not rehearse at length the modes of reasoning which lead to the opposite conclusions. Senator Hitchcock is supposed to find sufficient satisfaction in the thought that seventeen Republicans were unwilling to endorse amendments which would send the Treaty back to the Conference; Senator Lodge is pictured as chuckling over this Republican flexibility. Mr. Lodge, the reasoning goes, was not particular about the Fall amendments. But he will fight hard to have the Treaty embrace his own amendments, and when these have been passed by the Senate, he can then point proudly to the Republicans' record of open-mindedness, evidenced by their previous ballots, and insist that his additions to the Treaty passed strictly on their merits.

All this is guess-work concerning a procedure which is causing many persons much irritation. The people at large, if we may judge, are chiefly desirous to see the Treaty ratified in such form that it will be promptly accepted by all parties concerned. Yet there is some consolation in the thought that we as a nation are not jumping into this new venture blindly. It is encouraging, even, that the plan of the League has met with the smallest amount of wild enthusiasm. Cautious acceptance of it is best at this time. We all hope that the League will operate effectively. But it will assuredly have to deal with problems which in the past have proved to be insoluble. It will have the advantage of a large organization inspired by the sincere wish to mete out justice, and to establish such a reputation for justice that wars will be unnecessary. The mere machinery of the League will not be enough, and this point cannot be stressed too often. For much of the social disturbance which the world is witnessing to-day received its initial impetus from a well-meaning but mistaken reliance upon the possibility of creating offhand a social machinery which would enable us to realize the loftiest humanitarian hopes. President Wilson seemed to fall into this error in his speeches in the West. He might have gained a large number of solid adherents to the League if he had dwelt with the greatest frankness upon its possible shortcomings. It would have been wiser to lay the emphasis, not after the manner of the facile perfectionist upon the new order which must be ushered in—for the old world is not likely to learn entirely new tricks—but upon the steady improvement in human dealings for which the League would pave the way.

For the League—the organization of the League—will of itself be but a vehicle. And it is not difficult, even at this stage, for the cynic's imagination to discover in it possibilities for intrigue on a larger scale than any previously known to the world. Representatives of the various nations will be thrown intimately together, and each will be instructed by his Government to agitate in favor of certain policies; it follows that pressure will be brought to bear to form coalitions within the Assembly and very likely in the Council. Says the cynic: Let us suppose, not the case of President De Valera vs. England—cases which have been well aired are likeliest to receive fair treatment—but as broad a question as the equality of races. Japan has already brought it up; India is grumbling; our own negroes are becoming self-conscious. When it comes to the Assembly, one must be blind not to see that little groups will rumble with discontent and will allege the use of autocratic methods by a strong minority. And then some promising great Power will be approached and perhaps induced to say a good word for dark-skinned races. Whereupon another greater Power will fling back at a sensitive point of the first great Power. Result: Nothing will happen—save a deal of unpleasant feeling and various resolves to turn the tables on old adversaries. The League, says the cynic, will, by the very magnitude of its organization, easily make mountains of what, at the hands of a less elaborate diplomacy, might at least remain mole-hills.

This, of course, is not the spirit in which to approach the programme with which we are confronted. Mr. Hoover's address at Palo Alto, if allowance be made for certain generalizations, approached the present emergency in the right spirit. Showing the utmost consideration for those Senators who are still questioning the merits of the League, he gave his audience the benefit of his own rich observations; presented vividly the serious political and economic conditions in Europe, and gave it as his deliberate opinion that only such an organization as that which is proposed could keep matters from getting worse. Here is testimony from one who has had the most extraordinary opportunity to observe, and, quite as important, it is expressed in terms which entirely remove suspicion: it is no Utopia which Mr. Hoover has in mind, but a workable organization, the product of much careful discussion by some of the best minds in the world.

The Review has never been enthusiastic about the manner in which the League came into being. It has contended that much hardship might have been avoided if a treaty had been ratified first, the great Powers binding themselves to see it executed, and if in addition the stage had been set for the formation of a world league in the near future. This procedure, however, was not to be, and we are now confronted by an international situation which must be settled as soon as possible in order that each of the several countries of the world, including our own, may get down to the business of putting its own house in order. Moving day is bad enough when confined to a few hours; having it with us continuously for weeks and months has become intolerable.

The Crises at Vladivostok

AFFAIRS in Eastern Siberia are fast approaching a crisis, and the American position there is such as to cause grave anxiety. This situation is the logical result of mistaken policy, and is the culmination of a series of blunders, of tactlessness, and of needless friction, the responsibility for which must be apportioned between the Administration at Washington and the Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in Siberia. It has now reached such a point that we have not only earned the ill-will of the Russian people, but that only prompt action and able diplomacy can avoid a rupture with Japan.

Let it not be thought that, because of the present helplessness of Russia and the general state of disorganization and chaos that reigns throughout the Slav Empire, the alienation of these people is a matter of little moment. It is not good policy to "kick a man when he is down," especially if he is certain to rise later a giant in strength and long in memory. Sentiments of sympathy and good-will play an important role in the relations between peoples, and we have in the past enjoyed the admiration and gratitude of Russia, thanks to some trifling acts indicative of sympathy in times of trouble. But now, despite fair words and fine promises, we have failed her in her hour of greatest need and have added thereto gratuitous insult and provocation. Bitterly shall we repay this in the future.

The successive steps of our Siberian policy have already been recounted in the Review. After long delay we sent a small army to Vladivostok, and the Russians were led to believe that our purpose was to aid them. But, thanks to the instructions issued by Washington, the American force not only was of no assistance to the Russian Government in its efforts to re-establish the Russian state, but even acted as a hindrance and a means of opposition, since the zone which we occupied became a haven of refuge for Bolsheviki bandits and for the elements working against Russian unity. Major-General Graves, the American Commander, is a good, average, routine officer, without initiative or foreign experience, and fearful of assuming responsibility. To this is added a tactlessness that has continually set the representatives of our Allies by the ears and rendered intelligent co-operation impossible. He has been further hampered by a particularly stupid chief of staff, whose crude blunders have given rise to the probably undeserved charge of favoring the Bolsheviki. General Graves is the last man in the Army that should have been chosen for a position requiring tact and judgment and demanding considerable latitude of authority to meet conditions which could not possibly be foreseen by Washington. On the other hand, it is apparent that the choice was made because he was believed to be a man who would meticulously follow the letter of his instructions, and never assume the slightest personal responsibility, no matter what the emergency.

Now, however, he has been goaded beyond endurance and has been led into inexcusable indiscretions. The hand of Japan is clearly to be seen in a series of petty misunderstandings and annoyances calculated to make bad blood between the Americans and Russians. The Cossacks of the Ussuri and the Zabaikal regions are loyal Russians, and were the first and most stalwart opponents of the Bolsheviki. But they were not easily amenable to discipline under the conditions of civil war existing in Eastern Siberia, and were led by more or less irresponsible Atamans. If these Atamans, Semenov and Kalmykov, have been dependent upon Japanese money to pay their forces and have, therefore, been tools in the Japanese game, we have ourselves to blame. Kalmykov is, to be sure, a crazy, swash-buckling brigand chieftain, but Semenov, while no politician, is a patriotic Russian, and would staunchly support the Omsk Government, were he not placed in a position of absolute dependence upon Japanese assistance. We cannot plead ignorance, for we had full and accurate reports concerning him last year.

There have been many ticklish situations in which hostilities were narrowly averted, the most recent of which has been the arrest of an American officer and non-commissioned officer by Kalmykov's Cossacks, and the flogging of the latter, an act apparently abetted by the Japanese. The Omsk Government has repudiated this act, and it may well be considered an unfortunate incident beyond the control of the responsible authorities, and one which should not be allowed to affect the larger issue of our relations to the Russian Government.

More serious, however, are the unwarranted acts of General Graves in holding up at Vladivostok a shipment of arms destined for the Russian Army, and his interference with the local Russian press. The arms in question, some 14,000 rifles, were bought and paid for by the Russian Government and had arrived in a Russian port. General Graves says, in extenuation of his act, that he feared lest these arms should fall into the hands of Kalmykov and Semenov in transit, but this was not for him to decide in the face of directions issued by the Russian Government. The act was a very high-handed proceeding on the part of a foreign force, and was liable to serious misinterpretation in view of our previous policy.

The other act, his interference with the local press, would seem to be even more serious. It appears that two Vladivostok papers published scurrilous articles attacking American policy, and they were so offensive to General Graves that he threatened the editors with arrest and the papers themselves with suspension. One can well understand the annoyance of General Graves, in view of the hostile atmosphere surrounding him, an atmosphere created by our own policy and accentuated by his tactlessness and lack of understanding. But he should have taken into consideration the source of the propaganda of which these articles were the expression. It is not amiss to note in this connection the just grievance which Russians have when they see such journals as the New Republic and the Nation publishing utterly unwarranted attacks upon the head of the Russian Government and calling him a murderer and tyrant.

It is high time for our Government to adopt a sane policy towards Russia and to see if we can thereby repair some of the damage already done, and lay the basis for a restoration of Russian-American sympathy and co-operation. The first step should be the immediate recall of General Graves, who has by these acts rendered his position there untenable, and the appointment in his stead of a tactful officer, acquainted with Russian conditions and competent to exercise a wise discretion in dealing with delicate problems as they arise. We should supplement this by sending to Omsk an able Commissioner, with authority to act in co-operation with the British and French High Commissioners already there. Only so can American interests be protected, and the danger of serious mistakes be avoided. The Russian Government should be recognized without delay, and a program of the widest possible material assistance undertaken. The Russian Government will, of course, be able to pay for such assistance, and has in its natural resources a better basis for credit than any other country in Europe. But far more important than the question of payment is that of acquiring in the restored Russian national state a firm friend for the years to come. If, on the other hand, we fail to rise to the opportunity, and instead withdraw our troops from Siberia and abandon Russia, we shall have ourselves to thank if Japan controls the economic future of Siberia and if the Russians are forced to turn to Germany in the tremendous tasks of reconstruction that must follow the approaching collapse of the Soviet régime at Moscow.

Another Week of the Steel Strike

AT present, the strike shows no signs either of an immediate collapse or of a final success. Efforts to give it a better standing in public opinion have not been happy. John A. Fitch, in the Survey, attempts to show that it is merely a strike for freedom, but does not get through his first sentence without the false assumption that the men whom Judge Gary refused to meet were the genuine representatives of the men working in the mills of the Steel Corporation. And this is but one of many points in which Mr. Fitch puts himself in flat contradiction to reliable evidence within the reach of everybody. It is not true that the Corporation has refused to its employees the privilege of unitedly presenting their views, or of collective bargaining. The objection has been to allowing this united presentation of views and collective bargaining to be managed by powers outside the body of its employees and not under their control. The 24-hour shift, included by Mr. Fitch along with other indictments, is perhaps not generally understood. The fact is that in certain processes in the manufacture of steel the unbroken oversight of one skilled workman is necessary to secure the desired result. There are probably few of the men involved who do not take a justifiable pride in the skill and fidelity which warrants their selection for so delicate and important a piece of work. The total number of men to whom this duty falls is very small, to none of them does it come oftener than once in two weeks, and for sixteen of the twenty-four hours there is a fifty per cent. extra wage.

Mr. Fitch reiterates the opposition of the unions to the physical examination of applicants for positions. The assertion is that such examinations are humiliating, and can be used by the employer to blacklist men who have been active in the work of labor organization. The unions will get little sympathy in this position. The idea that the purpose of the examination is to furnish a basis for possible blacklisting is a mere bogey of the imagination, while the knowledge which it furnishes is not only a protection to the company against losses from accidents due to physical incapacity, but a means of safety to the men themselves. And in many cases it gives to the workman knowledge of some physical trouble still easily curable which might have incapacitated him for years, if it had gone on undetected until firmly fastened upon his system.

Popular interest has been turned from the details of the strike itself to the examinations of various leaders by the Senate Committee, particularly of Judge Gary and William Z. Foster. Under hours of questioning Judge Gary consistently maintained the position that the Steel Corporation is contending for the principle of the open shop endangered by the attacks of outside and irresponsible organizations. The questioning of Mr. Foster turned very naturally upon his record as a revolutionary agitator of the Bolshevistic type. Passages from his earlier book were read to him and he was asked to answer with a simple yes or no whether he still holds the opinions there expressed. After long evasion he was finally brought to the point where the question could no longer be dodged, and asserted that his views had changed, but was unable to state that he had ever given any public notice of that change.

Unfortunately for Mr. Foster, he has himself made it impossible for thinking men to attach any positive value to his belated recantation. In his book on Syndicalism he did not hesitate to say, "The Syndicalist is as unscrupulous in his choice of weapons to fight his everyday battles as for his final struggle with capitalism. He allows no consideration of legality, religion, patriotism, honor, duty, and so forth, to stand in the way of his adoption of effective tactics." In these words Mr. Foster gives himself unlimited license to employ falsehood whenever and wherever it promises to be an effective tactic. Now, we happen to have him on record as late as 1914, in a letter to Solidarity, the I. W. W. organ, advising I. W. W. men to give up their separate organization, not because he had any objection to its revolutionary objects, but specifically because of his belief that those objects could best be attained by getting into the other organizations and controlling them. That is, make a deceptive movement of apparent retreat in order to prepare for a more effective advance at the earliest opportunity. One must have the "will to believe" pretty thoroughly developed in order to convince oneself that this is not precisely the object of Mr. Foster in his half-hearted recantation under pressure by the Senate Committee. It is inconceivable that the employees of the Steel Corporation, acting of their own volition and desiring to present legitimate and reasonable requests to its executive head, would have handicapped themselves by selecting any such discreditable agitator to represent them.

A Moment's Halt

NONE too often, in these days, amid the desert of statistics, the hot and blinding simoons of propaganda, one stumbles upon a literary oasis. Such oases are, of course, plentiful enough in the literature of the past, but the resort to them may be troubled by a sense that the refreshment they offer is the refreshment of escape—a suspicion, probably unfounded, that the serenity they exhibit arises from the contemplation of a set of facts quite different from those of to-day. When, therefore, someone appears who envisages life as we ourselves are living it, and who can yet find things in it that merit a serene and gracious report, he is one to be welcomed.

Such a man will probably not express himself in verse, nor yet in novel or drama; he will be an essayist. The essayist is by definition a wise man; with no claim to wisdom he has none on our attention. The greatest of them—Seneca, Montaigne, Bacon, Addison, Emerson—unshamedly trade in it. Lamb and Stevenson radiate it less directly, but, to the taste of many, not less effectively. Wise and witty—etymologically the two are the same—the essayist is, largely because he does not expect too much of life. He digs for the rare and recompensing gold, not for the obvious and abundant dirt. His assay—or essay, it is all one—not only refines the gold, it defines and puts in its place the dross. Ignoring the facts of life is one way of putting it; another is to regard it as judicious and necessary selection, true elimination.

Take the matter of chimney pots. Mr. Charles S. Brooks has written an essay on them, one of the many subjects touched upon with sanity and grace in his "Chimney-Pot Papers." One might gaze out upon chimney pots and curse them for a sham—our American chimney pots are frequently just that. Or one's thought might picture

Crouched in the dripping dark,
The man who hews the coal to build my fire, with what statistical or revolutionary result we know. Or finally, and this is what Mr. Brooks does, one might peer among the chimney pots for glimpses of a varied human life on roofs and in upper windows, of which the chimney pots themselves are but fantastically aspiring symbols. The contrasting points of view appear in the essay entitled, "On Turning into Forty":

A few days since I happened to dine at one of the Purple Pups of our Greenwich Village. At my table, which was slashed with yellow and blue in the fashion of these places, sat a youth of seventeen who engaged me in conversation. . . . He flared with youth. Strange gases and opinions burned in his speech. . . . I was poking at my dumpling when he asked me if I were a socialist. No, I replied. Then perhaps I was an anarchist or a Bolshevik, he persisted. N-no, I answered him, sadly and slowly, for I foresaw his scorn. He leaned forward across the table. Begging my pardon for an intrusion in my affairs, he asked me if I were not aware that the world was slipping away from me.

There you have it—lyric youth grown dogmatic, bent of a sudden on bringing the fine translunary things, on which with the poets it is their privilege to dream and eventually to win a place for some of it in the common heart of man, plump down to earth, now, here, complete. Castles won't do any longer—in Spain. Let us get our chimney pots down onto the sidewalk, and our thoroughfares up somewhere adjacent to the Milky Way. Youth must be served. Indeed, the man who, in this Greenwich Village of a world of ours, has really turned into forty—not one who was born forty or had forty thrust upon him, but one who has achieved forty—has achieved something. Sooner or later, the men of forty, the quadragenarians of all ages, will have to learn to assert themselves. A good deal, as the world goes, depends on whether they prove to be few or many. The birth statistics tell us nothing of their number.

"There is," said Carlyle, with eye bent alike on past and present, "a noble conservatism as well as an ignoble." Perhaps forty, better than eighteen or eighty, knows which is which. Forty, at any rate, is not put into a panic at the thought that the world is slipping away from us. Course follows course, but meanwhile, if wisely, you have dined well. The necessity of keeping forever abreast of events was the curse laid on poor old wandering Ahasuerus. Since it must slip, then, in good Chaucerian English, "let it slide." But meanwhile, observe which end you've got hold of it by; so much, eventually, depends on that. The man whom life fobs off with a stone instead of bread is not wholly to be pitied if he can extract his own sermon from it; indeed, his state is more gracious than his who insists on the bread, and bread alone.

If one were in search of proof that all's not wrong with the world, such might appear in the luxury which the world seems able to afford itself by printing Brooks, tricking him out with other-day wood-cuts, and in its willingness to divide some of its attention between him and an early autumn fire at lamp-lighting time. You could do as well yourself? No one doubts it. The materials lie all about you. Sit down to it at once, dip your pen, and smile a continuous, mouth-twisting smile as the bright humors distil from the nib of it. Tell us of laying your course for a journey afoot by no other whim than the avoidance of literary shrines; tell us of the satisfactions that come from carrying a book in your pocket which you never open; speculate for us on why it is men choose the vocations they do, and then speak a just word in praise of carpenters; make us feel Christmas once again: tell us the difference between wit and humor (you will hardly do better than this, though: "A humorous man has the high gift of regarding an annoyance in the very stroke of it as another man shall regard it when the annoyance is long past. If a humorous person falls out of a canoe he knows the exquisite jest while his head is still bobbing in the cold water. A witty man, on the contrary, is sour until he is changed and dry; but in a week's time when company is about, he will make a comic story of it"). Do these things, and the world will rise from the reading of you with a heart refreshed for (how meaningless are words!) the "real business of life."

As To Deporting Undesirables

I hear a lion in the lobby roar!
Say, Mr. Speaker, shall we close the door
And keep him out? Or shall we let him in—
Then do our best to put him out again?

THE judicious reader will observe that the question propounded above is momentous and of wide application. It is not at all a question to be decided hastily without due and careful consideration. Rash persons, who easily give way to their impulses, would be likely to say:

"Of course exclude the lion, he has no business in the lobby, and can be there for no good purpose."

But the discreet would pause at least long enough to inquire:

"How did the lion get into the lobby? What does he seek there? What are his intentions? If he merely desires to eat a few superfluous members of Parliament, could we consider that an injury? If we exclude him, will he not have the right to complain that we have abridged his freedom?"

And, carrying the inquiry further than lions and lobbies, carrying it even so far as this country and its Undesirables—Anarchists, Bolsheviks, I. W. W.'s, etc.—we ask:

"How came they here? Why are they here? What is their purpose here? Shall we exclude them?"

It seems to be settled on good authority that three-fourths of these undesirables are of foreign birth and came here to better their material condition, or else to escape from oppression. Those among them who have been industrious have escaped from oppression and bettered their condition. But that has not contented them. They find this a land of equal opportunity where anyone possessing the requisite ability may prosper. That does not please them. Prosperity there should be, they agree, but only for them. Freedom and rulership, also, there should be—but only for them. They find this country all cluttered up with their enemies the bourgeois—strong, fat, complacent, material-minded citizens—who do not love them when they have revealed themselves.

So their purpose here is to take over the control of this country for themselves and to devour the bourgeois and their possessions. They propose to establish their economic system, the glorious old system which was in vogue among men before money was coined or cities builded. This, too, may well be called the American system, because when the white man landed here he found it practised by the Indians—Communism. Everything belonged to all—there were no capitalists and no rents to pay. True, the warrior owned his wife and children, his weapons, his wigwam, his canoe, his clothing, but that is about as far as private property extended. If he had food and his neighbor none, public opinion obliged him to divide his store. The chiefs were not exempt from this. They led in war and in hunting, but they served rather than commanded their people, and, so far from exploiting them, were bound to set an example of unselfish liberality.

There is a difference, however. The new Communists believe that all things should belong to a class, their own class whom they call "The Workers," though they are only a small fraction of the industrial and agricultural workers of the country. Others are given the same sort of choice as the followers of Mohammed once gave inhabitants of countries they invaded, "Death or the Koran!" To attain their ends all means are lawful—seditions, sabotage, strikes, arson, bombs, destruction of storehouses and crops, riots, rebellions, assassinations. They defy our laws, mock God, deny the sanctity of marriage and the rights of parenthood.

How they got in is easily answered. Our own loose immigration laws, combined with the greed of our own bourgeois, our industrial chiefs, are responsible for that. Our industrial chiefs wanted cheap labor and got it. Cheap and—not nice. Twenty-five years ago labor in the great factories was largely American, well paid and self-respecting, but in twenty years a notable deterioration was observed. The Americans were gradually forced out, giving place to the most ignorant and degraded of the new-come foreigners—one-process men who received $9.00 per week, and with their families existed as best they could on that.

To that extent, at least, we are to blame for our own troubles. The bourgeois are ours—the Undesirables are here at their invitation. In the highways and byways of the world the industrial chiefs sought the cheapest human material, thinking to exploit it. It has turned on them, and they rail at its ignorance and ingratitude. What did they expect?

The camel, seeking refuge from the oppression of the sandstorm, beseeched the Arab to allow him to put his head in the tent and the pious Moslem, remembering the precepts of the Koran, permitted the liberty. Pretty soon he found himself outside the tent and the camel in full possession. Then he, too, complained of ingratitude. But in the eyes of the camel he was bourgeois and therefore to be ousted, if not devoured. Don Quixote, enemy of oppression, delivered the galley slaves, and they stripped him of his modest possessions. To them, he, too, was bourgeois. We have boasted that this our country was the land of freedom and refuge of the oppressed without considering who the oppressed are or what caused their oppression. We have forgotten Plato's advice as to moderation, and also that many of the oppressed need oppression, or at least such restraint as is furnished by well-conducted prisons and lunatic asylums. So we allowed criminals and madmen to make this country their home, we admitted them to equal advantages and opportunities, and it is hardly consistent in us now to complain that they are criminal and mad. Had we been more careful it would have been easy to exclude them. All that was necessary was for us, through our agents, the consuls, to examine intending immigrants before they left their native lands. In the old lands the police have the records of their people, and intending immigrants not likely to make good citizens could have been shut out.

But no, we didn't do that. We preferred to be able to boast of our Freedom, and no doubt Plato would be willing to concede that Freedom is a good thing—in moderation. His master Socrates expressly indicated that it is not wise or right to present a madman with a spear, even though it be his own spear. There may be too much Freedom.

Once ideal Freedom reigned in a part of London. It was called Alsatia, and lay between Fleet Street and the Thames river. Here the police and other like oppressors had no power, and the Bolsheviks, anarchists, and I. W. W.'s lived their own happy lives. It got its name because of its supposed resemblance to the debatable land then lying between France and Germany. All about this London Alsatia lay the territory of the bourgeois, which the Alsations freely raided. The bourgeois didn't like the situation. They could not be made to see that the robber and murderer had a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness according to his own ideas. They petitioned and manifested all through the reigns of Merry Charles and Unfortunate James, and at last in 1697 they had their will. The privileges of London's Alsatia were abolished, the police burst in on the nest of robbers, murderers, and cheats, and Freedom shrieked—at least among certain classes.

Freedom seems about ready to shriek a lot more; this time world-shaking shrieks from the greatest nest of robbers, murderers, and cheats that men have ever seen—Bolshevik Russia. Under the rule of Lenin and Trotsky they have been trying out their theories of government which foreign-born Socialists, anarchists, Bolsheviks, and I. W. W.'s are suggesting to us as a substitute for our own, and they have produced results. Millions of men, women, and children starved and starving, in a land capable of sustaining four times its present population; more than 200,000 men, women, and children massacred for various offenses against Bolshevik ideals (many for the supreme offense of wanting clean shirts); all the industries ruined; most of the industrial and agricultural machinery destroyed; drunkenness restored on a vaster scale than ever; vice propagated in the schools; women degraded; churches destroyed; God mocked, the priests persecuted wherever found; old tortures revived and new ones invented, the country rendered utterly bankrupt. Those are a few of the things that Lenin and Trotsky and their kind have done to Russia.

What are we going to do? Shall we pay attention to those amiable Americans who say concerning the most unpleasant of the Russian happenings, "I don't believe it"? They said the same things concerning the German atrocities, which have long since been proved and acknowledged. Shall we, then, heed these same people now when they say, "The masses of Russia have so long been oppressed, what wonder if they have committed some excesses in their revolution?" Or "The rich ruled a long time, now it is the turn of the poor—that's fair play"?

In accordance with such reasoning the Russians cast Prospero down and set Caliban in his place, and Caliban has ruled—still rules—and has proved himself, as all wise men knew he would, a true child of a witch. There may be persons who, with their eyes open, would prefer the rule of Caliban. If so, they should be at liberty to enjoy it, but at some remote distance where civilization would not be offended by the ruler's "ancient and fish-like smell," and other unpleasant peculiarities.

As to us, we should see to it now that all who hold to the ideas of Caliban and want his rulership should go back where they came from quickly, and that others of their like are most carefully excluded.

And if Freedom shrieks at that, we must stand it as best we can.

SYDNEY REID

The Spirit of Washington's Foreign Policy

IN the confusion of counsels on foreign policy to-day the real meaning of Washington's advice seems to be in danger of distortion. Washington made few allusions in his messages to Congress on foreign policy. He addressed the American people on the subject only once, and that in his farewell address on retiring from the Presidency. He did express himself freely in his correspondence with his friends and political associates. One must look to these letters to catch the spirit of his foreign policy.

The earliest statement was made in a letter to Lafayette, with whom Washington maintained a regular and intimate correspondence. "It seems," he said, "to be our policy to keep in the situation in which nature has placed us, to observe a strict neutrality, and to furnish others with those good things of subsistence, which they may want, and which our fertile land abundantly produces, if circumstances and events will permit us so to do." This was at the time the world was startled by the opening events of the French Revolution. The qualifying clause in the letter makes it plain that the author had in mind no fixed, unalterable rule like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, and that he had expressed little more than a natural aspiration for peace and the pursuit of national well-being. What he had said was based, in the main, upon the legiti-mate needs of the infant republic for a period of peace, but in part upon the view that the European aristocracies represented a system of government distinct from that which America was trying, and that needless entanglements with the European system might endanger the entire American experiment.

Two years passed. The steady democratic march of the French Revolution in this period, and the contagious spread of the movement into Belgium and Holland reduced the distance between the American political system and that of the nations of western Europe. Washington recognized this change and intimated in a letter to the American Minister in Paris the conditions under which it might become desirable to establish closer relations with such nations. He said:

The change of systems, which have so long prevailed in Europe, will undoubtedly affect us in a degree proportioned to our political or commercial connexions with the several nations of it. But I trust we shall never so lose sight of our own interest and happiness as to become unnecessarily a party in their political disputes. . . . A change of systems will open up a new view of things. . . . Should we, under the present state of affairs, form connexions other than we now have with any European powers, much must be considered in effecting them, on the score of our increasing importance as a nation; and, at the same time, should a treaty be formed with a nation, whose circumstances may not at this moment be very bright, much delicacy would be necessary in order to show that no undue advantages were taken on that account. For unless treaties are mutually beneficial to the parties, it is in vain to hope for a continuance of them beyond the moment when the one, which conceives itself overreached, is in a situation to break off the connexion. And I believe it is among nations as with individuals, that the party taking advantage of the distresses of another will lose infinitely more in the opinion of mankind, and in subsequent events, than he will gain by the stroke of the moment.

In short, Washington, who expressed himself freely on governmental questions to his friends, here lays down a rule of procedure which he thinks best in establishing relations with revolutionary governments. The words seem to indicate that his mind was yielding regarding entanglements with Europe, swept from the earlier position by sympathy with the democratic movement. If so, the news which came from Morris in Paris soon checked the drift towards some form of entente of the democracies of the world. As rumors of an impending general European war as an outcome of the French Revolution reached Washington he repeated in his correspondence his earlier ideas on foreign policy. To his friend and aide, of Revolutionary days, General David Humphreys, he wrote: "I trust that we shall have too just a sense of our own interest to originate any cause, that may involve us in it [the impending struggle]. And I ardently wish we may not be forced into it by the conduct of other nations. If we are permitted to improve without interruption the great advantages, which nature and circumstances have placed within our reach, many years will not revolve before we may be ranked, not only among the most respectable, but among the happiest people on this globe." A letter to an English correspondent, the Earl of Buchan, in 1793, brings out an endorsement of the earl's idea of national happiness: "To be little heard of in the great world of politics." Washington here says that it is "the sincere wish of United America to have nothing to do with the political intrigues, or the squabbles of European nations; but, on the contrary, to exchange commodities and live in peace and amity with all the inhabitants of the earth. And this I am persuaded they will do, if rightly it can be done. To administer justice to, and to receive it from, every power with whom they are connected will, I hope, be always found the most prominent feature in the administration of this country."

Events in Europe moved swiftly. The leaders of the French Revolution allowed their movement to be swept into one for territorial aggrandizement and revolutionary propaganda. Step by step France declared war on one after another of the states of the old régime in Europe. By the spring of 1793 a general war had opened which, except for a brief interruption, was to end at Waterloo twenty-two years later. On April 8, 1793, Citizen Genet landed at Charleston to claim American aid. Washington was at Mount Vernon. He made haste to return to Philadelphia, the capital. Ten days after the French Minister's arrival in the United States, Washington sent a circular letter to the members of his Cabinet, summoning them to a meeting at his house, April 19, and submitting for their consideration in advance a series of questions. These centred upon two or three problems. Was the treaty of alliance with France in 1778 still binding? If so, what were the obligations of the United States under it? Should some kind of declaration of neutrality be made to restrain American citizens from participation in the war? Difference of opinion developed in the Cabinet on the first and second problems, and no conclusion was reached on these. All agreed that something should be done to restrain the people from involving the nation in the war. Jefferson, the Secretary of State, whose sympathies with the French Revolutionary movement had been keenly awakened, had scruples against the use of the term neutrality. Responsibility for action rested with Washington. On April 22, he issued a proclamation of neutrality, omitting the offensive word out of respect for the views expressed by Jefferson.

The proclamation of neutrality, apparently the wording of John Jay and Edmund Randolph, Chief Justice and Attorney General respectively, stated the purpose of the United States to "pursue a conduct friendly and impartial towards the belligerent powers," warned its citizens against committing acts of war against any of them, and announced to them that the United States would not protect them from punishment of forfeiture in "carrying to any of them those articles, which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations." This document is one of the important ones in American history. It was the first official statement of what was to become a characteristic feature of American foreign policy. It was Washington's way of extricating the United States from the "labyrinth of European politics," and gaining time for national development. The highest motives of national interest dictated the act; the same kind that a few years earlier led the Continental Congress to make an entangling alliance with France. Washington's declaration of neutrality received the general approval of the commercial elements of the population. It was not popular with the masses, who were infected with the French Revolutionary doctrines, and moved both by memories of gratitude to France and animosity to Great Britain.

The foreign policy adopted in 1793 was Washington's own. Jefferson and Hamilton were, next to him, the most forceful leaders in American politics. The policy did not exactly accord with the views of either. Jefferson said: "My system was to give some satisfactory distinctions to the former [France], of little cost to us, in return for the solid advantages yielded us by them; and to have met the English with some restrictions which might induce them to abate their severities against our commerce." Hamilton thought the treaty with France had come to an end with the passing of Louis XVI, and desired a reconciliation of the English-speaking nations. Jefferson sought the growth of an entente with France; Hamilton with Great Britain. Both saw the interests of America bound up with one or the other of the dominant Powers of western Europe. Contemporaries thought each, like his followers, had need of a tag to indicate that he was for England or for France. Neither, however, wished his national favoritism to draw the United States into the European war. Washington held his course between that of his councilors. They were under the spell of the older forces which drew the United States into the vortex of European politics; his goal was a national character and freedom of action.

This paper is not concerned with the displeasure of the belligerents over Washington's neutral policy, which did not show the compliance they expected from a nation in its swaddling clothes. Nor will it be attempted here to survey the passions it stirred in those in America who from their respective sympathies saw their Government seemingly indifferent in the great struggle of peoples in Europe. Jefferson, whose support of Washington's policy had been only half-hearted, who from his French sympathies had been entangled in Genet's activities, and who was out of sympathy with the Administration on every count, resigned his office to lead the incipient party of democratic and pro-French leanings. Hamilton, on the other hand, as soon as the issue was clearly drawn, threw the weight of his pen to the maintenance of the foreign policy which Washington had announced. A series of papers appeared in the Federalist newspapers during the summer of 1793. After the manner of the time they bore a pen-name, "Pacificus" in this case, but one which deceived no one. These papers were followed by another series over the name of "No Jacobin," and by another in the winter of 1794 over the signature of "Americus." Hamilton undertook to explain the Constitutional system of handling foreign matters, the responsibility of Washington under this, and to justify the proclamation of neutrality. It was evidently his purpose by the later papers to stem the tide of feeling in favor of France and against Great Britain. "Americus" essayed the question whether the cause of France was truly the cause of liberty. Madison, largely through the influence of Jefferson, entered the lists in a series of papers signed "Helvidius," and denounced neutrality, Hamilton, and all his works. The air did not entirely clear until the era closed with St. Helena.

While the tempest raged throughout America, Washington's letter to James Monroe, who had succeeded Gouverneur Morris in Paris, was the occasion of restating his foreign policy, of expressing his attitude towards the French alliance, and of making a fuller explanation than hitherto of the underlying causes of his particular policy. In one sentence the modern doctrine of "the rights of nations great and small . . . to choose their way of life" was foreshadowed. What Washington said was:

I have always wished well to the French Revolution; that I have always given it as my decided opinion, that no nation had a right to intermeddle in the internal concerns of another; that every one had a right to form and adopt whatever government they like best to live under themselves; and that, if this country could, consistently with its engagements, maintain a strict neutrality, and thereby preserve peace, it was bound to do so by motives of policy, interest, and every other consideration, that ought to actuate a people situated and circumstanced as we are, already deep in debt, and in a convalescent state from the struggle we have been engaged in ourselves.

Washington rather more happily phrased his purpose in a letter to Patrick Henry. Edmund Randolph, the second Secretary of State, had just retired. Washington sought to persuade Patrick Henry to accept the post, though without success. He fittingly explained to Henry the foreign policy which it would be his duty to uphold. "My ardent desire is and my aim," he said, "has been (as far as depended upon the executive department) to comply strictly with all our engagements, foreign and domestic; but to keep the United States free from political connexions with every other country, to see them independent of all and under the influence of none. In a word, I want an American character, that the powers of Europe may be convinced we act for ourselves, and not for others." To Gouverneur Morris Washington wrote: "Nothing short of self-respect, and that justice which is essential to a national character, ought to involve us in war; for sure I am, if this country is preserved in tranquillity twenty years longer, it may bid defiance in a just cause to any power whatever; such in that time will be its population, wealth, and resources."

Washington's letters to the end reveal the struggle he was waging. In one inviting Charles C. Pinckney to become Minister to France, Washington said: "It is a fact too notorious to be denied, that the greatest embarrassments, under which the administration of this Government labors, proceed from the counteraction of people among ourselves, who are more disposed to promote their own views of another nation, than to establish a national character of their own; and that, unless the virtuous and independent men of this country will come forward, it is not difficult to predict the consequences. Such is my decided opinion." The path which Washington had marked out for the Presidency was expressed in a letter to Timothy Pickering: "The executive has a plain road to pursue, namely, to fulfil all the engagements which his duty requires; be influenced beyond this by none of the contending parties; maintain a strict neutrality, unless obliged by imperious circumstances to depart from it; do justice to all, and never forget that we are Americans, the remembrance of which will convince us that we ought not to be French and English." And yet Washington fully comprehended the difficulties in the way of a policy of isolation even at that period. To David Humphreys he wrote: "Nothing short of general peace in Europe will produce tranquillity, for reasons which are obvious to every well informed observant man among us."

Washington's views were carefully, one would say, maturely, stated in his Farewell Address at the end of his public life. This was a state paper he had had under consideration since 1792. Its appearance was timed so as to give the electors knowledge of his own determination to withdraw to private life, and the benefit of his experience. The arrangement and the language of the Farewell Address were very largely the work of Alexander Hamilton, but the ideas were Washington's own. The portions which dealt with foreign relations were on the whole a summary of a foreign policy already expressed in private letters and earlier state papers. There was little in it that was really new. It was Washington's way of propagating a doctrine which he had already found means of expressing. It counselled, as Washington had repeatedly done in messages to Congress, preparation for war as a wise expenditure of money. It proposed "good faith and justice towards all nations" as the watchwords of national policy. The paragraphs which followed expressed fear of foreign intermeddling in the affairs of the United States, lest the Republic might become a satellite of some other power. To escape from these dangers and to realize these high ideals had caused Washington to labor to create an American consciousness of an American national character. The rest of the document is in harmony with these ideas. There is a warning against inveterate distrust of particular nations and passionate attachments for others, as also against permanent alliances with any particular nation. The advantage of geographical isolation is again stressed. Several paragraphs near the end form a defense of neutrality during the war in Europe. The course that had been pursued was identified with national interests. "A predominant motive," Washington stated in conclusion, "has been to endeavour to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency, which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortune."

The Presidency of Washington was a formative period, though one in which the powers of government had to contend with bitter opposition and stinging abuse. There were times when Washington had occasion to fear that anarchy and confusion might overwhelm America. However, in eight years of labor, difficult as any he had to perform in a long public life, he had created a well-defined foreign policy, and more important still, had held the nation to the course prescribed. Its dominant note was its "American character." It was an American foreign policy, for Americans and by Americans. It was considerate of the rights and interests of others, but conscious first of American interests. It looked out upon an old world of kings, princes, and aristocracies; it assumed, what Europe would not have gainsaid nor envied, that America was a great experiment in democracy. Extraction from dependence on the foreign policy of another nation cleared the ground for the experiment; isolation insured it a fair chance. One must not conceive of Washington as casting a long look into the future and setting up an ideal for future generations to carry out; his policy was fitted, if ever one was, and as ever one should be, to the needs of the hour.

ELBERT J. BENTON

Courts Martial

THE experience of our citizen army with the courts martial as organized and administered by the Regular service has produced considerable criticism, in which defenders of the system have been rather few. The Judge Advocate General's Department, in particular, has harvested a crop of enthusiasts who have made various suggestions and adduced some cases of obvious miscarriage of justice, but their proposals for the improvement of the fundamentals of procedure have, for the most part, been so far removed from the actualities of the problem as not to impress most line officers as practicable. The Judge Advocate General's Department sits as a kind of court of final review, in certain cases, to make sure, from reading the printed record of the trial, that the formal requirements have been complied with. During the war, it was largely made up of lawyers taken from civil life, who had a most rudimentary idea of the problems confronting a line officer in the maintenance of discipline and the attainment of efficiency in his unit; and inevitably the conclusions based on theory differ from those which are the fruit of experience in the field.

The closet theorist, especially if he be a member of Congress, is rather skeptical about the outward and visible forms of discipline. He likes to start with the hypothesis that soldiers are the "equals" of their officers in the American army; but right there he begins to confuse the subject. "Equal" means nothing definite until it is indicated in what respect the equality exists. In physical strength, or character, or general education many men may be the superiors of their officers; but the relevancy of this fact is not apparent in a discussion of discipline or courts martial.

That the officer and enlisted man should be equal before the law, however, is quite right in theory—though in practice the responsibility placed upon officers makes it impossible to condone many an offense which may be overlooked in the case of a soldier. During the war I was Judge Advocate of General Courts which tried both officers and men; I sat on Special Courts; I acted as Regimental Summary Court Officer, myself, for some months; and I never saw a man get an unfair trial nor one convicted when he was innocent. But I have seen men convicted when the conclusion of the court was absolutely impossible, without disregarding the rules of evidence; and I have seen an irate old colonel all but behead a lieutenant for suggesting that the verdict of the court was, as a matter of law, unsupported by the evidence. The impressive point in connection with my observation of the workings of courts martial was that I invariably found that the courts were trying to do justice without the professional lawyer's reverential regard for the formalities of the rules of law. In this they are quite the opposite of the civil courts, which try to decide cases before them by the consistent application of certain rules of law with only an indirect regard for the accomplishing of absolute justice in the particular case at bar. It is the essential requirement of consistency that has led to the old saying in civil courts that "hard cases make bad law": meaning that the attempt to temper the general rule to a case where it will not work for justice leads to unfortunate precedents which may afterwards cause confusion and uncertainty in the relations of men. This possibility does not worry the courts martial in the least. They never hesitate to modify the usual rule to include or exclude a particular case in the interest of justice, with the result that it is practically impossible to clog the procedure with objections or astonishing defenses based on technicalities, and, in the absence of a court of appeals, it is not worth while to follow that time-devouring custom of the professional lawyers called "making a record for the appeal."

It is evident, however, that this horse-sense method of trial produces records which will not always meet the pragmatic requirements of the lawyers in the Judge Advocate's Department. This does not mean that the trials were unfair. It simply means that summary disposition was made of certain technical defenses or objections which did not go to the merits of the case, or that the court's interest in the substance led to a disregard of the required formalism. It very rarely means that material evidence as to which there could be any doubt was dispensed with, but many a soldier has been convicted over a jurisdictional objection which was never properly threshed out by the court. Mitigating circumstances are often considered in the verdict instead of the sentence, and a deserter, for instance, is convicted of absence without leave and given a heavy sentence for that offense—a practical, though illogical, solution much in favor with juries in the civil courts also.

The question of heavy sentences is a knotty one, and has received more advertisement than almost any other phase of the matter. No reviewer of a trial has anything like the opportunity to observe the demeanor and attitude of the defendant that the trial court has. For this reason appellate courts in civil life have always been loath to pass on the credibility of witnesses or modify or reverse rulings dependent on what happened in the court room during the trial. Sentences depend considerably on the impression the prisoner and witnesses make on the trial court, and the lawyers in the Judge Advocate General's Department are somewhat reckless often when they decide that a particular sentence is extreme. Six months for absence without leave may be a severe sentence; but if it is really a punishment for desertion, which the court was convinced of but did not care to find officially, then to the lay eye it may be pretty lenient.

It is with a layman's eye that the trial court always looks at the trial. This is inevitable in a service where lawyers are not present in sufficient numbers among the officers to exert a controlling influence. Perhaps, for the purpose of substantial justice and the dispatch of business, that is just as well. A military Thaw trial would do as much harm to the army as the mutiny of a division.

Some serious cases obviously arise by reason of the lack of force of character or judgment on the part of an officer. About one officer in ten, and the ratio is the same whether he is a graduate from West Point or drafted from civil life, is a lame duck, and has to be carried along by the prestige of rank. Only too often these unfortunates do not realize they are officers only in name, but the men always know it and take advantage of it. The situation can go on for a long time, but sooner or later there is almost sure to be a blow-up, and the Commanding Officer will direct the lame duck to bring charges against the man. The resulting exposure of the supposed state of discipline in that unit is bad for everyone concerned. The publicists seize on it as a true picture of the condition of the army as a whole, and the usual crop of general conclusions are drawn from the particular instance. For the men and officers of the unit concerned it is a humiliating experience; but for the sake of discipline it has to be gone through with. The enlisted personnel would lose confidence in their officers if the challenge were not taken up promptly and vigorously.

As it is, there is a good deal of breathless interest in what the "old man" is going to do about it, and considerable private betting as to just exactly what was said to the officer who precipitated the mess. Even the culprit in the Guard House is probably grinning secretly at the remembrance of his crime, and cheerfully hoping that the Commanding Officer has temporarily lost some of his pristine carnivorousness of which the regiment brags so much to less favored units with ordinary human beings for Colonels. These family affairs are hushed up and settled in the regiment whenever possible—and usually followed by the transfer of the officer with the weak chin to a staff position where he will not come in contact with the men; but if the offense is serious it will have to be referred to a General Court, and no Commanding Officer worthy of the name would hesitate to call for a General Court merely to save his organization the attendant publicity.

The recourse to the General Court, which means a court with power to give more than six months imprisonment or loss of pay, is really very rare in a well-disciplined regiment. In the two years I was in service I remember only two men from my regiment who were tried by a General Court, and both of them had criminal records in civil life. What is known as "company punishment" is usually quite sufficient for dealing with ordinary lapses from grace. This usually consists in requiring the man to do certain fatigue work beyond what would ordinarily fall to his share, and does not involve a trial or the entering of any notation on the service record of the man. In wise hands it is an instrument of the greatest efficacy, and is supported by the public opinion of the soldiers as a whole.

It must not be forgotten that when a man enlists in the army he gives his life for the time being to his country. The nation can not accept men with reservations or on part time. He becomes a soldier all the twenty-four hours each day, and in this respect he differs radically from the factory worker, for instance, who is merely selling the product of his hands for certain hours, and may quit any time he pleases. The factory worker also retains a great deal of responsibility for himself. His health is his own business, and he takes care of it or not as he pleases. The soldier, on the other hand, is not entirely responsible for his health. He is not trusted very far with it. He is examined every little while to satisfy some surgeon that he is still fit. Accordingly, he takes no more interest in his health than does a small child. A man in uniform will do silly things that the same man in civilian clothes would never think of doing. It is also the experience of centuries, reinforced by observations in this last war, that men in uniform fight better than men in mufti; that men shaven, neat, and clean fight much better than dirty men; that men with a pride in their organization and confidence in their officers can fight all round men lacking these advantages.

Without making an exhaustive study of morale, it is evident that the little details of private daily life become of great importance if the army is to be kept at a high degree of efficiency, and that such a thing as being dirty or unkempt becomes an offense which must be noticed by those responsible for the fighting capacity of the unit. Hence the constant inspections and punishments for failure to conform to the standards, of which there is so much complaint by the closet theorists. But the court martial is not all the time hanging over the head of the soldier, nor is it recognized by officers as an ordinary aid to discipline. The trial of a man is practically an admission by the officer in charge of him that the man for the time being has got out of control, and that is, of course, always an unwilling admission.

The outstanding feature of courts martial is that they accomplish their purpose remarkably well. To introduce a jury of enlisted men, as has been suggested, would add about five hundred per cent. to the amount of time a trial would consume, and would not increase the confidence of the accused in the fairness of the trial one iota. I have been tried as an enlisted man, and I have had charges preferred against me as an officer, so I really have a good idea of the feelings of a defendant. It might improve the looks of the records to have a lawyer handy to make sure that all the technical requirements had been complied with, but he would probably slow up the wheels of justice without accomplishing much. The fact remains that justice is done, and if there are mistakes they are the mistakes of amateur judges and not the calculated omissions of professional advocates.

After all, the whole question of discipline depends on the atmosphere of a regiment, and that is a thing which can not be traced to one or two concrete sources, but rests on the personality of the officers. The recipe is not found in any book, nor the result arrived at by following too closely the methods of someone else. If the officers have sufficient force of character, there will be no reasonable complaints about the conduct or sentences of the courts martial.

GEORGE W. MARTIN

Correspondence

The Principle of the Closed Shop

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The question of the "closed shop" is to-day occupying so much attention that I venture to refer to a phase of it which does not seem to me to be generally understood.

The principle which underlies it has appeared in commerce, industry, science, politics, society, and organized religion from the dawn of civilization and has, I think, invariably resulted in the moral deterioration of those who have victoriously employed it.

We call this principle by all sorts of names—monopoly, closed shop, old school, autocracy, the machine, orthodoxy, conventionality, etc.—but its objective is identical in every field of activity and it invariably means the subordination of the many to the few and the measurable demoralization of the latter.

In industry it is known as "closed shop" and its intention is the reservation to a limited number of the opportunities of employment. It creates an artificial stability to tenure of position which begets indifference and carelessness among those who are protected in employment by it. It is enforced in the building trades in New York and has meant the arbitrary exclusion from apprenticeship of many an ambitious young American. Every spring before the war many European tradesmen came to this country equipped with International Union cards, which admitted them at once to employment, and then returned to their homes in the autumn taking with them a considerable share of the compensation that might well have gone to Americans, the exclusion of whom from trade employment made room for the aliens. Practically all the unions restrict the master workmen to a limited number of apprentices and compel those apprentices to pass five years in learning a trade which may readily be acquired in half of that time. The unions, moreover, charge an initiation fee sufficiently large to be measurably prohibitive to applicants for journeyman cards.

The "closed shop" is responsible for the long-continued opposition of the unions to trade education in this country. This opposition has only been relaxed in recent years, and even now concurrence in popular demand applies solely to such education in public schools. All private trade teaching is strenuously opposed by the unions. The examination of journeymen applicants for Civil Service positions in New York City has a peculiar significance in relation to this subject. While the qualifications of these would-be public servants are doubtless below the standard of New York tradesmanship, yet many of these are union men whose incapacity is largely protected by the "closed shop." I submit the following table of results of the examinations for the years 1914, 1916, and 1918 in the principal trades:

Year	Trade	Passed	Failed
1914	Steam Fitter	29	43
	Plumber	20	26
	Electrical Wireman..	25	42
	Varnisher	14	14
	Bricklayer	16	28
	Carpenter	43	41
1916	House Painter	33	27
	Varnisher	7	16
	Electrical Wireman..	6	16
	Bricklayer	12	15
	Plumber	17	32
1918	House Painter.....	36	10
	Bricklayer	6	18
	Electrical Wireman..	8	24
	Gas Fitter	21	47
	Plumber	12	22
	Steam Fitter	7	11
	House Painter	52	29
	Plasterer	6	0

These examination tests are designedly easy—they have been adapted to the capacity of the applicants and failure to meet them reveals a low measure of proficiency. Nevertheless, the unionists among these rejected incompetents are not actually of the elect of the industrial army in New York. One must admit that the tendency to superimpose "closed shop" upon civilization springs primarily from the instinct of self-preservation, whence, however, it inevitably gravitates to pure selfishness. It is a misuse of the advantages of organized coöperation, and its vice is in the effort to transform that principle into an agency of oppression. We may well sympathize with the attitude of the older tradesman who sees in the extension of the principles of trade training to youth a menace to the permanence of his employment, and who therefore seeks by the "closed shop" expedient to protect himself by restricting the number of those permitted to practice the trade. His real defence against this danger lies in the knowledge and proficiency gained by experience and the reputation for honest and efficient work which he has earned by years of faithful toil. Society cannot permit him to shackle the justifiable aspirations of American youth.

We are forever struggling to combat the "closed shop" tendency, and our Sherman acts, open primaries, open shop, publicity, and modernism are all crude endeavors to resist its encroachments. Unscientific and even damaging as some of these expedients are, they are better than a nerveless acquiescence in the tyranny of this principle.

Nowhere, perhaps, has it done greater injury than in the church. Time and time again the rigid exclusion of the non-conformist has made it necessary for the reformer to break open the organization, but he has no sooner won the victory than he becomes himself the captive of his former antagonist. The Puritan escapes from the closed shop of the Anglican establishment, only to establish in the new world an equally rigid counterpart of that from which he has fled. The more completely does this principle succeed, the more pronounced becomes the evidence of dry-rot.

I do not think I am wrong in discerning in this principle one which inevitably makes for the moral and mental decadence of those who practice it, and I sincerely believe that for their own sake the unions should be prevented from enforcing it. It discourages proficiency, begets tyranny, fosters hatred, and swells the ranks of unskilled labor. It is not necessary to the policy of trades unionism and really misrepresents its true ideals. The unions are too valuable to be ruined by this fatal tendency, and if they can be made to appreciate the danger of compelling industry to adopt it, they have a great future before them. Let us have 'open shop' and an honest one. There are employees who interpret that term to mean "non-union," and they must be watched to see that they do not discriminate against the unionist.

R. FULTON CUTTING

New York, October 1

As it Looks in Omsk

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Perhaps your readers would be interested in some account of conditions at Omsk, where I arrived about two weeks ago. The journey from Vladivostok to Omsk is a trying one. First of all, it is most difficult to get a berth, as there are lots of people wanting to go and only two so-called "express" trains per week. Besides, most of the places are commandeered by the Government for people traveling in some military or official capacity. I managed to get a place through the Naval Department, but we were four men in a small stateroom or cabin. During the journey the heat was intense, no possibility most of the time to open the windows because of the dust and smoke, very little water for washing and a restaurant car where one could get only poor food and tepid drinks—no ice to be had—at exorbitant prices. I would like you to try and realize what one feels after nine days of journey under such conditions. I forgot to say that one is comforted on the way by the sight of railroad trucks lying by the line topsyturvy—the results of Bolshevistic activities, when the line is not sufficiently guarded.

By the time this letter reaches you, if it ever does, the situation here will have altered again. If the reverses on the front continue, as they do now, and more territory is lost to the Bolsheviki army, Omsk will have to be evacuated and nobody knows what this may signify. It is not impossible that the All-Russian Government, whose headquarters are in Omsk, will fall, as it will no longer be able to unite the people of Siberia—about 40 millions—and those parts of European Russia where fighting against Bolsheviki is taking place. It will be very sad if after over a year of existence and hard work, this Government is swept away because the Allies did not see their way to recognizing it in due time and giving it such material and economic assistance as it deserved. It will be very difficult if not impossible, for some time to come, to constitute anywhere else a new All-Russian Government, and the Russian problem will again remain open.

I believe that the Bolsheviki realize that it is not possible for them to hold out any longer in European Russia.

On the one hand, after two years Bolshevism has burnt itself out in European Russia and people have no more use for it; on the other hand, the pressure of General Denikin in the south is making things so difficult for them that the Bolsheviki seem to be trying to break through to Siberia.

They will certainly not find many elements here in sympathy with them, though Siberia does not fully realize what Bolshevism means. It is believed that they are making their way to China, where they have serious chances of succeeding in stirring up a lot of trouble for many years to come. Bolshevism in Korea and China (and maybe India) means more trouble for the whole world than one can realize at first.

Mr. Morris, U. S. Ambassador to Japan, arrived here a few days ago, and I understand that he has come here to give Washington a detailed report on the situation and the best means of assisting the Omsk Government in its struggle. All the Allied representatives are speaking about the help that is coming, but as the people here have heard about this help for a year, and practically nothing has been done, they no longer believe in it and the feeling against all the Allies is rather bitter.

Again and again it should be said that it is not military help that is wanted, but economical and financial help. By refusing to recognize the Omsk Government and forbidding abroad all transactions in rubles, the Allies have depreciated the ruble exactly 50 times. Today a friend of mine sold here $1,000 for 100,000 rubles. Under normal conditions $1,000 would be the equivalent of 2,000 rubles. Under conditions as they are the Government and people are unable to purchase abroad all that is so badly wanted here. As Siberia produces only raw materials, everything is necessary: clothing for those alive and fighting, hardware and machines for producing foodstuffs, medicines for the sick and wounded. The mortality is very great and the wounded have to endure terrible privations, but when the autumn and winter come no one knows what is going to happen.

How the Allies expect the Omsk Government to consolidate its position and carry on with the war against the Bolsheviki under such conditions does not seem very clear, and what is the good of the "League of Nations" if the civilized world is willing to close its eyes on this war, in comparison to which all the horrors committed by the Germans in Belgium and France are nothing but childish play!

There is a strong military party in favor of political and military alliance with Japan, which is supposed to be willing to help the Omsk Government by all the means it has in the fight against Bolshevism, but is prevented from doing so by the other Allies. This anti-Allied feeling, if not stopped in time, may become very dangerous and can bring a new orientation of Russian foreign politics, i.e., a tendency to get to an understanding with Germany and Japan. In a few years this would bring the whole world to a state of affairs similar to that of 1914, or even worse.

Like everyone else who has visited this country I am simply overcome by its possibilities of development and the wonderful resources one comes across all the time. Omsk itself is really nothing but a small provincial town, with a normal population of 150,000, which has unexpectedly grown during the last year to 500,000. Everything is overcrowded—no possibility of finding living quarters, Governmental offices located in shops and stores, and many people living in dugouts in town.

Among the different officials and members of the Cabinet I found quite a few friends. What is certainly one of the characteristics of the Omsk Government is its youth. Admiral Kolchak, the "Supreme Ruler," is about 45, the Ministers average 30, some of them being young men of 27 or 28, and if they lack experience they have a lot of determination to see the matter through.

ALEX. A. NELIDOV

Omsk, Siberia, August 8

Becky Sharp's Missile

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your slight mistake in recalling the incident of the departure of Becky Sharp from Miss Pinkerton's School weakens your comparison with the act of the present German Government providing that students leaving German schools shall be given a copy of the new Constitution.

It was not a copy of the Bible that Becky flung back into the garden, but of Johnson's Dictionary. Doubtless she might have treated the Bible no better, but in fact she was not given the chance.

Not religion, therefore, but the elements of common sense and the opportunity to learn the fundamentals of Democracy are what we may expect German students to reject with disdain. They may have reason for this in their contempt for those pretending thus to teach them; but, judging from our knowledge of German character, sufficient reason may be found in the scornful attitude of the students themselves. Germans have long since shown that they are too proud to learn from anybody. They have no more use for a constitution than Becky Sharp had for a Dictionary.

THOMAS H. LEWIS.

Westminster, Md., October 6.

Book Reviews

Alfred Noyes, James Oppenheim, and Others

- THE NEW MORNING. By Alfred Noyes. New York: Frederick A. Stokes.
 POEMS. By Theodore Maynard. New York: Frederick A. Stokes.
 POEMS. By Iris Tree. New York: John Lane Company.
 THE SOLITARY. By James Oppenheim. New York: B. W. Huebsch.
 BANNERS. By Babette Deutsch. New York: George H. Doran Company.
 HAUNTS AND BY-PATHS. By J. Thorne Smith. New York: Frederick A. Stokes.
 MERCHANTS OF THE MORNING. By Samuel McCoy. New York: George H. Doran Company.
 A WORLD OF WINDOWS. By Charles Hanson Towne. New York: George H. Doran Company.
 THEODORE ROOSEVELT: A Verse Sequence in Sonnets and Quatorzains. By Russell Wilbur. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

ALFRED NOYES is the possessor of two things—convictions and tunes. The natural accompaniment of convictions, in a thinker, is ideas; the natural accompaniment of tunes, in a poet, is words. Now, while it would be calumnious to assert that Mr. Noyes is defective, or even deficient, in ideas or in diction, it must be conceded that his strength in neither point is notable. The trouble with mere convictions, with mere tunes, is that you reach the end of both so speedily. That is largely the trouble with the lithe and blithe, the eager and meager, gift of Mr. Noyes. A great poet he is not, though he is an appreciably better poet than critics imagine in those untoward moments when his laxities encounter their cynicisms.

Mr. Noyes loves America. The expression of that feeling in the present volume is not markedly original; the originality lies in the feeling itself. Mr. Noyes is possibly the old-school, traditional Englishman, yet he is probably the first Englishman, unless Pitt or Burke might be excepted, whose eyes have either brightened or dimmed at the thought of America. A few of these poems, the "Avenue of the Allies," "Republic and Motherland," the "Union," have an international significance that surpasses, and replaces, mere literary value.

Flag of the sky, proud flag of that wide communion,

Too mighty for thought to scan;
 Flag of the many in one and that last world-union

That kingdom of God in man;
 Ours was a dream in the night of that last federation,

But yours is the glory unfurled—
 The marshalled nations and hosts that shall make one nation
 One singing star of the world.

There are also military and maritime ballads, legendary pieces, parables, ethical poems still happy in the assurance

That truth and beauty have a friend
 At the deep heart of things.

Somewhat more distinctive is the assault on innovation in which diatribe alternates with burlesque. Mr. Noyes's feeling towards the modernists is expressible in the words of Mary Magdalen: "They have taken away the Lord . . . and we know not where they have laid him." There is much that is sound in Mr. Noyes's affection for the sanities and disciplines of the past, but I think that he hardly realizes the extent to which tactics are necessary as the ally of valor in the contest with what is irrational or subversive in the present. It is easy to say to humanity: "Turn round." But humanity will not turn round. Even if it goes back it will not turn round. General Grant, in his autobiography, illustrates his pertinacity by the fact that if, in walking, he found himself on the wrong road, he would go forward, until, by striking into a cross-route, he could reverse his direction without retracing his steps. The world is like General Grant; it will return only by a détour which will beguile it with the illusion of advance. In an age when conservatism is fashionable, the radical strategy is to make the new appear old; in an age, when radicalism is popular, the conservative strategy is to make the old appear new. Mr. Noyes is too frank about the antiquity of his gospel; he puts part of it explicitly into the mouth of a grandfather. Now the world of to-day, rightly or wrongly, can not take its truth from grandfathers. It would be better for Mr. Noyes to uphold virtue and sanity simply as virtue and sanity, and not to emphasize the single aspect of those cults which is abnormally distasteful to his contemporaries.

Mr. Theodore Maynard has ability. Whether he has ability enough to serve him in a world in which the price of fame tends to rise with that of other commodities is a perplexing question. He is religious; further, he is Catholic; further yet, he is scriptural and sacramental. With all this he is a lover and praiser of laughter. The reader who permits himself to be surprised at this combination will have his surprise lessened by the discovery that Mr. Chesterton is the author of the preface. Mr. Maynard, though pietist, is not ascetic. Half the time when he is not praising Christ he is praising drink, and we could in a sort epitomize his philosophy by quoting the refrain of a ballade: "I drain a mighty tankard to the Pope." There is in his work a mixture of the lusty and the picturesque, of the cordial and the prismatic, which should have done much for him. That it has done something, the first stanza of a "Song of Colours" may suffice to demonstrate:

Gold for the crown of Mary,
 Blue for the sea and sky,
 Green for the woods and meadows
 Where small white daisies lie,
 And red for the colour of Christ's blood
 When he came to the Cross to die.

Miss Iris Tree is the daughter of Sir Herbert Tree; the affiliation, the filiation, to art in such a parentage was clear, and her name was a commission to write verse. Her work is clever and individual, or, more strictly perhaps, it aspires to individuality, for the likenesses among the people whose ideal is difference rank high among the biting ironies of life. Vultures and leopards hunt alone; pigeons fly, and sheep graze, in multitudes; yet no naturalist to my knowledge has ever told us that the difference between two vultures or two leopards is wider than the difference between two specimens of either of the gregarious types. The ingredients in human nature are so few. Miss Tree is a daring phrase-maker with the occasional rewards and constant penalties of daring. She can fashion, in her own words, "delirious verses, tortured statues, spasms of paint;" or she can apostrophize London in resonant and plangent verse:

And all my hopes thy lamps that flick and glare,

And all my griefs thy beggars in the rain.
 The insurgencies of her early poems are modified in her maturing verse. They were doubtless the kind of insurgencies which find their antidote in recurrent birthdays, their turbulence being that of an equinoctial storm seasonal rather than regional or climatic. There is a fatal periodicity in these things; the sower of wild oats comes finally to the point when he breakfasts on oatmeal.

Without ranking the "Solitary" as great poetry, or even as good poetry if taken in mass, I prefer it to the former work of Mr. Oppenheim. It has fewer things that chafe me, many more things that please me mildly, and one or two things or fragments of things to which my response is instantaneous and cordial. Mr. Oppenheim's weakness lies, not in the content, but in the method, of his didacticism. The vast circumference of things surveyed from an intensely individual centre through symbols which assume the connective office of radii; ideas cosmic, sincere, vaguely elevated and dimly hopeful, rarely original, never finally and sharply embodied; these constitute his point of view and his material. The ideas in the mystical "Sea" are so far from shocking or destructive that I should describe them as a sort of Christianity with psychology substituted for theology. The trouble lies in the relation of the artist to the teacher. The theorist is always getting between my feelings and Mr. Oppenheim; the poet gets between him and my intelligence. Reason is good, and feeling is good; but their mixture, if not masterly, is provoking. In the same fashion earth is good to walk on, and water is good to swim in; but there is a mixture of earth and water known as marsh in which neither walker nor swimmer can make progress. What Mr. Oppenheim's philosophy needs is drainage—clearing, drying, solidifying; what it gets is irrigation.

Mr. Oppenheim writes before the process of composition is complete. The work is full of arrests and starts, parentheses, italics, dots, interruptions, repetitions, subjects without verbs. Poetry may be as continuous and steady as prose for the same reason that flight may be as unbroken and regular as walking; the one thing needed is sufficient wing-power. Mr. Oppenheim's wing-power is inadequate; he can not be consistent or progressive; he must veer, plunge, diverge, lest his inspiration flag. The defect of imagination betrays itself in the mutability of his figures. In three lines on page 33, the sky is successively a gulf, a pocket, a dome, and a cobweb—proof not that the sky has been all these things to Mr. Oppenheim, but that it has been none of them.

There are better moments when the imagination is not restless, but active. A phrase like "music in which lost armies sang requiems" shames its context for pages forward and back; as Browning said in his "Memorabilia," "a hand's-breadth of it shines alone mid the blank miles roundabout." Sometimes the inspiration is not cupped in a phrase. "Europa" begins nobly (I quote with unmarked omissions):

Europa

The dark years, the dreadful years are upon me . . .

The Voice of Egypt

Whither goest thou, Europa, whither goest thou, dusty and grown aged and withering at the breasts?

Thou hast not crouched in the desert, mounting the sand-storm, Remembering the Ptolemies.

Europa

But the dark years, and the days of bleak old age are upon me . . .

Once my rosy nipples were lipped by nations and a great people drank of them . . .

The Voice of Persia

What hag is this, that against the black rifts of the storm, and blown by the tempest

Stalks crazily mumbling? Is it thou, Europa?

Thou hast not seen great Babylon fallen, gone down with Marduk,

Thou art not merely an Asian breath from beyond the desert and the ancient rivers

Strange with Assyrian song and Arabian rumor . . .

Europa

I wither in a great noise.

That is the real thing, to be honored in Mr. James Oppenheim as generously as in any classic. Let him multiply such titles to homage.

Miss Deutsch's "Banners" is an interesting book. Unlike Mr. Oppenheim, Miss Deutsch is primarily an artist; she designs; she composes; she selects. She is an exact artist; she counts and weighs her strokes. It must not be inferred that Miss Deutsch is an exact thinker; on the contrary her present disability seems to lie in the fact that the thinker is not sufficiently ripe to serve as companion and abettor to the artist. For the time being her wares are images and sentiments, harbingers possibly of the thoughts and feelings which might make the fortune of some later volume. Even in "Banners" they meet us here and there, as in the sombre conclusion to the strong sonnet on "Solitude."

Single is all up-rising and down-lying;
Struggle or fear or silence none may share;
Each is alone in bearing and in dying;
Conquest is unaccompanied as despair.
But I have known no loneliness like this,
Locked in your arms and bent beneath your kiss.

At the other extreme of Miss Deutsch's work is the delectable artifice of the following:

You also, laughing one,
Tosser of balls in the sun,
Shall pillow your bright head
With the incurious dead.

That "incurious" is masterly.

The merit of the poems is naturally variable. "Banners" has an unwieldy—I might almost say, an unwielded—force. The "New Dionysiac" is spray-like with the vibrancy and the fleetingness of spray. "Beauty" is richly done, but is somewhat too manifestly a fabric. It is memorable for the lovely phrase (applied to Beauty):

And in the moving wind invisibly
Unstable stirs.

The dreamy and the incisive succeed each other in Miss Deutsch's work. At times you merely feel her breath upon your cheek; at other times she drives her nail with a Jael-like determination straight into your temple. She is a person about whom prophecy is unsafe. In quick minds the ardor of youth is a strong reënforcement to inborn faculty; it is hard to estimate the faculty until the reënforcement is withdrawn.

Mr. J. Thorne Smith, Jr., is a young man of alert fancy and sympathetic rhythms. The bigness and lustiness of the sea are happily caught in the four lines which follow:

I love its lonely smoke-hung trails,
Its battered hulks and singing sails,
Its lifting, surging hills and dales
With fleecy, form-plumed crests.

There is a mellow gravity in certain strains of Mr. McCoy's "Merchants of the Morning" which conveys a perceptible, if fading and uncertain, spell. I see no reason why the people who have enjoyed Mr. Charles Hanson Towne in the past should not enjoy his "World of Windows." Their world should be rich in joys.

As poetry or literature, Mr. Wilbur's "Theodore Roosevelt" has absolutely no standing; its only protection is its defenselessness. Nevertheless the book is not destitute of value. Mr. Wilbur has painted each feature of the many-featured Roosevelt as individually as if it had not been a feature but a face; the method is destructive of unity, but it favors that comprehensiveness which the pursuit of unity more or less excludes. Mr. Wilbur's Roosevelt is an unbound Roosevelt, a Roosevelt in loose sheets; for that very reason it includes a range of matter which a binder would reject as incompatible.

O. W. FIRKINS

Two "First Novels"

PETER MIDDLETON. By Henry K. Marks. Boston: Richard G. Badger.

IRON CITY. By M. H. Hedges. New York: Boni and Liveright.

A NEW YORK Sun reviewer asserts of "Peter Middleton" that "Theodore Dreiser would like it—Robert W. Chambers would read it through at one sitting." This is moderately doubtful; but it is easy to see how these two names might have been suggested by the story. To them might be added that of Upton Sinclair, who has written a novel on venereal disease. "Peter Middleton" is a serious piece of work. That is, the storyteller is not simply trying to amuse us, but desires to be of use as an interpreter. We may accept the current demand on criticism, that it shall consider what the artist is trying for, and how nearly he gets it. Unluckily, we begin and end in considerable uncertainty as to the present writer's objective. He wants to record things as they are—but how are they? He wants to paint a portrait—but is the fellow worth painting? He wants to point (or embody) a moral. And he wants to tell a tale. . . . These are among his impulses, if not his conscious desires; and they fail to pull together. The thing as it is, the physical thing, he presents with extreme fidelity: "The blinds drawn as then, the sparse, stiff furniture, rigidly arranged, covered with brown linen slip covers, the two massive crystal chandeliers and the oil paintings in their heavy gilt frames stretched with cheese cloth, the antique Empire urns that balanced the marble mantel—yes, the very smells, faint but insistent, the self-righteous smells of floor wax and brass polish, that somehow he always associated with his mother—all crowded in upon him and oppressed him." As for the portrait, it is a good portrait—of a weakling. And, of course, the world is full of weaklings. But alas, why entangle this worthy "Dreiserian realism" with the cog-worn machinery of the novel, romantic or purposeful?

As a story, the book is spoilt by the absurdity of the pivotal incident. Let the hero sacrifice himself, if you must, according to the deathless if tiresome habit of heroes; but make us believe in the necessity and the means of sacrifice. Peter Middleton, finding his wife unfaithful, agrees to give her cause for divorce. He goes to a dingy hotel with a street woman, telephoning his whereabouts to his waiting wife. Very good; but why, in the name of common sense, represent Peter the chivalrous and the clean as actually "staying" with the drab, and so incurring the disease which is to destroy him and his later on? Plainly the author has made up his mind to show a decent man ruined by that special enemy; and what we have in the end is a tract with many of the materials that might have been moulded into a novel of creative power. For the rest, disease or no disease, Peter remains a weakling, a fumbling "temperamental" egotist, who is looking to life for a hugged-up happiness that always slips beyond his grasp. At the end only self-destruction remains:

It was as if it had been granted him to see himself with forbidden eyes. So he saw himself: so he contemplated himself with a kind of triumphant despair. Death for creatures like himself! Oh! he knew now. He knew why Nina had loathed him—and Bromley. They had sensed it. And von Prahl. And Anita Demling. Even Elisabeth Lissinger with her great understanding, her exquisite generosity, even Elisabeth Lissinger. Only Melanie! It was for Melanie he would do it. . . . He rarely thought of the disease now. That was something accidental—accessory. Disease or no disease, the deeper thing, the permanent, ineradicable thing, the disease at his heart was what impelled him. . . . To get away from it. . . . To annihilate himself completely.

Petrovitch Middletonskey?

"Iron City" is also a story of personal quest. But the person chiefly concerned pursues something more than either his own happiness or (in whatever meaning of the word) success. He has the modern sense of solidarity with, and responsibility for, his fellow-men. He is wistful for the world's good. And by fellow-men and the world he means, also in the modern fashion, the masses, the proletariat, all those whom fate (or "capital") has wronged by giving them advantages and opportunities less than his own. He himself has won them single-handed, to be sure. John Cosmus, "student of society," has made his own way through college, before coming to Iron City to begin his cherished career. Iron City is that thriving midland town, some three generations from its pioneer days, which is the scene of so much of our later fiction. Founded by New England Puritans, it has gone through the later phases of industrial and social expansion. It has learned to play, and to boost. Thirty alien races have arrived to test its quality as melting-pot. Its dominant personality is now crude, pushing, Philistine. Yet, oddly enough, one of its points of pride remains the college which was founded in the Puritan days, and still clings to the ancient ideals of education. To Crandon Hill College comes young John Cosmus, fresh from Harvard, as an instructor in sociology. He has willingly given up the lure of money-making: "He imagined that the American college was the focal point for the mother-brains, the creative minds of the race; he wanted to be a creative mind, and he wanted to shape minds with a gift for creation." But he very soon finds that Crandon Hill College is anything but a dwelling or a nursery of creative minds. Its faculty are infinitely serious about the mighty past and the trivialities of academic routine, and blandly indifferent to the great forces of modern life. President Hugh Crandon embodies the genial yet narrow conservatism of this privileged institution. John Cosmus soon finds his zeal slackening. His pupils do not wish to think, his colleagues do not wish them to think—least of all about the social and industrial problems of to-day. To tell the truth, Cosmus himself does not so much think about these matters as muse over them, puzzle himself about them, worry about them. At all events, he is not long running foul of the let-alone policy of the College. He protests against the closing of the college grounds to the aliens who are crossing them as the shortest way to and from work in the great factories which are making Iron City rich. He protests against the educational theory which spends thousands on conventional "scholarship" and offers nothing to the enlightenment of the community. Finally, when a great strike breaks out in one of the huge concerns whose head is a trustee and pillar of church and college, Cosmus outrages the authorities by standing up for the industrial rebels with both voice and pen. He is dismissed, and the strike fails, and Cosmus is none too sure, in the end, of what it has represented. To him also comes his moment of despair, his thought of self-destruction:

His mind worked in and out of problems, experiences, memories and impressions. He thought of the day now nearly ten years before, when he had climbed the telephone post, tapped the transcontinental wire, and had got his inspiration to go to college. He thought of college, graduate school, his hopes for education . . . and then the factory—whose faint clangor he could still detect in the night; and the war. How different, how vastly different the world was now from the world as it then seemed to be!

In some moment of this thinking he became aware of the vast night stretching around him, the earth so wide and patient, the stars, infinite and tender, the expansive stillness of the world. The valley yonder, the heavy speech of the running water, the city lights behind—they, too, were part of the peace of the wider upper universe. Behold, the night was paternal and enfolding.

Suddenly as he sat there all fatigue was gone. It slipped from him mysteriously. He was strong, capable. Even the war—that inexplicable orgy—seemed potential with good. Somewhere in his thinking, some idea, some raveling of feeling, had brushed his soul clean of fear, anguish and hatred. He had let go and slipped into Life. . . . At length he remembered: that cleansing thought was the thought of God.

So with God and the human love that has crowned his hour of despair, Cosmus goes forth, with uncertain step but not without courage, into a turbulent world. . . . So the problem is set forth, our own problem, the world's problem. The author has no humanitarian or industrial panacea to offer for its solution, but at best glimpses an omen of good in the nature of things: "For them there were just two facts: the perennial wrongness of cruelty and greed, and the eternal rightness of love." For such a book, beginning and ending on a note of sane if impassioned inquiry, we may well be grateful in an hour when, if you sow the word "liberal," a crop of cocksure "ideas" and cure-alls at once presents itself for reaping.

H. W. BOYNTON.

The Run of the Shelves

WHEN "Stars and Stripes" called Sergeant Alexander Woolcott from his platoon to an editor's desk, they probably broke his heart, but they also did well. And when the High Command set him footloose to see and hear what he could on the fighting front, they cast literary bread upon the waters. It has returned after not too many days in the volume "The Command is Forward" (Century Co.). Mr. Woolcott has made the best use of an extraordinary opportunity. There is a moment of relaxation after peril when men will tell about themselves and their fellows with simplicity. The moment passes, and the facts get reworked into anecdote and legend. Mr. Woolcott in twenty instances caught the right moment and fixed it by a masterly act of reporting. One grasps the unity of the fighting effort, in the fifteen-year-old doughboy "dying on his gun," in the brigadier-general who established headquarters, most heterodoxically, before the firing line, in the flying camera men itching for an illicit fight, in the sweating cooks defying the elements and traffic regulations to keep up with their units. All this is made vivid without pretentiousness or overemphasis. As pure reporting, the war has produced nothing better.

Mr. Dooley's new volume "On Making a Will and Other Necessary Evils" (Charles Scribner's Sons) in its skirmishings with food in war, with old age, with baseball, with golf, with cards, with history, with Irish movements, has its instants of fortune and felicity.

"Freedom is like dhrink, Hinmissy. If ye take anny at all ye might as well take enough to make ye happy f'r awhile."

"Dock O'Leary," said Mr. Hennessy, "tells me a rival is takin' away a lot iv his practice be puttin' ivrybody on a dite. He didn't say who it was."

"He told me," said Mr. Dooley, "it's th' high cost iv livin'."

"Th' two gr-eat American spoorts are a good deal alike—pollyticks an' baseball. They're both played be professy-onals, th' teams ar-re r-run be fellows that cudden't throw a base-ball or stuff a ballot-box to save their lives and ar-re on'y intherested in countin' up th' gate receipts, an' here ar-re we settin' out in th' sun on th' bleachin' boards, payin' our good money f'r th' spoort, hot an' uncomfortable but happy, injyin' ivry good play, hootin' ivry bad wan, knowin' nawthin' about th' inside play an' not carin', but all jinin' in th' cry iv 'Kill th' empire.' They're both grand games."

These are enjoyable things. Many of the laughs in the volume, however, will be of the sort in which the good nature of the laughter acknowledges the good intentions of the humorist. That the reader should go half-way to meet Mr. Dooley is only fair, since Mr. Dooley has often gone half-way or more than half-way to meet his joke. We feel sometimes that Mr. Dooley is not so much conquering as harassing his subject. The difficulties of an avowedly humorous book are very great. Literary success consists largely in the establishment of a balance between expectation and fulfillment. Reduced expectation, increased fulfillment—these are the instruments of victory. The trouble with a book that avows its intention to be humorous is that it arouses continuous expectation in relation to a point in which fulfillment must be intermittent and occasional. In the straits in which he finds himself Mr. Dooley becomes rather unscrupulous. Morally, indeed, nothing can be urged against him. He deserves honor for the decency and humanity of his behavior in that curious craft of humor which, with all its virtues and benefits, so often tempts the humane man to be cruel and the decent man to be foul. Mr. Dooley's aberrations are merely literary. An example may be drawn from his paper on oratory. It is undoubtedly funny to represent after-dinner speakers as dying with eagerness to speak. It is equally funny perhaps to represent them as dying of terror lest they should be called upon to speak. But when a man makes use of both these forms of humor in one short paper, it is clear that his liveliness is the outgrowth of his ingenuity, that it expresses no permanent relation of his mind to the thing. Untidiness of this sort is very usual in the volume. Mr. Hennessy, the listener, is perhaps really more humorous than Mr. Dooley. This gentleman emerges from long silences into brief remarks that are perfectly serious, absolutely banal, and plump and rotund in their placid self-complacency. He illustrates that great envelope of dullness in which, as in a fleece or fur, the stolid world is cosily and warmly wrapped. He is the ideal contrast and counterpoise to Mr. Dooley.

What's Hoover Going to Do?

FEW men carry with them from the great war such a record of achievement as Herbert Hoover, a record of which all Americans are justly proud. It is natural that the interest which the whole world feels in him should not cease with his retirement from the major tasks which have occupied him during the past five years and with which the welfare of so many millions of people has been bound up.

In response to an inquiry from a San Francisco paper as to his future plans, Mr. Hoover makes a characteristic reply, which shows that in him resides something of the spirit of a Cincinnatus.

(1) I plan to adhere to the following rules for one month:

(a) I will reply to no telephone calls, and my secretary has directions to explain in the most amiable manner that as I am spending a month with two vigorous small boys I cannot be tied to the end of a telephone all day, and that I will devote my energies evenings to replying to the best of my ability to any telegraphic or written communications.

(b) That I do not myself read any communication which exceeds more than one page and I must depend upon my secretary to inform me of the contents if it exceeds this limit. These rules are solely for my own good.

(c) That I must decline the honor of speaking at a large part of sixty-four public meetings to which I have received invitations. I do this because I am not a spellbinder and I am satisfied that the American people will be gratified to find a citizen who has retired from office who wants to keep still. Any public statements from me will have to be written before this appears. This rule is for the public good.

(2) My family is building a "palace" containing seven rooms and a basement, a kitchen and a garage, all on the university campus. The old cottage is good enough but we all think we can build a better house than anybody ever built before and every American family is entitled to this experience once in a lifetime.

I have noted that the skilled labor on this job is receiving $8 to $9 per day. As trustee of this university I also note that some 150 instructors and assistant professors receive from $3 to $6 per diem and that they have families to support. I therefore plan to co-operate with my fellow trustees who are already endeavoring to find means to help the above group of unorganized workers.

(3) After one month I plan to proceed to New York to pass upon the final settlement of the expenditures arising from the operations of the Supreme Economic Council and of the Belgian Relief Commission. Altogether these accounts involve about $2,000,000,000 of inter-accounting chiefly between eighteen European governments and different concerns, as to which I am the final arbiter.

Some thousands of earnest men have—some of them—for years given their services free for the economical administration that these sums should save every atom of human life possible. We are not afraid of this settlement; no one can collect these sums from us. If there were six less ciphers on these figures I might be worried.

I also plan to prepare a report for Congress showing the exact detail of the expenditure of the $100,000,000 appropriated for relief purposes, and to hand over to the United States treasury between $85,000,000 and $90,000,000 of this sum in obligations of foreign governments, together with an accounting for an expenditure of the balance within the act. I hope this will be an agreeable surprise. Most of Congress thought the money was gone forever, but voted for it anyway.

Also I plan to edit a report now in preparation on the economic measures taken under my direction since the armistice in Europe. Also I plan to co-operate with my colleagues in settling some details of an endowment for education of children of Belgian people of limited means, which endowment has been created out of the residue of funds remaining in the relief after the completion of its work. This residue did not come out of the American public; it came from profits on sales of food to the better-to-do Belgians since the armistice and proved greater than the needs of the destitute.

(4) I shall co-operate with the other members of the committee of the European children's fund, which is now, with the assistance of various governments and private charity, carrying on the special feeding of 4,000,000 children in Eastern Europe diseased from under-nourishment. I have also agreed to complete the selection, free of charge, of some American advisers to various countries in Europe. These are as badly needed as the food for children.

(5) I plan to return to California a month or two later if I can advance the above matters satisfactorily. I shall then continue to attend to my duties as

(a) Head of a family;

(b) Trustee of Stanford University;

(c) A member of the committee of the European children's fund;

(d) The head of the Belgian foundation above;

(e) The completion of the "palace" above referred to; and,

(f) To support the activities under "a" and "e" from my occupation as a consulting engineer and income from remaining pre-war savings.

All subject to the reservation that nothing more turns up to irritate my conscience or peace of mind.

I offer this intimate disclosure of private affairs in order that no further inquiry on this subject will be needed and so that it may be seen that I contemplate no mischief against this Commonwealth, neither actual nor even in the purviews of the Federal Trade Commission.

Impecunious Idealism

THE air of England is simply vibrating with scattered impulses of theatrical idealism, all of which are thwarted (like the good fairies in a Christmas pantomime) by the Demon Impecuniosity. Every week brings the announcement of a new Society Guild, or League for the advancement either of the Arts as a whole, including drama, or of drama in particular, or of some form of drama, or of the arts subsidiary to drama. Here, for instance, is "The Arts League of Service," the aim of which is "to bring the arts into everyday life." This object it proposes to further in many ways, but largely "through performances of Drama, Dance, and Music in London and in towns and villages." On its Council, too, are most of our leading Young Men of the Theatre—Mr. Bridges Adams, Mr. John Drinkwater, Mr. St. John Ervine, Mr. Norman Macdermott, Mr. Miles Malle-son. Some of these names have probably not yet crossed the Atlantic, but I fancy you will hear of them all in time. Associated with them are many intellectual and social notabilities, such as Mr. Laurence Binyon, Mr. H. W. Massingham, the Hon. Neville Lytton, the Countess of De La Warr, the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lyttelton, Lady Emily Luytens, etc., etc. What the League has yet done I do not know. I think it gave some performances in the Parks on the day of the victory celebrations—but this may have been some other society.

A more active body is the Drama League, which has borrowed its name, but not its aims, from America. It consists very largely of the same people; for the Army of Idealism is not really so large as the number of its various enterprises would suggest. The Drama League does not propose to produce plays itself, but to provide a sort of bureau of advice and assistance for all the other idealistic enterprises, great and small. The fact that Mr. Granville Barker is the Chairman of its Council leads one to hope that it may do useful work. He made an excellent speech at a conference of the League, which took place during the latter half of August at Stratford-on-Avon. At this conference, too, Mr. Martin Harvey spoke very much to the point when he urged the concentration, the focusing, of idealistic effort upon the one thing needful—namely, the establishment of a great national theatre in London, and of repertory theatres in all the great centres of population, suburban and provincial. This focusing, however, is not likely to take place for the present. In the first place, these are bitter bad days for raising money. In the second place, the running of small societies offers an attractive field of activity to numerous men and women of culture and leisure, who feel no great disappointment if their activities end mainly in "drawing-meetings," or, in other words, in talk. Thirdly, the really energetic young artists who leaven the mass of vague aspiration are bent upon small experiments in the direction of "advanced" drama and decoration, rather than on securing for the theatre its proper place in the spiritual life of the nation. These young men have been much excited and stimulated by reports of the "Little Theatre" movement in America. They tend to be quite as much interested in decoration as in the strictly dramatic side of the theatre. One of them has been heard to say, "Of course Barker and Masefield were giants in their day, but their generation is passing."

Perhaps the most interesting figure of this group, or I should rather say of this stratum in theatrical society, is Mr. Norman Macdermott, the projector of a little theatre to be built (D.V.) at Hampstead. Mr. Macdermott is neither an actor nor, I believe, a playwright, but an architect and designer of scenes. He arranged a very attractive little exhibition of costume designs and models of scenery for the benefit of the Drama League Conference at Stratford-on-Avon; and the most notable exhibit was a model, by Mr. Macdermott himself, of his proposed "Everyman Theatre." It is to seat some 600 people, and can be erected, complete with an initial stock of scenery, for £17,500. But where is such a sum to come from? Of course there are many men who could write a cheque for it to-morrow and scarcely notice the difference in their bank account; but it seems impossible to get any of these men to take an intelligent interest in the theatre. Some of them are not without a tinge of idealism. There is, for instance, Lord Howard de Walden, a man of great wealth, who has frittered away large sums in well-meant enterprises which have led to nothing. At the present moment he is understood to be backing a "side-show" named the Art Theatre, which has given two more or less eccentric performances at the Haymarket, one at least of which must have cost far more money than its artistic achievement justified. I have not the slightest inside knowledge of the finance of Lord Howard de Walden's undertakings, from the Herbert Trench "Repertory Theatre" onwards; but I am very much mistaken if he has not spent, with practically no abiding result, sums which, intelligently administered, might have made the name of Howard de Walden a landmark in the history of the British theatre.

In the midst of all the theatres in the air, however, one playhouse on the solid earth has been the scene of some excellent work, which may have far-reaching consequences. I refer to the Memorial Theatre, Stratford-on-Avon. The history of the so-called Shakespeare National Theatre scheme is too long and intricate to be even outlined here. Suffice it to say that there has existed for years a committee for promoting such a scheme, and that it has in its hands a considerable fund, though very far from the whole amount required. Holding itself justified in applying the accumulated interest on this fund to training actors for the eventual Shakespeare Theatre, and to establishing a sound tradition in Shakespearean acting, the committee joined hands with the Governors of the Memorial Theatre, Stratford-on-Avon, in guaranteeing a "Shakespeare Festival" for the present year, to last through the month of August. We must not look too closely into the somewhat pretentious term "Festival." It is applied by established habit to all performances at Stratford; and no doubt the assemblage of visitors attracted by such performances does give the little town something of a festal air. From time immemorial, one may almost say, the direction of these festivals has been in the hands of Sir Frank Benson; but Sir Frank's company has been broken up by the war, and the Governors were, moreover, not disinclined to something of a new departure in methods of acting and presentation. Sir Frank Benson has done invaluable service to the British stage in keeping the Shakespearean repertory alive in the provinces, and in giving young actors an opportunity to learn their business by constantly playing a wide round of Shakespearean parts. Many of the leaders of the profession to-day, from Henry Ainley downwards, have passed through the Bensonian school. But, except in a few parts, such as Richard II, it was impossible to say that Sir Frank's own performances were particularly satisfying; and in the course of his gallant struggle with difficult circumstances, he had fallen into very slovenly habits of presentment. One peculiarity which it was hard to forgive was his practice of "fluffing" through his parts—seldom speaking three consecutive lines with perfect accuracy. It is, of course, too much to demand that an actor should carry all the leading parts of Shakespeare constantly in his head, and be able to turn them on at a moment's notice; but then no actor is compelled to play all the leading parts. In short, it was felt that an infusion of new blood into the Festival performances would be far from undesirable.

The season was placed under the direction of a young producer named W. Bridges Adams. Mr. Adams was something of a "dark horse," for, though good reports had been received of his management of the Liverpool and Bristol Repertory Theatres, he had done very little work in London. He has brilliantly justified the faith that was placed in him. With very limited resources at his disposal, and with most inadequate time for rehearsal, he has given, not merely adequate, but very distinguished performances of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "The Winter's Tale," "Julius Cæsar," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "Romeo and Juliet," and "The Tempest." The company contained a valuable leaven of "old Bensonians," so that the tradition of many years was not entirely broken. But it was thoroughly renewed and revitalized. Mr. Adams has the art of infusing zest and enthusiasm into his actors, and getting thoroughly good "team work" out of them. One has seen better individual performances of almost all the parts than those of the Stratford company, but seldom or never has one seen more enjoyable presentations of the plays as a whole. In the matter of mounting, though the strictest economy was necessary, Mr. Adams was enabled, by the fact that he is himself a designer, to produce admirable effects. I doubt whether the very difficult shipwreck scene of "The Tempest" has ever been better staged; and the "Dream" and "Romeo and Juliet" were presented with remarkable originality and refinement. The local success has been decisive, in the face of a good deal of initial hostility. Never, certainly, has truer honor been done to Shakespeare on his native heath than by this little company of young, enthusiastic, and well-trained artists.

The performance has given rise to a very unnecessary, but not quite uninteresting, controversy. It happened that Mr. Bernard Shaw was a member of the committee which guaranteed the Festival; and Mr. Shaw attempted to introduce into the manager's contract a clause rendering him liable to instant dismissal if he cut a single line of Shakespeare's text (or rather of the text commonly attributed to Shakespeare) except on the ground of quite impossible indecency. He did not succeed in making this a condition of the contract; but he did succeed in terrorizing Mr. Bridges Adams into retaining a good many lines which would much better have been eliminated—notably some of the grossest indecencies in "Romeo and Juliet."

Meanwhile a discussion of the principles involved found its way into the magazines and newspapers. All parties are agreed that the spectacular managers of the past generation—Sir Henry Irving, Sir Herbert Tree, and, most of all perhaps, Mr. Augustin Daly—ruthlessly maltreated the poet's text, in order to make room for the extraneous ornamentation on which they principally relied. The widespread reaction against this postponement of Shakespeare to spectacle is entirely justified. But Mr. Shaw and his partisans now maintain that there is no middle course between wantonly mutilating Shakespeare and repeating every line that is attributed to him in the First Folio. The party of common sense, on the other hand—I call it so because I happen to belong to it—lays down the following principles:

(1) It is wrong to make any excisions either in the interests of spectacle, or because we do not think such-and-such a speech or passage "worthy of Shakespeare." Therefore his shorter plays, which come easily within the limits of an evening's entertainment, ought to be presented to all intents and purposes intact.

(2) But there are many lines and passages which, owing to the lapse of time, or to corruption of the text, have lost all meaning, and can be understood, if at all, only by the help of footnotes. These it is not only justifiable, but highly desirable, to omit. They are dead tissue, useless and even hurtful to the living organism. A more difficult question arises in the case of the passages, common in the poet's later plays, which are so condensed as to be highly obscure, yet are probably not corrupt. It may be argued that these ought to be retained at all costs; but the better opinion would seem to be that no good purpose is served by reciting lines which the actor probably does not understand, and which certainly convey no meaning to the vast majority even of an intelligent audience.

(3) Some of Shakespeare's plays, even if very rapidly acted and with no encumbrance from scenery, are far too long to be brought within the three hours of a modern theatrical evening. It is overwhelmingly probable that the poet never intended the full text to be presented on the stage. At all events we are justified in so far reducing such plays as to bring them within a reasonable time-limit—the more so as their dramatic effect is invariably found to gain by such condensation. And in making these time-cuts, as they may be called, we must naturally try to discriminate between the essential and the inessential, the vital and the obsolete.

Mr. Shaw and his adherents maintain that no distinction must be drawn between the living humor of Falstaff and verbal quibbles which have entirely lost what little humor they may ever have had, and which are not improbably mere "gags" incrustated in the text. They pretend to understand clearly passages which six generations of commentators have striven in vain to elucidate. And Mr. Shaw himself declares (in this slightly differing from his disciples) that the public must be trained to approach Shakespeare in the Bayreuth spirit, and to sit reverently through a performance of five or six hours, if the poet so decrees. When we remember that Mr. Shaw began his career as a professed enemy to Shakespeare, we can not help wondering whether there is not a touch of perfidy in this apparently frantic partisanship.

Yet, in the main, even Mr. Shaw is doubtless sincere. His principal ally in this controversy is Mr. John Drinkwater; and it is understood that Mr. Granville Barker leans to the same opinion. Now it is to be noted that these three gentlemen are all playwrights, and all inclined to prolixity. Mr. Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln," for example, would gain incalculably by the omission of the lyrical interludes between the acts. There can be little doubt, I think, that they are moved by a professional fellow-feeling for Shakespeare, and include him in a sort of Authors' Trades-Union to protest against the unhallowed audacity of criticism in hinting that a dramatist can ever write too much. One can understand their sensitiveness; but they can make up their minds to this—that if posterity does not "cut" their works, it will only be because it ignores them. Time is a mighty winnower.

WILLIAM ARCHER

London, England, September 2

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little farther into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available, without much trouble, through publisher, book-seller, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles are in no sense bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help to make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

Foreign Visitors

WE no longer ask each visitor how he likes America; nor does he write such unpleasant books about us as "Martin Chuzzlewit," Capt. Basil Hall's "Travels in North America in 1827-28," or Mrs. Trollope's volume. Indeed, Mrs. Trollope, painfully truthful in great part, as she may have been, contrived to be irritating even in her title. "Domestic Manners of the Americans" suggests a scientist's investigations of the interior economy of the woodchuck's burrow, or observations on the life of the gopher.

Not all of them are flattering, even in more recent times. Max O'Rell's "Jonathan and His Continent" (Cassell, 1889) was friendly indeed, but frisky; Kipling's "American Notes" is caustic; G. W. Stevens, who reported the Presidential campaign of 1896 in "The Land of the Dollar" (Dodd, 1898), was "smart," and always on the lookout for bad manners; while Sir Philip Burne-Jones, in "Dollars and Democracy" (Appleton, 1904) was both superficial and supercilious. Wu Ting-Fang's "America, through the Spectacles of an Oriental Diplomat" (Stokes, 1914), is worth reading. Very courteous books are by two Frenchmen and an Irishman: Abbé Klein's "In the Land of the Strenuous Life" (McClurg, 1905), Charles Wagner's "My Impressions of America" (McClure, Phillips, 1906), and George A. Birmingham's "From Dublin to Chicago" (Doran, 1914).

After looking at some scores of these books, and reading a dozen or two of them, there remain in my mind, as honest and readable: "The Land of Contrasts" (Lamson, Wolff, 1898), by J. F. Muirhead, of Baedeker's guide book fame; H. G. Wells's "The Future in America" (Harpers, 1906); Henry C. Shelley's "America of the Americans" (Scribner, 1915), and William Archer's "America To-day" (Scribner, 1899). Every real reader of the greatest of them all, Bryce's "The American Commonwealth" (Macmillan), knows that the author never employs soft-soap to win our affections. Baron D'Estournelles de Constant's "America and Her Problems" (Macmillan, 1915) is as painstaking and thorough as Münsterberg's "The Americans," and has the advantage of being French. Arnold Bennett's "Your United States" (Harpers, 1912) is another of the better sort, and so is Frederick de Sumichrast's "America and the Britons" (Appleton, 1914). It is worth while to read "America and the Americans from a French Point of View" (Scribner, 1897) to guess which American wrote it. Price Collier is the man.

If you have only time for one, it should be that intelligent commentary on the whole subject, sensible and charming—"As Others See Us" (Macmillan, 1908), by John Graham Brooks.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

POETRY

Piper, E. F. Barbed Wire and Other Poems. Iowa: The Midland Press.
 Wilkinson, Marguerite. New Voices. Macmillan. $2.
 Wilson, A. F. The Township Line. Harper. $1.35 net.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Gibbons, H. A. The New Map of Asia. Century.
 Goodnow, F. J., and Bates, F. G. Municipal Government. Century.
 McLaren, A. D. Germanism from Within. Dutton. $5.
 Sloane, W. M. The Powers and Aims of Western Democracy. Scribner. $3.50 net.

THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING BROTHERHOOD AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

By Sir Charles Walston, M.A., Litt.D.

12mo, cloth, 224pp.

$1.60 net

Author of Aristodemocracy; Patriotism, National and International, etc.
 A timely volume which treats in its several chapters of Nationality and Hyphenism; The Expansion of Western Ideals and the World's Peace; the English-Speaking Brotherhood; the Next War—Wilsonism and Anti-Wilsonism; League of Dreams or League of Realities.

The book, which has a direct bearing upon the affairs of the day, is the work of a practical idealist, and should exercise a sane and helpful influence in the formation of public and private opinion.

Columbia University Press

Lemcke & Buechner, Agents

30-32 East 20th Street

New York City

American Men of Affairs are Interested In

THE REVIEW

the weekly that aims

"to maintain those American principles which have made this a country of self-reliant freemen" because it contains sound, authoritative articles on Economics, Finance and Government.

The president of one of the largest manufacturing concerns in America (not himself a stockholder in THE REVIEW) recently sent us his check for $30 for six annual subscriptions to THE REVIEW to be sent to himself and some of his associates.

A New England business man of high standing has written to 200 friends and acquaintances in the financial and industrial world urging them to become regular subscribers to THE REVIEW.

THE REVIEW, 140 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK:

You may send me the new weekly. If it does not come up to my expectations I will cancel this subscription within two weeks. Otherwise you may bill me at $5.00 for the year.

Name

Address

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, OF

THE REVIEW

Published weekly, Saturday, at New York, N. Y.

Statement for October 1, 1919.

State of New York } County of New York, } ss:

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Harold deWolf Fuller, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Editor of THE REVIEW, and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443. Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:

Publisher—National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y.

Editor—Fabian Franklin, 617 West 113th Street, New York, N. Y.

Editor—Harold deWolf Fuller, 8 East 8th Street, New York, N. Y.

Managing Editor—None.

Business Manager—Rodman Gilder, 898 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

2. That the owners are: (Give names and addresses of individual owners, or, if a corporation, give its name and the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 per cent. or more of the total amount of stock.)

The National Weekly Corporation:
Emile Berliner, 1458 Columbia Road, Washington, D. C.; George Blumenthal, 19 Nassau Street, N. Y. C.; R. A. Carter, 130 East 15th Street, N. Y. C.; James E. Clinton, P. O. Box 7, Boston, Mass.; E. C. Converse, 14 Wall Street, N. Y. C.; R. Fulton Cutting, 32 Nassau Street, N. Y. C.; Est. of J. R. De Lamar, 43 Exchange Place, N. Y. C.; Charles S. Fairchild, 37 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.; Fabian Franklin, 617 West 113th Street, N. Y. C.; A. B. Hepburn, 57 Broadway, N. Y. C.; Archer M. Huntington, 15 West 81st Street, N. Y. C.; G. M. Hyams, P. O. Box 5104, Boston, Mass.; Alfred Jaretski, 49 Wall Street, N. Y. C.; Felix E. Kahn, 140 West 57th Street, N. Y. C.; Max Levy, Wayne Avenue and Berkely Street, Wayne Junction, Pa.; Louis Marshall, 120 Broadway, N. Y. C.; Samuel Mather, Western Reserve Bldg., Cleveland, O.; Walter E. Maynard, 501 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.; George Merck, 45 Park Place, N. Y. C.; James H. Post, 129 Front Street, N. Y. C.; John T. Pratt, 43 Exchange Place, N. Y. C.; Thomas T. Richards, care of Maitland Coppel Co., 52 William St., N. Y. C.; Manual Rionda, P. O. Box 4, Wall Street Station, N. Y. C.; Russell Robb, care Stone & Webster, 147 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.; Julius Rosenwald, Chicago, Ill.; Mortimer L. Schiff, 52 William Street, N. Y. C.;

GOOD BOOKS

HOURS of relaxation are well-spent in the company of an ABINGDON book. Let your preference roam where it may, there's an interesting book awaiting your call. The thoughts of other men and women, presented in attractive form, will entertain you or add to your knowledge, as your mood may demand. Ask for THE ABINGDON PRESS catalog and see what it offers. The following titles are now on sale at the best shops:

MILESTONES IN HISTORY

THE MAYFLOWER PILGRIMS

By EDMUND J. CARPENTER

In thoroughly preparing themselves for the great celebration of the tercentenary of the landing of the Mayflower Pilgrims our English cousins are demanding reliable books relating to the history of that event. We on this side of the water should not want to be less well prepared, and here is an indispensable book, based on a fresh examination of the long lost "Bradford Manuscript", which when discovered revealed a very intimate account of who and what the Pilgrims were.

"Who the Pilgrims were, whence they came from and why they ventured to the inhospitable shores of the new land is traced with fidelity and impartiality through the religious turmoils caused by the erection of the Established Church of England on the ruins of papal supremacy—spiritual and temporal—in the days of Henry VIII. The subject can never grow stale to Americans, but Dr. Carpenter invests it with an interest that is full of fresh inspiration."—Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

Illustrated. Cloth. Net, $1.50, Postpaid.

A HISTORY OF LATIN AMERICA

By WILLIAM WARREN SWEET

"Professor Sweet has given us an orderly, readable sweep of the whole situation from the Spanish and Portuguese background of the early conquistadors down thru the romantic careers of the revolutionists, Bolivar and San Martin, to the latest glance at Education in Mexico. He deserves especial commendation for his clear paragraph headings, for his skill in avoiding confusion between the various national histories, for his gift of summary."—The Publishers' Weekly.

Illustrations. Maps, Bibliography and Index. Cloth. Net, $3.00, Postpaid.

HISTORIC CHURCHES IN MEXICO

By MRS. JOHN WESLEY BUTLER

"Most of the readers of this book will doubtless be surprised not only by the number of church buildings in Mexico that are fairly entitled to be called 'historic,' but by the intrinsic interest of the historical facts that are grouped about the churches. Mrs. Butler writes from an experience of thirty-six years as a resident of Mexico."—American Review of Reviews.

Illustrated. Cloth. Net, $1.50, Postpaid.

THE OREGON MISSIONS

The Story of How the Line Was Run Between Canada and the United States

By BISHOP JAMES W. BASHFORD

The story of the founding of the Oregon Missions, together with a story of related history. The details concerning the running of the line between Canada and the United States is of special interest. Dealing as it does with matters of denominational and governmental moment, the book is an historical study of great value.

"The author has done a good piece of work, and he is unsurpassed in his scrupulous care to record facts and state the exact truth."—Boston Evening Transcript.

12mo. Cloth. Net, $1.25, Postpaid.

NEW YORK THE ABINGDON PRESS CINCINNATI

CHICAGO BOSTON PITTSBURGH DETROIT KANSAS CITY SAN FRANCISCO PORTLAND, ORE.

Finley J. Shepard, 120 Broadway, N. Y. C.; William Sloane, 575 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.; Frederick Strauss, 1 William Street, N. Y. C.; Paul M. Warburg, 17 East 80th Street, N. Y. C.; Edwin S. Webster, care Stone & Webster, 147 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.; William Woodward, 5 Nassau Street, N. Y. C.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent. or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.)

None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

H. deW. FULLER, Editor.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 30th day of September, 1919.

HOWARD CAMPBELL

Notary Public, Queens County.

(My commission expires March 30, 1921)

THE REVIEW is a paid-up, approved applicant for membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

52-465

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 23

New York, Saturday, October 18, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	485
Editorial Articles:
The Danger of Deadlock	487
The Conference Under Way	488
Guarding the Trans-Siberian	489
The Baltic Menace to Peace	490
What Has Become of the Debtor Class?	491
The Syrian Question. By A. J. Barnouw	492
Obstacle Races. By Katherine Fullerton Gerould	493
Poetry:
A Knight-Errant a la Mode. By Harry Ayres	497
Correspondence:
The Open Letter to Senator Hitchcock	497
Book Reviews:
Bolshevism Unadorned	498
A History of American Prisons	500
Feminine Humor. By H. W. Boynton	501
The Run of the Shelves	501
Drama:
Somerset Maugham and Zoe Akins. By O. W. Firkins	502
Among the Old Book Stalls. By Lawrence Williams	503
Books and the News: American Government. By Edmund Lester Pearson	504

with either the employees or the managers of the industry affected. The country is looking to this Conference not for immediate relief from the troubles of the moment, but for a platform of workable principles which will lead to the removal of all just grievances of laborers as rapidly as may be possible and at the same time relieve a long-suffering people from the personal inconveniences, material losses, and moral disorders of continual strikes.

IN his address at Columbia University on "The Real Labor Problem," President Butler deals briefly and incisively with the deeper issues of which the immediate troubles of the day may be regarded as mere symptoms. In the weapon of the strike as it has now come so frequently to be employed in this country as well as in England and Italy, he sees a mortal challenge to the supremacy of government; he justly associates this menace with the spreading of the doctrine that "man's political organization, the state, is not any more fundamental than several other forms of human association." Those who have thoughtlessly slipped into acceptance, or even toleration, of this doctrine, could not do better than read the two or three pages in which Dr. Butler exposes its falseness and its danger. As to the relations between labor and capital, he goes too far in asserting their absolute identity of interest, and consequently makes the problem of their relations appear simpler than it really is. But what he says about the essentially coöperative character of their association, and what he urges as to the duty of their harmonious participation in the discussion and settlement of disputes, can not fail to be helpful. He looks for rescue from our troubles chiefly to the recognition by the three parties—"those who work with their hands; those who work with their brains, and those who work with their savings"—of their common interest in the product, and to the corollary from this, the "giving to representatives of each of these elements a direct share in the conduct and control of the industry and its policies." He expects no instantaneous solution of the problem, in any event; but he hopes that "the habit of reasonableness will more or less speedily supplant the habit of force"—a happy phrase which may well stick in men's minds.

WHILE labor clamors for shorter hours and at least one of our journals "of opinion" opines that increased output promises no immediate decrease in prices, German labor, according to the dispatches, is getting back to a ten-hour day. Great as was the curse of militarism, it probably bred into the average German a docility which makes him face a difficult situation with doggedness. Perhaps, also, the diagrams which his commander has hung up before him have made him understand the latest economic diagram, namely this: When a man's house burns down and there is no insurance to cover the loss, it behooves him, if he wishes to get back where he was, to work quite as hard and quite as long as he did before. Some of our own labor unions are apparently going on the principle that, owing to their patriotism during the war, they are entitled to special privileges now. By the same token every citizen who did his duty by his country in the great crisis might expect to be better off than he was before the nation dug so deeply into its resources. This variety deserves the name of dollar patriotism.

WHAT constitutes demobilization? This is a question on which the Administration should throw some light at once. If war-time prohibition should be further continued on the ground that the conditions of the bill which made it operative on July 1 still exist, an authoritative statement to that effect would be welcome at this time. Some days ago Representative Rainey said that the War Department regarded demobilization as completed. If this is true, or even if the public thinks that it is true, and if the Administration is lending itself to the expediency of keeping the country dry until Constitutional prohibition shall take effect, it is helping to promote a spirit of lawlessness at a time when that spirit is causing much concern in various spheres of activity.

ADMIRAL VON TIRPITZ has revealed the secret, according to his own view, of the opposition to submarine Schrecklichkeit which developed in Ger-

THE Labor Conference in Washington was called to consider fundamental principles essential to right relations between labor, capital, and the general public, not to take up specific instances of existing friction and attempt to remove them. Mr. Gompers could hardly have realized the result which would inevitably follow the adoption by the Conference of his request that it take up at once the arbitration of the existing strike in the steel industry. The latch-string once out, other strikes would have been crowding for entrance immediately, and perhaps all the more readily because the Conference has no power whatever to give an authoritative decision. To take up any individual strike at all would be to go wholly aside from the purpose for which the Conference exists. To take up this particular strike would be to assume at the outset the point of view of one side in a question on which there is now the sharpest possible difference of opinion, whether arbitration can rightly be demanded in case of a strike organized and called by men not immediately connected many itself. It was simply the English "skill in making their own point of view plausible even to their opponent." The "English version that the submarine war was something immoral" gained support, he thinks, from Germany's display of a bad conscience in yielding for a time to America, still speaking from the standpoint of a neutral. An American might be disposed to feel slighted by the disposition of the Admiral to put the English stamp so exclusively upon the view that the submarine war was essentially immoral, but he at least gives us credit as apt pupils of the English moralists in this matter when he assigns to the submarine correspondence a large share of the responsibility for "the astonishing vehemence with which the American nation plunged into a war so foreign to its own interests." England and America are coupled side by side, however, in an unqualified tribute he pays to the energy and success of the Allied measures, which, he says, exceeded all the German fears, and increased at a rate far greater than that at which Germany was able to build U-boats. These measures, he calculates, had in the end reduced the destructive power of the individual U-boat to one-fifth of its earlier efficacy.

THE latest semi-official Japanese defence of the Shantung decision comes from Baron Shimpei Goto, a member of the Japanese Diplomatic Advisory Council. It is a curious blend of naiveté and guile. The Baron believes "that everybody is entitled to an honest opinion" and he is "glad that Japan has not attempted in any way to influence the opinion of the Senate." He has no desire to criticize the appearance of "various gentlemen" before the Senate committee on behalf of China. He is confident that the "leading publicists" understand the "real facts." President Wilson threw a "bright light" on these facts when he pointed out that Japan had promised to return everything—"except a few economic privileges." And the Baron adds, as if to show the magnanimity of Japan, she is going to "take China into partnership in the enjoyment of these privileges." She cannot say how soon this will be, because she "intends to settle the matter so promptly that it is impracticable to set a date." She will, after she has ratified the treaty, "ask Germany to hand over all documents concerning Shantung" and will then "submit to China a definite and liberal proposal." This train of thought is hard to follow. Why must Japan wait to see how much of a hold Germany had on Shantung before formulating her "liberal proposal," unless it be to see how much she herself can retain and yet give the semblance of liberality to her actions? Moreover, it never seems to penetrate the Japanese consciousness that the iniquity of her contention is due to the fact that the German claims are flatly stolen goods.

M. BRATIANO'S resignation following immediately after his refusal to sign the Peace Treaty with Austria was believed to be a diplomatic victory of the Supreme Council and a test case of its growing prestige. But subsequent events have put a different light on the matter. M. Bratiano is still at the head of the Government, and the Rumanian troops have not yet left Budapest. Their withdrawal is said to be made conditional on the acceptance by Hungary of a separate peace with Rumania, which will give the latter better satisfaction than the peace terms she has refused to sign. These did not give her the complete national unity to which she aspires, and contained some clauses relating to the rights of minorities and the right of transit which are felt by the Rumanians to be an infringement of their national dignity. Insistent rumors that reach us from the Balkans strengthen the suspicion that this defiant attitude of the Rumanian Government has its clue in the secret support of Italian diplomacy. It is even said that a secret treaty has been concluded between Rome and Bucharest, under which the Rumanians promise to hold the Jugoslavs in check in case of a clash between Italians and Serbs over the Adriatic issue. "However, the Supreme Council is confident of its ability to put at naught any agreement that might exist between the Rumanians and Hungarians," says a Paris correspondent in a special cable to the Times. It is some comfort to learn that the growing frequency of cases of open rebellion against the decisions of the Supreme Council has not been able to shake the Olympian confidence of that august body.

THE one big idea is making way in the world—Norway has adopted prohibition. But prohibition of a sort and in a way that will hardly commend itself to the professional promoters of that amiable doctrine in this country. Norway, which, like the other Scandinavian countries, had already made several highly intelligent efforts to deal with the problem of strong drink, first decides to make it literally a question of strong drink—wine and beer are definitely excluded from the operation of the law—and then proceeds to submit the whole matter to popular vote. Presumably, if it doesn't work, the law can by the same ready means be modified in either direction. It is said that the example of the United States exerted a good deal of influence upon Norway's decision. If so, it must have been chiefly as an illustration of how not to do it. It is quite true that the Fathers of American independence, when they established a representative government, did not contemplate the machinery of popular referendum. But neither did they contemplate such a monstrosity as the imbedding of prohibition in the Constitution of the United States.

THE Nation, reprinting Mr. Bynner's verses:

If this was our battle, if these were our ends,
Which were our enemies, which were our friends?

seems to be in search of information. If it speaks with editorial plurality, why quite obviously it has no enemies. The Bolsheviki of all tints, for whom, of course, it holds no brief, can not be counted among its enemies. The Presidents, Premiers, legislators, Governors, and Mayors who are trying to manage the affairs of the world under law are not enemies—they are merely wrong-headed individuals who must eventually yield control to others whom the Nation would more enthusiastically hail as friends. Who these friends are, the Nation should be in a better position to know than the public to which it appeals for enlightenment. If, again, by "our" the Nation means that nation from which in other days it took its name, it may be wondered whether the two have not now drifted so far apart as to destroy any identity of "ends" and thus to deprive the terms "friends" and "enemies" of any meaning. If, finally, by "our" the Nation means the One Big Nation, that is a concept that has not yet sufficiently defined itself to have attained the dignity of either "friends" or "enemies"—or "ends." The public might be imagined as responding metrically somewhat in this vein:

Our friends and our enemies? The answer depends
On whether you reckon our enemies friends.

AIR flights across the continent are not so spectacular as the single hop from shore to shore of the Atlantic, but they are in some respects more valuable. They are tests of the reliability of machines, of the ability of a large number of pilots to do an effective day's work in the clouds. It is not that one or two men display superhuman endurance; it is that something better than a dozen machines successfully make the journey. It is not the speed with which it is done; it is the amazement, if we were left with the capacity for amazement, that this thing is done at all. With so many starters there were bound to be some regrettable accidents. Flying is not yet a safe business; one has, among other things, to be born lucky to succeed at it. But the men who fall in an enterprise of this kind, unlike those who crush out their lives in automobile races, are sacrificing themselves in the forwarding of important work. The possibilities of aviation of the everyday, commercial sort are limited, no doubt, but still very great. When they are realized, as they are sure to be, the world will not be forgetful of the intrepid spirits whose collective efforts endowed it with wings.

THE war uncovered a multitude of charities, most of them well-intentioned, a few dishonest, and rather more than a few inefficient. And by no means all of these cease with the termination of hostilities on the Western front. One is still importuned through the mails to contribute to the housing of ex-soldiers and similar enterprises, and it is not always easy to decide whether or not such enterprises have a just claim on the public purse. Considerations of this sort justify the continuance of the National Information Bureau, whose first annual report has recently been issued. Organized during the war to protect the community war chests in the distribution of their funds, it has done good work in investigating and exposing such social and philanthropic agencies as did not deserve support, and in helping others that were astray in their object or their methods to take up a useful field and occupy it effectively. If the Bureau continues its work in the same spirit as in the past, it will deserve well of the generously-minded public.

The Danger of Deadlock

THE danger to which from the beginning the adoption of the Treaty has been exposed has centered in the fact that modifications, whether in the shape of reservations or amendments, are passed upon by a majority vote of the Senate, while the final act of ratification requires a two-thirds vote. Throughout the intermediate stage of the discussion there is in consequence of this circumstance no sharp concentration of responsibility for the final outcome. And yet by action taken in this intermediate stage the final outcome may be irretrievably determined. At this moment the danger of a fatal misstep remains as acute as it has been at any time in the whole course of the controversy. It is, therefore, to the avoidance of such a misstep that the efforts of all who realize the immense importance of getting the Treaty adopted must be insistently directed. A subversive amendment, or a reservation of such character as to have the effect of a subversive amendment, once adopted by a majority vote, the prospect of a favorable outcome will be almost desperate.

It is for this reason that we have so earnestly urged upon Senator Hitchcock the gravity of the responsibility which now rests upon him above all other men. It is idle to discuss the various possibilities which are exercising so many minds as regards the character of the President's illness. Hopes and fears concerning its seriousness are alike irrelevant to the practical situation which confronts the Senate. However unexpectedly rapid the President's progress in health may prove to be, it is a certainty that he cannot for many weeks be in a condition to exert that commanding influence upon the conduct of crucial affairs to which the country and the Senate had grown accustomed. If mischief is in the air, the task of meeting it rests upon the Senators themselves; and if the mischief is done it will be upon their conscience that the guilt will fall.

The immediate problem before the friends of the treaty is to secure the defeat of amendments which would throw it back for renewed consideration by the Conference of the Nations at Versailles. To take chances on the defeat of each individual amendment, when the margin is acknowledged by both sides to be exceedingly narrow, is to play a game of extreme hazard in a matter of transcendent concern to the safety and welfare of our country and of the whole world. The way to avoid this hazard is clear. It can be effected in no other way than by the Administration leaders coming to an understanding with those Republican Senators who are sincerely anxious for the prompt adoption of the Treaty, and who demand only, as a condition of their support, the adoption of carefully framed reservations which will safeguard the future of our own country, which involve no violation of the spirit of the Covenant, and which may be counted on to arouse no serious objection on the part of other nations. During the last two or three weeks such eminent Republicans as ex-President Taft and President Lowell of Harvard University have been exerting themselves to bring about such an understanding. The Massachusetts Republican Convention at its recent meeting adopted a resolution pointing emphatically in the same direction. That there should be in the Republican party at large, and within the ranks of the Republicans in the Senate itself, so strong an element favorable to this rational and feasible settlement is a circumstance extraordinarily fortunate for the Democrats. To fail to make the most of the opportunity thus presented to them would be to manifest a most deplorable inability for sound statesmanship.

We do not presume to prescribe the exact procedure by which such an understanding should be arrived at and made effective, nor even the exact terms of the understanding itself. Fundamentally it must coincide pretty closely with the position declared by the original group of "mild reservationists," or that declared by Senator McCumber immediately after the presentation of the majority and minority reports of the Foreign Relations Committee. In the time that has since passed there has been apparently some drifting of the McCumber group toward a portion of Senator Lodge's position, especially as regards the wording of the reservation relating to Article X of the Covenant. But obviously the situation is still plastic, and surely it cannot be impossible for the earnest desire of the moderate reservationists and the urgent need of the Administration Senators to be made to conspire together toward the adoption of a basis satisfactory to both. With this accomplished, and the safety of the treaty seen plainly to be dependent upon faithful coöperation between these two elements, there could no longer be any doubt of the defeat of any proposals, whether in the shape of amendments or reservations, which would endanger the final result. The majority stage of the controversy being thus safely passed, the country's attention would be fixed as it never yet has been upon the simple question of acceptance or rejection of the

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.

Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

EDITORS

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

treaty; and upon this question there can be no doubt that public sentiment would be manifested in such overwhelming fashion as to remove all doubt—if any should then exist—of the obtaining of the requisite two-thirds vote for the approval of the Treaty.

So plain are the requirements of this situation that we should feel no doubt as to the actual course of events, were it not for the possibility that action may be paralyzed by consideration of the President's part in the matter. Under ordinary circumstances, loyalty to such understanding as Mr. Hitchcock may have had with the President would properly serve as a bar to the taking up of any course of action concerning which his approval might be doubtful. But no one has insisted more ardently than the President himself upon the fatal danger involved in delay. To wait for his complete recovery is out of the question; to halt in paralyzing hesitation on the chance of some stray word from him when at best he can give to the momentous question but feeble and fragmentary consideration, would be equally repugnant to the plain dictates of common sense. It is now, and not months or even weeks hence, that the decision must be made. Let us hope that the courage and patriotism necessary to the making of it will not be found wanting.

The Conference Under Way

WITH the position of the three groups of the Labor Conference in Washington presented in the form of general proposals, it is natural to endeavor to take stock of the prospect of a fruitful outcome of the meeting. In favor of such a prospect must undoubtedly be placed the evidence, to be seen in the proposals themselves as well as in the general atmosphere, of a sincere desire for coöperation and good understanding. Nothing provocative—not to speak of anything pugnacious or incendiary—is to be seen either in the substance or the language of the statements of either the labor group or the employers' group. And the best of it is that there is no surprise in all this; on the contrary, we have grown so accustomed to the idea that mutual good-will is the indispensable requisite of the welfare of all concerned that it seems almost superfluous to mention it. The suggestion formally made by Mr. Frederick P. Fish, of the employers' group, that all the delegates should think in terms of the general good, and not of the good of any group, was not a mere bit of pious language, but reflected a genuine and active purpose which, though not absolutely, yet within wide limits, animates a large proportion of the membership of the Conference.

Next in order among the favorable elements of the situation is the acceptance by the employers' group of the idea of adequate participation by labor in the discussion and settlement of disputed questions arising in any industrial establishment. This acceptance is, indeed, cautiously worded, and is accompanied by the statement that "there should be no improper limitation or impairment of the exercise by management of its essential function of judgment and direction"; but for a starting-point in the discussion of ways and means to achieve the purpose it does very well. The rapidity with which this idea has spread throughout the country is not only gratifying in itself, but is full of encouragement as showing the reasonable spirit with which, in these days, any practicable proposal having genuine merit can count upon being met. And it is upon this spirit, rather than upon the magic efficiency of any one particular device, that we must reckon for that progress toward industrial peace and harmony which has become one of the most urgent immediate needs of the world.

But it would be a mistake to suppose that the central difficulties whose existence has been the occasion for the calling of the Conference will be found other than formidable. The specific points upon which the employers' group and the labor group are seen to be in agreement are not those upon which the portentous struggles in the industrial world have turned. Anything that improves the daily relations between employers and employed will tend to avert such struggles, and in the long run progressive improvement of this kind may eliminate them altogether. But for the present, and for a long time to come, we must be prepared for the menace of such clashes, and the most crucial problem of the day is how to deal with them when they arise. On this great question it must be confessed that the employers' group and the labor group are very wide apart.

And the reason of their difference is deep-seated. The spirit of trade-unionism, as it has thus far been developed, is bent upon the closed shop as its goal and upon the maintenance of the formidable power of national organizations as its instrument; and on both these points the employers stand in sharp opposition to the unions. The unions, it is true, do not demand the closed shop as an explicit part of their programme, and the employers' group in the Conference expressly assent to the closed shop whenever it may be the result of voluntary agreement between an employer and his workers. But this does not do away with the underlying facts. The problem of how to settle a difference which turns not on questions of wages, or hours, or shop conditions, but on the principle of the closed shop, or on the principle of the right of national labor organizations to interpose in the affairs of an establishment whose management prefers not to be subject to their control, remains for the present just where it was. How to meet this difficulty is the toughest job with which the Conference has to deal.

There is a strong temptation to deny the existence of any inherent conflict of interest between the three parties to the work of production—those who supply the capital, those who supply the management and intellectual direction, and those who supply the manual labor. It is perfectly true, and it needs constantly to be re-asserted and re-emphasized, that all three of the parties, as well as the public at large, have a common interest in the increase of productivity. The income of all, the welfare of all, depends on the magnitude of the aggregate product. Whatever diminishes that product cuts down the possibilities of wages just as it cuts down the possibilities of interest on investment, of profit on enterprise, of reward for the contributions of managing ability, of invention, and of intellectual endeavor generally. No error has been more unfortunate, and none has been more persistent, than that which has so largely possessed the minds of workmen, and has so constantly influenced the policy of organized labor, that the condition of the working people can be improved by "making work"—that is, by diminishing the output of the productive effort of the world. To extirpate that error is one of the most necessary of the tasks before the educators of public opinion. Until it is recognized as a fundamental truth that labor and capital and enterprise have an absolutely common interest in the increase of the joint output, every effort for true and whole-hearted coöperation will labor under a terrible handicap. But while this is the truth, it is not the whole truth.

While labor and capital are alike helped by every increase of productivity and hurt by every restriction upon it, the interests of each are also affected by the terms upon which the joint product is divided between them. To deny this is to shut one's eyes to facts, and to interpose a barrier to the possibilities of that real understanding which can come only from a frank acknowledgment of facts. What is true in spite of this conflict of interests is that there are very sharp limits within which any adjustment must be confined, if it is to work out in practice. Arbitrary determinations of rates of wages or hours or methods of work break down in the face of the underlying conditions for successful business. And except in cases where an undue control of conditions, an essentially monopolistic control, is lodged in either side, those conditions will of themselves, though doubtless with some delay, come very near to bringing about as good an adjustment as can be made by outside decree. In the main, what can be accomplished by the interposition of the machinery of arbitration and conciliation, or by the decisions of any governmental authority, is the prevention of temporary injustice.

But though these ameliorative agencies cannot accomplish results of fundamental or transcendent importance, the degree of importance that they do have is such that workingmen cannot be expected to be indifferent to their benefit. Neither can they be expected to forgo their desire to gain what can be gained, and to resort to strikes for the purpose, if no better means are available. But strikes are an agency too terribly wasteful, and so productive of consequences even more evil than waste, that every possible endeavor must be made to reduce their occurrence to an absolute minimum. No one can rightly say that there is nothing to fight about; but it can be said with perfect truth that the objects to be obtained by strikes are usually magnified in the workers' minds to a point amounting to delusion. To bring them to see these things in their true proportion is one of the great desiderata of the time. To have them viewed by employers in a like reasonable spirit is another. And to provide agencies by which those difficulties that persist in spite of this reasonableness—or in the absence of it—may be got over rationally and peacefully is the third. Let us hope that the Conference will bring about a great advance in regard to all three.

Guarding the Trans-Siberian

A NEW development in the Siberian situation places squarely before the American Government the necessity of making a decision of incalculable importance. It is not too much to say that upon this decision rests the future position of the United States in the Pacific, and it may easily determine whether America shall be permitted to develop her international relations in accordance with the hopes of a new world order eloquently voiced at Paris, or whether we shall be forced into a programme of unprecedented competitive armament. The crisis is not the less epochal because it is not spectacular. Its deep seriousness, perhaps, lies in that very fact, since our people are not only unconscious of the danger, but popular opinion seems inclined to obstruct any action to meet it.

The new situation has arisen out of the decision to repatriate the Czechoslovakian soldiers. These valiant troops, by a series of heroic exploits scarcely equalled in the war, enabled the Russians of Siberia to throw off the Bolshevik yoke. At the time, they were on their way to Vladivostok, en route to the Western front in France. At the request of the Allies, and in the belief that they were thereby aiding their own country to achieve its independence, they turned back and took up again the struggle against the Germans and Bolsheviks in the Ural and on the Volga. Soon after the signing of the armistice, they were withdrawn from the front and since last December have taken no part in the fighting. More recently, their services have been utilized in the guarding of a considerable section of the Trans-Siberian Railroad west of Irkutsk. Out of their withdrawal from this section has arisen the serious problem that confronts us.

On March 19, the Allies and the United States entered into an agreement concerning the Trans-Siberian Railroad, and in connection therewith took on themselves the obligation of protecting the line and keeping it open. The Omsk Government must now meet the situation. It can not, in justice to the Russian people, withdraw troops from the front to replace the Czechoslovaks on the section held by them. In fact, they feel that they ought to take Russian troops who are now guarding the railway and send them to the front in order to complete, if possible, the overthrow of the Bolshevik régime before winter. They have called to the attention of the Allies and America the obligation in regard to the railroad above referred to, and note that, of the countries concerned, the task must devolve upon America or Japan. If America is unwilling, or unable, to supply the troops to protect the line as agreed, then Japan is ready to do so, for a consideration.

The outcome of this arrangement can be clearly foreseen. Hitherto, Japan has not sent troops west of Irkutsk, and has contented herself with acquiring a predominant position in Eastern Siberia. From the standpoint of American interests this is sufficiently serious, although the presence of a small number of American troops guarding the line east of Irkutsk keeps alive the agreement entered into with Japan, by the terms of which the interests of the Russians were safeguarded. If Japan were to undertake the task of guarding the railroad west of Irkutsk, the whole of Siberia would be put at her disposal, and the withdrawal of our troops would at the same time terminate our agreement. The immediate effect would be to establish the closed door in Siberia. This is serious enough for American economic interests, but there are other consequences of more vital importance to be anticipated. First and foremost, it would mean the triumph of the military party in Japan, and by success justify the pretensions of their imperialistic policy. Any hope that we may have cherished of resuscitating China and maintaining her political and economic independence would vanish. Shantung would become a mere incident in a vast programme. The penetration of European Russia by Germans, resulting naturally in a German orientation of Russian policy, would inevitably bring together Germany and Japan.

This is not written in a spirit unfriendly to Japan herself. We realize the struggle that is going on there, and we hope for the triumph of that progressive element which will work in harmony with our own ideals of a new world order. We deprecate the success of that element which would pattern its policy after the aggressive militaristic plans of Prussia, and for which the aims of Germany were an ideal. It is therefore in a spirit of what we believe to be true friendship, and a desire to serve the best interests of the Japanese people, that we point out the menace of the Japanese occupation of Siberia. Our public is utterly unaware of the grave questions involved. They are inclined to regard Siberia as a distant land, whose problems concern us but little. There is an insistent demand in some circles for a recall of American troops from Siberia, and these circles seem to think that by the presence of these troops we are taking an unwarranted part in a domestic conflict and fighting for one Russian party as against another. But it cannot be long before the true significance of the struggle will be apparent. The Pacific is sometimes spoken of as the ocean of the future. Certainly America's interests in the Pacific and in the open door in the Orient are of the highest importance. The question of whether we shall have imposed upon us the necessity of competition in armament, and an eventual conflict of gigantic dimensions, may well rest upon a wise decision in regard to our Russian policy at the present moment. In this connection it should not be overlooked that the restored independent national Russian state, in control not only of European Russia but also of Siberia, and well disposed toward ourselves, can alone make possible the maintenance of peace in the Far East, with all that that means for the future of the world.

The Baltic Menace to Peace

THE situation in the Baltic illustrates pointedly the futility of attempting to deal with the realities of international relations on the basis of general formulas. The doctrine of self-determination sounds well in the abstract, but its application to the Baltic provinces of Russia at once exposes its absurdity as a cast-iron rule in practice. Racial groups must have attained a certain degree of nationality before they can determine themselves, and they must furthermore stand in certain satisfactory economic and political relationships with regard to their neighbors if there is to be predicated for them the possibility of independent existence. The idea that there could be set up in eastern Europe a series of new nations that would serve as buffer states was a chimera unworthy of experienced statesmen. They should have recognized from the start the fact that such states could not stand alone, but must be maintained by outside power; that they must ultimately lean upon either Germany or Russia, and while theoretically independent, they must be the object of intrigue from both sides.

It may well be that Allied policy in the Baltic, which now faces a disastrous crisis, was based upon this fatuous theory of self-determination instead of on the realities of the actual situation. At the time that the armistice was signed, the Bolshevik armies were powerful and it was justly feared that if the Baltic provinces were evacuated by the Germans, they would be immediately occupied by the Reds. Consequently, a supplementary clause provided that the German troops should remain there until directed by the Allied Council to withdraw. The supposition was that the Allies would furnish their own troops to replace the Germans and thus stabilize conditions and avert the danger of a further spread of the Bolshevik power. They took no steps to do this, however, and the German forces have remained.

These German forces were undoubtedly themselves considerably demoralized, following the armistice, but General von der Goltz has brought order out of chaos and has constituted an effective and well-equipped fighting force. Five years of warfare by a militaristic nation have produced large numbers of professional soldiers, who, on the conclusion of peace, were without occupation, and who needed little encouragement to join von der Goltz, who could offer them the inducement of pay and the prospect of acquiring land. It is evident that the German Government connived at this, if it did not indeed actively aid it. It is clear, from the communications that have passed between Paris and Berlin, that the German Government has been paying these soldiers, and it has probably also furnished them with munitions.

The army of von der Goltz in the Baltic occupies a strong strategic position for the carrying out of three well-defined aims. In the first place, it stands ready to support a restoration to power of the former ruling class of Germany. The Moderate Socialist Government is at best an experiment, and is not likely under present conditions to function with a degree of efficiency that can satisfy the demands made upon it. The German people, unlike Americans, do not consider voting and holding office as the great desiderata of national existence. Their purposes have not changed and they recall with regret the disappearance of an administration under which they enjoyed order and prosperity. The leaders of Germany know this and, biding their time, count on the army of von der Goltz as the power that will, sooner or later, restore them to authority.

The second obvious aim is to espouse the cause of the Balts, or German landholding aristocracy, in the Baltic provinces as against the Esthonian and Lettish peasants. There is not space here to enter into a discussion of the agrarian question in the Baltic provinces and the interplay of local political factions. It is sufficient to note that the forces of von der Goltz have found themselves strong enough to attack Riga and, in a considerable region, to put an end to the aspirations of the agrarian population. There is evident the intention to restore the old conditions of German landlordism and perhaps also to colonize Baltic lands with German soldiers.

It is the third aim, however, which most gravely concerns the world at large. This is the German design upon Russia. The German troops were, of course, an obstacle to the extension of Bolshevik power, even while they were oppressing the local inhabitants. It is not to be assumed that von der Goltz is to-day any less hostile to Bolshevik theory and practice. But conditions in Soviet Russia have greatly changed, and the position of von der Goltz and the strong army under his command is such as to give him the possibility of playing a dominant rôle in the Russian situation, as it is likely to develop in the near future.

Every German, regardless of political affiliation, realizes clearly that the great hope of restoring Germany to its former prosperity and power lies in the exploitation of the rich resources of Russia. There is no repentance in Germany, no inclination to accept new formulas for a better world order. The Germans recognize that they have, for the time being, failed to achieve that for which they set out in the war; but they see further in the blunders of Allied policy toward Russia the possibility of renewing the struggle at a later date, with far better prospects of success. They were willing to use the Bolsheviks as their tools for disintegrating the Russian armies and reducing Russia to impotence. They played with the Soviet leaders as long as it suited their interests to do so. They knew that the Soviet power could not last, and that eventually a government must be set up out of the sane elements. A year ago, they negotiated with the anti-Bolshevik leaders in Russia and proposed, under certain conditions, to break with the Bolsheviks and back their opponents in setting up a new government. Their position to-day is clear. They expect Trotsky and Zinoviev to fall, and they see before them a chaotic Russia, needing restoration of order by a firm hand, and reorganization of administration and industry. For these tasks they expect to be called, not only because they have scores of thousands of men fitted by Russian experience for this work, but also because feeling in Russia has set strongly against the Allies, thanks to their failure to save Russia from the horrors of Bolshevik rule.

The army of von der Goltz stands ready and expectant to answer the demand for the restoration of order. The only thing that can stand in their way is the triumph of Kolchak and Denikin and the restoration of the national Russian state. But even this may be turned to their advantage. The failure of the Allies to give timely aid to these forces may force them to come to terms with the Germans. The insidious propaganda of the latter has, on the one hand, made it extremely difficult for the Allies to secure support at home for the policy of liberal aid to Kolchak, and on the other hand has caused many of his followers to advocate a rapprochement with the Germans because of the failure of the Allies to furnish any effective aid.

What are the Allies doing to meet the situation? The Council at Paris has demanded that Berlin recall the German troops from the Baltic, and Berlin temporizes. It is problematical if the German Government could exercise sufficient authority over the army of von der Goltz to withdraw it, even if it honestly desired to do so. A partial blockade in the Baltic has been ordered, but there is no reason to expect that this will be entirely effective as far as von der Goltz is concerned, and it may even lead to the seizure of Danzig. It is suggested that Great Britain may supply the Letts and Es-thionians with munitions, to enable them to press back the Germans, but this will meet with great opposition at home. Not one of the Allies is in a position to-day to send a military force to oust the German army. Berlin now reports that von der Goltz has relinquished his command to General Eberhardt and is returning to Berlin. This may mean a backing down from the position above outlined, or it may be playing for time, awaiting the Bolshevik collapse. On the other hand it would appear that fresh recruits are making their way eastward and ostensibly joining the Russian forces.

It need not be pointed out that the situation is fraught with danger to the future peace of Europe. The very example of an independent army operating at will in eastern Europe and laughing to scorn the fulminations of the Council at Paris deals a terrible blow at its prestige. If the situation is allowed to continue, the present peace can only be regarded as a truce, and we must expect Germany's struggle for domination to be resumed when the resources and manpower of Russia shall have been marshaled under German control. It is still possible that a sane policy of energetic support to the constructive forces of Russia under the Omsk Government may save the situation, but the present moves in that direction offer no basis for optimism.

What Has Become of the Debtor Class?

A QUARTER of a century ago, when the free-silver agitation was at its height, and "the crime of 1873" was the rallying-cry of the friends of the people, it was in the name of the outraged "debtor class" that the cry was most passionately raised. The masters of the financial world, the great money magnates, we were told, had decreed that the purchasing power of the dollar should be doubled—in other words that prices, and especially the price of wheat, should be cut in two—and had thus deliberately and heartlessly condemned every man who was in debt to pay twice what he had borrowed. The farmers, above all, were being crushed by this doubling of the weight of their mortgages; and in a vague and undefined way the poor in general were represented as being compelled to pay this unrighteous tribute to the rich. Few went to the trouble of thinking out the question whether—apart from the case of the farmer, whose grievance undoubtedly was a real one—there was any considerable "debtor class" among the poor. There was a natural association of ideas between the words rich man and creditor on the one hand and poor man and debtor on the other; and this sufficed the popular orator and the man in the street. The world was supposed to be full of poor men whose load of debt had been grievously increased by the rise in the value of the dollar.

During the last eight or ten years the dollar has been falling in value far more rapidly than it ever rose in the period following the demonetization of silver, "the crime of 1873"; and during the last two or three years the fall of the dollar's value has been going on with a rapidity which throws altogether into the shade anything that was experienced during the period of its rise. The air is filled with complaints of high prices, in comparison with which the outcries about low prices in the '80s and '90s were as a summer breeze in comparison with a winter storm. But who has heard a word of joy over the deliverance that has come to the debtor class? For any mention that has been made of it in public discussion, it might as well be non-existent. What has become of it? Are there no debtors? Is nobody being made happy by his obligations being cut in two? Is all the flood of talking and writing about the hardships of high prices, we do not recall having seen a single allusion to the compensation which the poor man is finding in the lightening of the burden of his debt. Yet every agriculturist who has a mortgage on his farm, and every workingman who has a mortgage on his home, has his burden of debt lessened to-day in precisely the same way (and in a much greater degree) as he had it increased twenty-five or thirty years ago. The farmer who is getting double prices for his crops, the workingman whose wage has been doubled, will pay off any debts he may have contracted by turning over the number of dollars named in the contract and no more; and those dollars mean only half as many bushels of wheat, or only half the number of days' labor, that they did. But never a word do we hear of the matter.

Doubtless one reason for this silence is that mankind are much more prone to be vociferous over grievances than over benefits. It is not only in the matter of debts that we hear little about the multitudes that are gainers by the régime of high prices. We do, of course, hear in ample volume about the rich who have profited, the men who have made fortunes through the rise of prices; but this is by way of complaint and accusation, not of rejoicing. From the millions of farmers who are getting unheard-of prices for wheat and cotton—prices vastly more than compensating all increase in their expenses—we fail to discover any loud voices of thanksgiving. Among the wage-earning classes, though on the whole they have probably not received a rise of pay sufficient to match the increased money-cost of living, there are great numbers—probably millions in all—whose wages have risen far more than prices have; yet one has to listen pretty carefully to catch any note of satisfaction rising above the general chorus of discontent. Those who are hurt cry out; those who are better off than ever either keep silent or clamor for more. This is merely human nature, no doubt, and it would be idle to find fault with it; yet it is well to take note of it as a fact.

But in this matter of the debtor class and the fall in the value of the dollar, there is, over and above this general consideration, something special, something peculiar to the case. The fall in the value of the dollar has been, certainly in large measure and probably in an altogether predominant degree, brought about by the increase in the volume of the monetary medium—of actual circulating currency and of credit which serves equally with currency to swell the medium of payments. This enormous expansion of the monetary medium has come about, indeed, under the stress of war; but the great financial magnates, the same class who were held guilty of the alleged "crime of 1873," have been quite as acquiescent in the process, quite as much principals or accessories in the crime—if crime there was—as they were in the demonetization of silver. They professed innocence in the earlier case; they denied that in favoring the gold-standard policy, it had been part of their intention to increase the burdens of debtors, to press upon the brow of labor a crown of thorns, to crucify mankind upon a cross of gold. There was, indeed, an obvious and deplorable hardship in the case; but it had come about as an incident in a natural development and not as the result of a sinister conspiracy. In the minds of the Bryanite "friends of the people," however, nothing was more certain than that the fall of the dollar was the result of a dark plot entered into by the great magnates of the creditor class for the purpose of swelling their riches by doubling the debts of the poor. This it was that gave to the "debtor class" cry all its shrillness and intensity. But what are the friends of the people to do when precisely the opposite thing happens—when the financial policy of the world has been such as to make the dollar cheaper instead of dearer, to make the burden of debt lighter instead of heavier? Manifestly, the only thing to do is to say nothing at all about it—and that is what they have done.

The Syrian Question

THE armies of the Allied and Associated Powers, having set out to vanquish the monster of Prussian militarism, have met with adventures more strange and incredible than we read of in the mediæval romances of knight-errantry. In order to kill the terrible beast in the centre of Europe, they had first to cut off its gigantic tentacles with which it had tried to get hold of remote lands in the east and south. One it had stretched across the Bosphorus towards Bagdad and the Persian Gulf; another, across Syria, towards Jerusalem and Egypt. Allenby, like a modern Gawain, severed them from the dragon's body, and rescued the lands from their convulsive grip. They had been fertile plains in days of yore, until the Turks came and turned them by misrule into a desert. To reclaim the wilderness and restore it to its former fertility is one of the great tasks which the Allied and Associated Powers have set themselves, an ambitious and overwhelming task, to which M. R. Pinon devotes an interesting article in the Revue des Deux Mondes of September 1. For here from utter ruin a new life must be recreated reminiscent of the prosperous days when Cicero was a Governor in Cilicia and Rome made her power a safeguard for the welfare of the various races under her sway.

That safeguard the Sublime Porte has never given to the raias, the vanquished whom the Ottomans had enslaved. The centralized administration of the Porte had slight regard for the needs and wishes of its non-Turkish subjects. And under Young-Turkish rule, which was established in 1908 in the name of democracy and while the Marseillaise was sung in the streets of Constantinople, those alien races fared even worse than before. As worthy pupils and tools of their German instructors, the Young Turks aimed at a systematic Ottomanization of the country, either by the planting of Turkish colonies among the foreign populations or by the wholesale extermination of the obnoxious race. The presence of these non-Turkish elements—thus they excused their inhuman policy—was an ever-ready pretext for European Powers to interfere in the internal affairs of the Ottoman Empire. So Talaat and Djemal Pasha led in a new policy of denationalizing alien minorities—a term and a method invented by their Prussian masters, whose pan-German aspirations suggested to the Young-Turkish statesmen their pan-Turkish policy. Fortunately, it resulted in the very opposite of what they had expected: far from tightening the unity of the Empire, it led to its disintegration. The Arabs, exasperated by the wholesale hanging, at Djemal Pasha's command, of Moslem notables in Syria, rose up in arms under Hussein, the Sherif of Mecca, who in June, 1916, proclaimed himself independent King of the Hedjaz, and joined the Allies in hostilities against the Turks.

Great Britain realized the importance of this new assistant and made her appreciation manifest by recognizing him in his self-assumed dignity. England saw in his Arab state, or in a confederation of Arab states under his rule, a counterpoise to the power of a Germanized Constantinople. But the interests of France were also involved in the effects of Hussein's revolt: it opened for her a chance of re-establishing her former position in the Levant. These common interests induced the two Allied Powers to conclude the Convention of May, 1916, signed by M. Cambon and Sir Edward Grey, by which a line of demarcation was drawn between the French and the British spheres of influence in those parts. To France were assigned Syria, Cilicia, and a broad strip of territory extending eastward as far as the Persian frontier; to England Mesopotamia and Palestine, which latter country was deemed by British strategists to be indispensable to her for the protection of Egypt. The wishes of the population were apparently not consulted by the signatories. According to Mr. Ameen Rihani, a Syrian by birth, who some time ago contributed an article to the Review on "The American Commission in Syria," the people, though otherwise at odds on various questions, are of one accord as to the principle "that Syria and Palestine shall remain one and undivided."

The course of events following the conclusion of the Convention in May, 1916, seemed propitious to the realization of that principle. For while France devoted all her concentrated energy on the struggle along the western front, Great Britain, in order to counter a Turkish-German move against Egypt and to recover her prestige from the shame of Kut-el-Amara, entered upon a great military expedition conducted by General Allenby. Both aims were attained in a surprisingly short period. Palestine, assigned to England's sphere of influence by the Convention of 1916, was conquered from the Turks, and on November 2, 1917, Mr. Balfour conveyed to Lord Rothschild, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the famous declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which lent a moral justification to England's claim of a mandate over Palestine. The brilliant success of Allenby's campaign, however, stimulated the minds of British colonial officers to a new conception: the formation, under British auspices, of a great Arab Empire encompassing all the territories between the Mediterranean and the Persian frontier. Prince Faisal, the son of King Hussein and his father's representative at the Conference in Paris, was believed to be the British candidate for the pan-Arab throne, a rumor which gained support from the fact that, after the definitive victory of Allenby's armies, he was allowed to enter with his Arabs the city of Damascus, where he tried to establish his rule over Aleppo and the whole of Syria.

This development threatened to disturb the friendship between the two Allied Powers. The French press was loud in declaiming against England's ambiguous colonial policy. "What position does Great Britain pretend to take in that part of Asia?" asked l'Europe Nouvelle two months ago, "that of Allenby and his colonial troops or that which the House of Commons appears to have adopted by ratifying, almost without discussion, the alliance with France against any attack by Germany? The British Premier must declare whether or not the Empire conducts two different policies, one for continental and the other for colonial use, the former all friendship and cordiality towards France, the latter secret, false, and selfish." The publication of the secret Anglo-Persian treaty supplied this anti-British agitation with a welcome pretext for redoubled fulmination against the perfidy of Great Britain's colonial policy. The Government in London realized the danger of a rupture with France over the Syrian issue, and, satisfied with its diplomatic success in Persia, assured the French ally, by public utterances of such leading men as Lord Curzon and Lord Allenby, of Great Britain's honest intention to recognize France as the mandatory for Syria. An agreement between the two countries regulating the conditions for the evacuation of Syria by the British gave effect to these promises, and was praised by the Temps as an exemplary solution of the problem.

Another motive, besides the wish to keep the friendly relations with France unimpaired, may have caused the British Government to steer clear of a Syrian policy initiated on the spot by over-zealous pioneers of the Empire. Recent developments in Egypt and India, where jealousy of the favor shown to Prince Faisal and his aspirations towards a Pan-Arab realm had aroused a seditious agitation for autonomy among the politically immature masses, must have revealed to the British statesmen at home the dangers involved in this pan-Arab scheme. The greed and the passions bred by all this pan-tribal propaganda, whether it be called pan-Germanism, pan-Slavism, or pan-Arabism, are bound to lead to disaster. Inordinate desires on the one side and suspicion and jealousy on the other must, in the end, come to a clash in which the works of civilization are threatened with ruin. Europe has paid too dearly for this lesson not to be on her guard against a renewal of such a conflict among the untutored races of Asia.

A. J. BARNOUW

Obstacle Races

THERE is a new drink. I heard of it only yesterday; I have never tasted it myself, and indeed the report I got of it was only second-hand. My informant had never tasted it, either. There is nothing in it that it is not perfectly legitimate to buy. Each constituent element is as innocent as a white ribbon; but the mingled sum thereof, I am told, will obliterate regrets for the cocktail. No; I am not—for every reason—going to name those constituent elements. In the first place, I cannot prove the beverage to be all that is claimed for it, and I should not like, therefore, to sponsor it; in the second, if it is a really good thing, I am not going to help to get any one of those innocent elements prohibited by the Anti-Saloon League. I have too many strictly temperate and highly moral friends who are hard hit by the Prohibition Amendment, as it is.

The note of civilized comment on present-day conditions is, as one would expect, a note of lamentation. Not merely "prohibition," of course: that is unimportant in itself, though as a "case," it is infinitely instructive. Also, it may as well be admitted that in the present state of the world's affairs, we must develop a new kind of optimism—one that even professional pessimists might consent to adopt; an optimism that confesses most things to be for the worst, and proceeds happily to beat the devil round the bush. Nothing but love of adventure, love of an obstacle, and sense of humor will create this kind of optimism. It is not of the chaste Candide type: the optimist of the immediate future will have to combine the resourcefulness of a Gil Blas with the opportunism of a Mrs. Wiggs. He will have to take the world as stark fun, and also as a tremendous incentive to ingenuity. Some of our dignity will go by the board. I fancy that we shall have to be more like Gil Blas than like Mrs. Wiggs, in the end. Every sort of difficulty is put in our way, and it is up to us to find means to jump over the rolling barrel and circumambulate the vagrant cow in our path. We shall not be stately, doing it; but in order to get the barrel and the cow officially removed, we shall have to show that they are of no avail to stop us. When I say "we," I mean the bulk of our citizens. The critics, of course, are going to sit back and—criticize.

We are faced with this situation: a desperate attempt on the part of those in power in all civilized countries to make it hard for people to do as they choose—whether they choose to make war, or get rich, or drink a highball. The people at large will not like it particularly, and they are going to develop an ingenuity they have never hitherto needed, in order that those obstacles shall be no let or hindrance to the accomplishment of their desires. Sometimes the difficulties will be met in the spirit of Edison, sometimes in the spirit of Raffles. But meanwhile the legislators—even the demagogues, perhaps—will learn a great deal about human nature. In that sense, the not very beautiful evaders of the law will have served a moral purpose. Therein will the new optimists find their account.

It is a commonplace of political criticism that the Anglo-Saxon communities have been a good deal given to writing laws that could not be enforced. The statutes were a concession to the moralists, the lax enforcement a concession to human nature. If prohibition is a good instance, an illuminating case, to cite, that is because it illustrates so well the complexity of the administrative problem. It does not really outrage any one very much that a temperate man should have a glass of wine with his dinner. The only intellectually respectable "prohibitionist" is the man who thinks that the temperate man should give up his glass of wine as a means to an end—the end being the suppression of drunkenness throughout the land. That may be the true duty of the temperate man. But you cannot forever carry out legislation in this spirit. You cannot legislate, that is, so that crime shall be made impossible. All that you can do is to make the way of the criminal exceedingly uncomfortable. You can make a murder a very perilous pastime for the murderer; but in order to make murder impossible, you would have to deprive the butcher of his cleaver, the whaler of his harpoon, the trained nurse of her disinfectants, the mining engineer of his dynamite, perhaps the milliner of her hatpins. Almost anything is a deadly weapon if you choose to examine all its possibilities. Must we therefore go meatless, corsetless, coalless, and bonnetless? Because the colored race has a fondness for the razor as a lethal weapon should we pass a Federal amendment prohibiting the manufacture of any but safety razors—with which, I am told, it is practically impossible to wound any one but oneself?

No, we cannot make all undesirable behavior impossible by law. Laws, in that case, would be more absurd than they are. The reformers ought to realize that they have got hold of the wrong principle. There is no use, however, in endeavoring to impress the reformers; for they persist in taking the darkest view of human nature, and the rosiest view of the perfectibility of human nature by statute. They are incredibly illogical. And, as practical politicians, they leave much to be desired. Individualism is very strong in the race, and as strong, certainly, in the Anglo-Saxon branch as anywhere else. Also, in Americans, at least, the imp of the perverse and the sporting spirit are unconquerable. We rather like to hit our enemies, and even more we love to circumvent fools—especially when fools pull a long face. On the other hand, we are essentially a law-abiding people, thanks to the tradition we inherit from our British forebears. Also, we are immensely good-natured, and we do not spend our time in looking for trouble. But our sense of humor is perhaps over-developed. We will often, for sheer fun, go beyond a point where, strictly speaking, fun stops. Mark Twain is a very typical exponent of American humor; and to realize that it is general Anglo-Saxon humor as well, we need only recall that Oxford gave an honorary degree to the creator of Tom Sawyer. Imagine the average Frenchman, the average Italian, or any Spaniard, face to face with Tom and Huck! As for a Russian thus confronted, he would probably commit suicide. That the type of Tom and Huck is dear to the American heart is evidenced also by the popularity of Penrod and his peers.

Now we all remember what Tom Sawyer did when he was told to whitewash the fence. Most readers have spent their admiration on the fact that he got the other boys to do the work. Equally important is the fact that Tom did not whitewash the fence himself. The law said that he was to do it. But he did not. He evaded the law in so far as it concerned him, although he affected a proper respect for it by getting the fence done. Tom really did not care whether the fence was painted or not, as long as he did not have to paint it. He got, therefore, what he wanted; but, characteristically, by circumvention, not by defiance. That was very American of Tom. We are respectful of the law—we treat it as politely as though it were an aunt—but if we do not like it, we will get round it, as far as we ourselves are concerned. No, we will not break it: we will merely circumvent it. So far, so good: for of course when legislators leave a way out, they must expect that way to be taken if human ingenuity can discover it. Unfortunately some of us are apt to go a little farther. If a law is so palpably unreasonable that circumvention is a positive virtue, and at some moment the means of circumvention are not there, we will—ever so gently—fracture it. But there is no doubt that, as a people, we prefer to “get round” it. For we are law-abiding. And the honest fact is that we take a peculiar pleasure in evading a law that is popularly considered absurd. We like to show up its hypocrisy and its essential weakness. It is rather a point of humorous honor with us to find its weak spots. There is something side-splitting about a statute that can be broken in the spirit while the letter is kept. The nation of the comic supplement could not be expected to treat such an one respectfully. And just because we have such real respect for the foundations of law, we have very little respect for legislation which is mere travesty. We go beyond the statute-books to the reason that lies behind the statute, and if it seems to be a good reason, no one keeps the statute better than the typical American. But meanwhile legislation is apt to get cannily humorous treatment from the unconvinced.

Now the prohibitionists—to take our famous contemporary case—have made a good deal of bad blood. In the first place, they have outraged the political sense of serious people by getting something into the Constitution which the Constitution was never meant to hold: a sumptuary law. They have turned that highly respectable document, which we were all brought up to revere, into a Beatrice Fairfax column. The daily papers are full of suggestions from correspondents as to possible subjects of Federal amendments, such as short-skirted and low-necked dresses, gum-chewing, and the playing of gramophones in apartment houses. Whether they are sincere or sarcastic, they are perfectly logical. There is no reason why objectors to chewing gum should not work for an amendment, if objectors to alcohol have got their amendment, and objectors to tobacco are seriously endeavoring to get theirs. As the Review pointed out in a recent editorial, there is no reason why not an anti-tobacco amendment, if the people are willing—as apparently they are—to change our whole political tradition.

But the people at large, though they may vaguely feel something wrong here, are not so preoccupied with constitutional niceties that they instinctively lay their finger on that flaw. Besides, they are being told every day by the Republican Senators of far more sacrilegious threats to the palladium of our liberties. Prohibition may set a match to the fabric of our institutions; but the Treaty, they say, is a whole carload of T N T. Naturally no one worries about the match in those conditions. What has outraged the average man, who has perhaps no keen constitutional sense but does like fair play—as Americans do—is the way in which prohibition has been “put over” on the people. He does not like the corrupt politics, or the mendacious propaganda, of the prohibitionists; and he has a strong sense that it is as unpatriotic to take advantage of the tension of war to slip a minority measure through Congress, as it is to make big fortunes on the side. He considers the Anti-Saloon League a moral profiteer. Nor does the prohibitionist type of propaganda appeal to the average citizen. It is too full of lies, juggled statistics, and palpably false pathology. They seem to have learned the principles—though not the art—of advertizing from the late P. T. Barnum. Their picture-posters are awful.

For all these reasons the prohibitionists have disgusted the average citizen. As a nation we hate to be fooled; and we particularly dislike to be nationally “worked” in sectarian interests. Nor do we like our nobler instincts traded on. We are used to being sentimentally stampeded, for we are in the main an innocent folk; but we are growing more wary. In the end we loathe, like any great people, bad logic in practical affairs. And above all there is in most Americans the Tom Sawyer-ish instinct of “see if you can stop me.”

So we have had the spectacle of certain large cities positively enjoying (so I am told) the anomaly of war-time prohibition and a looming amendment, without the machinery of enforcement. The people who resent prohibition for personal reasons are inclined, I think, to regret the good-humored orgies: the “wide-openness” of the big towns. They do not like temperate folk to put themselves even technically in the wrong. They are afraid of giving a handle, I suppose, to the Anti-Saloon League. But those of us who take a less personal and a more theoretical attitude toward the matter cannot help chuckling—and becoming a shade more optimistic. That there is grave danger of rioting, of perilous substitutes for liquor, of lawlessness bred of thirst, we all know. How much better to show the practical absurdity of a law than to prove its practical danger! And I fancy that the people who frequent those wide-open saloons, rubbing shoulders at the bar with dignified policemen, are satisfying their sense of humor almost more effectually than their thirst. They like the consciousness of putting it over in broad daylight on the people who put it over on them. Nothing is more odious, socially, than a law which every one knows cannot be enforced, because that brings law into disrepute. But no one would expect the public not to take advantage of the fact that the prohibitionists tripped over themselves in their haste. No one supposes for a moment that the Congressmen who have amused themselves by making the clauses of the amendment ever more drastic, intend to suffer from their own drastic clauses. Even the Anti-Saloon League does not expect a dry-voting House to be dry itself—not, at least, at present. It merely holds over them a political club; and probably is willing that Representatives should “stock up,” as long as the citizens they represent cannot. But the cynicism of the Anti-Saloon League ought really not to be emulated; and it would be a pity for the whole public to develop a State-of-Maine complacency. It is all very well to make faces for a few short months at temporarily helpless prohibitionists, because they have rubbed the public the wrong way; but the grimace ought not to become fixed. It was a tactical mistake for the prohibitionists to put the public back up; for it is an American back and a stiff one. By the time the Senate has conceded cider to the farmers, and whiskey to invalids, and the privilege of fermenting fruit juices to every private person, we shall not be what you would call bone-dry, after all. Prohibition will prohibit only for flat-dwellers and lazy folk. Everyone who has a cellar in one sense can have a “cellar” in the other.

It will be well for all legislators to take into account the tendency, very prevalent in America at least, to be encouraged rather than discouraged by obstacles. Not long ago a strike tied up transportation in New York City. There is every reason why we should take strikes seriously. When you think of the millions of hard-working people who are inconvenienced by strikers, you wonder, indeed, what is going to be done. All I would point out is the frank joy of the New York press in the devices contrived to meet the shortage of subway and elevated trains. I remember, many years ago, in France, living through several days of a postal strike. It meant that you were cut off from the world. You could send or receive no letters, no telegrams: you could not even telephone. For all those facilities were part of the Government postal system; and when the Government has a monopoly, and a whole Government department goes on strike, there are no competitors to come in and save the day. No one in France loved Government ownership very much at that moment. And there was no joy in finding ways and means of getting on normally in spite of the strike. We merely sat and suffered until the strike was over. But in America something, I believe, would have been done; and the more we were inconvenienced, the more desperately we should have polished our wits to find ways of being comfortable. We are not so fatalistic about the practical business of life. We do not let an inch of sleety snow empty the streets of all traffic, as they do in France. If cabs and motors refused to sally forth, we should all make skis—and use them. And if horses and motors continued to object to an inch of snow, we should invent super-skis. I do not mean that Americans are necessarily more ingenious than other people; but I believe they have less objection than most to being handicapped, because they get more fun out of it. It is perfectly moral for the public to take to jitneys when the subway men go on strike. It is not perfectly moral to evade State or local prohibition by hollowing out part of the logs in a big log-drive, and tucking bottles away inside, or by running a pipe-line from a distant distillery into a department store in a "dry" city. But you may be perfectly sure that the fun counts as much as the "booze," and that a great many people who would not buy liquor from the pipe-line are excessively amused by the device. Juries have a way of proving our sympathy with any ingenuity that is not purely devilish. As even clergymen chuckle over Tom Sawyer. And out of inconvenience comes the greater convenience. See Kipling's "The Benefactors":

It is not learning, grace nor gear,
Nor easy mean and drink,
But bitter pinch of pain and fear
That makes Creation think.

The more laws tie us up, the more agile we shall become, and the more we shall learn about the elasticity of Nature. This is food for the new optimism.

The League—to come to planetary matters—will probably, in the end, prevail, even though the Republican Senators are out-Sawyer Tom in perversity. As I said before, there is a point where, strictly speaking, fun stops, though we Americans are a little prone to pass that point by force of our initial impetus. The Senators are chivying the President, probably, in much the same spirit as that in which New Yorkers are chivying the Anti-Saloon League. But just as the New York saloons must eventually close, the League must eventually be accepted, one fancies. I know this may sound over-optimistic in view of what is at present going on; but I believe it. Meanwhile, let Officer Lodge and Officer Borah lean upon the genial bar and imbibe their intoxicating reservations. For the world is apparently ready to put itself into the strait-jacket of the League. Real ingenuity comes afterwards. We have all seen acrobats hang by their heels and get rid of the strait-jacket.

If it is not my intention to be partisan on the subject of prohibition, it is even less my intention to take a political pose on the subject of the Treaty. If members of the United States Senate are obviously not competent to judge the matter, what should a non-voting female who only reads the newspapers know about it? But any human being of mature years can watch the drift of things with keen interest. It can escape no one that the League is the most tremendous attempt ever made (not excepting that of the Roman Church) to put obstacles in the path of passionate humanity. Congress has passed many acts far more restrictive of personal privilege, and we are growing accustomed to being Federally balked of our desires. Congress, to be sure, likes to do the oppressing itself, and does not like to have that oppression concurred in by European parliaments and chambers. It may swallow the domestic camel, but it must, for a little, strain at the international gnat. The people, however, schooled by experience, does not see very much difference. We are so used to having our personal liberty curtailed by law that the League does not particularly worry us. "Give it a chance," we say amiably; "it may work. And if we don't like it, we'll find a way out. We've had worse obstacles to deal with before this."

I am not taking into account just here those idealists who believe that the League is a cure for all international ills. Those are the old optimists—not the new ones. They are the folk who thought that the Adamson law settled the railroad difficulties, who hoped that Henry Ford would get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas, who fancied that the women's vote would purify Chicago politics, and that the German people would be all right if you got rid of the Kaiser. Nor do I take into account the obverse of Candide, who thinks that because a League is created, it must necessarily fail. It is of the new optimist that I speak—him whom I cited in the beginning, who can chant wholeheartedly:

I do not look for holy saints to guide me on my way,
Or male and female devilkins to lead my feet astray.
If these are added, I rejoice—if not, I shall not mind,
So long as I have leave and choice to meet my fellow-kind.
For as we come and as we go (and deadly soon go we!)
The people, Lord, thy people, are good enough for me!

That man is not going to be shocked by Shantung and surprised by the Rumanians, on the one hand; nor is he, on the other, going to canonize Lenin, and shed tears over Bela Kun. He is going to realize that beyond a certain point you cannot coerce human nature; and that man, if he cannot climb the mountain in his path, will eventually tunnel through it. To the way of the eagle in the air, the way of the serpent on a rock, the way of a man with a maid, he will add the way of the world with the League. He will not expect our Balkan brothers to turn gentle or our oppressed friends and charges, the Armenians, to turn honest, overnight. He will not be surprised that the experienced European chancelleries are not partial to statecraft of the Bryan type, and he will honor President Wilson for having done his best to work with facts instead of pretending that theories were conditions. He will watch the League loyally, supporting it to his utmost; but he will not be shocked into insensibility if somebody starts fighting, and the Council cannot all at once put a stop to it.

The only sphere, perhaps, in which pragmatism is justifiable, is politics. If a law will work, it is good. A bad law will not work—not in the long run. It has often been said that a people has the government it deserves. That is not always true; but it is true that water seeks its own level and that you cannot on the whole make a better government for mankind than mankind is up to carrying out. The real optimist is ready to try almost anything that has a shadow of reason in it: because if it turns out to be ridiculous, he is sure that human nature will show it up for what it is. He does not even demand that you shall make laws which immediately work: he demands only that if you find a law does not work, you shall not preserve it on the statute-books because it makes pretty reading. He prefers to abide by possibility. He will even rather welcome the trying-out of Utopian legislation, because the race, thus tested, will clarify issues much faster than otherwise it would have done. The race will find out how much it can stand, and in process of learning that, it will learn an infinite number of other valuable things. The pessimist says "prohibition" will lead us to unguessed-of horrors; the old optimist says that in ten years no one will miss alcohol at all. The new optimist says that it is all very interesting and that we shall perhaps really solve a question that the experts are still disagreeing about: namely, whether the craving for alcoholic stimulus is so nearly universal that it must be considered normal and therefore deserving of reasonable satisfaction; or whether it is a mere human whim, and people maintain equilibrium, happiness, and efficiency equally well without it. If the race at large craves alcohol and keeps on craving it, it will have to have it. Some reformers, working for the suppression of irregular sex-relations, yet faced with the fact that marriage and the decent rearing of children are becoming almost economic impossibilities, have endeavored to state that the sex-impulse is something which can safely and easily be ignored. But of such statements the race is impatient. The race knows that Nature has made better provision than that for its continuance, and that you cannot totally abolish both prostitution and marriage. Some people see in the League the promise of universal and permanent peace. Some people, on the other hand, see in it a mere crippling of nations who are surely going to have to fight. The new optimist—the man who has made up his mind that obstacle-races tend to bring out all the latent ingenuity, and to reveal all the fundamental desires, of human nature—will see in it a very interesting, and a highly valuable, test of how far certain inhibitions will hold: of just how vital a need of dissatisfied humans it is to have it out, as you might say, with their fists. If it works, so much the better; if not, then at least the utmost that is presently possible has been done, and you may take to yourself the consolation of knowing that the race is not ready for the prohibition of war; that you actually cannot, with every chance given you, make war impossible. Human nature will not, except for fun, leap over obstacles that do not worry it. Even the fun does not last very long. If the obstacles really worry it, they must be removed, because eternal circumvention of law is a bad thing for law. If they do not really worry it, they cease in the end to be seen as obstacles at all: they are only pleasing variations in the landscape. Nothing is stronger than habit—except instinct.

Civilization is not simply a matter of improving our habits; it is a matter of improving our instincts. Which takes time.

All legislation is experimental. One's own life is only one's experiment with conditions. But you do not expect any one but the trained scientist to get much out of the laboratory. Therefore we need all the knowledge we can get, and we are sometimes a little annoyed when the ignorant are set to rule our lives. We hate to have a Mann and a Kitchin messing about among explosives. But even from a Mann and a Kitchin we can learn. We learn, for example, that there are enough Manns and Kitchins to return one Mann and one Kitchin to Congress. Their real significance lies in their constituents.

We wish that Wisconsin did not persist in loving La Follette. But the fact that it does teaches us much about Wisconsin that cannot be explained away. We—the new optimists—are not going to sit down and weep over these gentlemen, any more than we are going to pretend that they are all right. We are firm in our belief that eventually Manns, Kitchins and La Follettes will not "go down." Even the pessimist cannot say that they are a new portent. We have always had such in our legislative branch, and in the end they do not prevail. Bryan has been adored, but he has never been President. We regret exceedingly that Bolshevism has had so long and hideous a run in Russia. But is there not the chance that Bolshevism, by showing itself for what it is, will disgust in time other countries that might have been tempted in that direction? It is possible, sometimes, to go further and fare better. I admit that this reasoning is Mrs. Wiggs-ish. But I said in the beginning that Mrs. Wiggs would have to come. She is not to be confounded with Pollyanna, remember. And she is going to be tempered by Gil Blas.

I am far from prophesying that the wisest minority will get its way. Seldom, if ever, is that true. If you look at the politics of any given decade, of any given generation, even, there is excuse for pessimism. I admit that, to hold the new optimism, keeping your eyes open, you must take a wide view. But we must have done with the melancholy state of things wherein all wise-aces are pessimists and all optimists were fools. There is as much to sadden as to delight, in history; yet we have learned quite as much from what was deplorable as from what was happy. Certainly we must trust human nature: trust it, not to be as wise as the wisest, but not to be as dull as the dullest; trust it, above all, to know eventually what makes for life and what makes for death. If the aristocratic republic must still be a dream, let us not therefore say there is no prophet but Jeremiah. We may take comfort in certain facts: the fact, for example, that the world at large, though it is not wise enough to prefer the aristocratic republic, is too wise to stand long for Bolshevism; that though you cannot have heaven upon earth, nevertheless we are a long way from wishing to go back to chaos and old night. Optimism, I grant, is possible only to the man who has a real intellectual interest in mankind, and who does not consider his own preferences and prejudices—his own traditions, even—sacro-sanct. But he must not see only the flaws. He must steer well between Diogenes and Jean-Jacques Rousseau—not so much as scraping either one.

As a matter of practical policy, he will want the best legislation the world will put up with. If the race as a whole will put up with a certain type of legislation, then—away with it, however ideally delightful. You may wish the race were capable of higher things immediately. Very well: get out and educate it. But the optimist will not weep because it does not consist of plaster saints. He will, rather, paraphrase the doughboy and say, "It's a hell of a race, but it's the only one we've got." The new optimist will watch with a cheerful heart its "passionate, almost bloodthirsty clinging to life." In the end, it will decide. And because human nature is on the whole the most important thing on the planet, he will cheer it on. It will do dreadful things—it has recently perpetrated the Great War and the Russian Revolution—but it will not do them all over the place at once. For men want, curiously enough, to be happy; and though they may at times choose fatal ways of providing for that hypothetical happiness, though now and then a particular class wants so much to be happy that it does not care whether any other class is, human nature is too various to put up with the myopia or insanity or piggishness of any one sect. Even organized labor is not the whole of the human race; even Russia is not the world. We may take, concerning optimism, the course of reasoning that Bacon took with regard to religion: "It is true, that a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism; but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion: for while the mind of man looketh upon second causes scattered, it may sometimes rest in them, and go no further; but when it beholdeth the chain of them confederate and linked together, it must needs fly to Providence and Deity."

It is a good analogy, at least.

KATHARINE FULLERTON GEROULD

Poetry

A Knight-Errant a la Mode

IN days when all the world fell out,
Then talked about it and about;
When all creation went to war,
Then argued what they'd fought it for;
When some whose highest expectations
Were centred in a League of Nations
Locked horns with those whose apprehension

Saw in it quite the worst invention
That Satan yet had plagued mankind with;

When others still inflamed their mind
with

Ecstatic dreams of wars to come
In which they should win martyrdom,
Not for their country but their shop,
That underdog might get on top;
Then did the maddest of all wags,
Theophilus Alexis Spraggs,
Like any valiant knight of old,
Sir Hudibras or Quixote bold,
(The reader here will kindly note he Must not pronounce it Don Quixote)
Set out to put a wrong world right.

You'd scarce mistake him for a knight,
For arms to him were quite abhorrent.
It grieved him when the shout of war rent

The quiet of his meditation
Upon the labor situation:
How he could bring the Golden Age
By setting up a minimum wage.
He'd proved that virtue was a matter
Of coin in purse and meat on platter;
That of air so many cubic feet
Per unit 'ld keep the whole world sweet;
In short, the sum of all his wishings he Found in the single word Efficiency.
And so he'd got it almost fixed up
When came a slip 'twixt lip and 'twixt cup.

Theophilus himself, I hope,
Would scorn so bibulous a trope.
Like Thopas or like Percyvelle,
His drink was only of the well—
Of sentiment, fortified with this stick:
A dash of well-shaken statistic;
The whole a brew with such a kicker
He felt no need of other liquor.
And what he had himself no mind to
Must be withheld from all mankind, too.
Per contra, he'd schemes so good that any o' 'em

Would bring us shouting to millennium.

Theophilus was of the kind
That glories in the open mind.
His own was open at both ends
And through the middle there descends
A sort of open running sewer;
But to the pure all things are pure.
He said he liked to keep it open,
And some had not given over hoping
That those who'd filched away his brain
Would maybe put it back again.

Theophilus was quite contented;
To him the others seemed demented.
Himself had been reserved by fate
Boldly to set all crooked straight.

Thus on a day he sallied forth,
And glancing west, south, east, and north

To see if aught he might espy
That seemed to him to go awry,
At length he saw a gaping crew
Assembled round a speaker who
With gestures of a windmill scope
Addressed them. Plain it was that soap (His ears peeped forth from unkempt locks)

He valued chiefly for the box.
"To Hell with this! To Hell with that!"

The speaker said, then paused and spat.
Theophilus could not but feel
That this was something very real.
"Though neither chastely couched nor choice,

This, this is sure the people's voice."
"Down, down with governments and war!"

The speaker cried, and more and more Theophilus waxed sympathetic.
"He speaks," said he, "with voice prophetic.

Such penetrating criticism!
Government's an anachronism,
And, peacefully, of course, I trust,
Its end will come; but come it must."

The speaker shouted, "Class 'gainst class—

Capital's tyranny shall pass!
The hosts of toil are marching, marching!"

And Spraggs, who, born to one fat
fortune,

Had got another one by marrying,
Felt exquisitely proletarian.

"I see the dawn," the speaker cried,
"The lamb and lion side by side,
The golden dawn that in shall usher
The sort of thing they have in Russia."
Now Spraggs, who'd several bits of fur,
A borzoi and a samovar,
Also Turgeniev, done in calf,
Considered he was more than half
A Russian now. Just then the crowd Began to voice itself aloud.
"It is beginning!" Spraggs exclaimed.

Not where he thought was violence aimed.

Instead of rushing through the town
Pulling the social fabric down,
Establishing a government
With one sole purpose and intent
To love the people and to foster 'em,
They hurled the speaker from his rostrum.

They dragged him in the muddy street
And stamped upon him with their feet.
At least they would have, had not he (O, whither, whither shall he flee?)
Sought refuge from impending harm
Behind the law's blue-coated arm.

"Save, O, save me!" "Sure I will.

Move on there now! and you keep still!"
Theophilus' personal equation
Was slow to solve a situation.
"Arrest this man?" ('Twas what he saw)

"Thou minion of tyrannic law!
This sort of wanton interference
Is just the thing that makes adherents
To the very cause you would destroy.
What rights are these that we enjoy?
Free speech? Why, bah! I say, and pooh!

Arrest this man? Arrest me too!"
Theophilus surely lacked not heart or
Will to die right there a martyr:
If for his country, he would balk,
But gladly, for the right—to talk.

* * * * *
Yet death of all fates was remotest, Save death through want of being noticed.

HARRY AYRES

Correspondence

The Open Letter to Senator
Hitchcock

[We print below some of the letters and telegrams evoked by the "Open Letter to Senator Hitchcock", published in last week's Review.]

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your Open Letter to Senator Hitchcock surely expresses the opinions of a vast number of conscientious and exasperated spectators of the Senate's protracted discussion of the Peace Treaty.
They want an immediate peace and a League of Nations, and they want them insistently. However it may disappoint our expectations, the League of Nations is to-day the best hope of civilization; it transfigures the prosaic diction of the compact. The patience of the public is sorely tried by the long delay and your rational proposition encourages us to anticipate prompt action. Senators Hitchcock and McCumber control the situation and the latter's intelligent and reasonable modification of the Treaty's text could not imperil its ratification and should not meet with the former's opposition.

R. FULTON CUTTING

New York, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I think that the Treaty should be ratified without further delay.

Having studied the Treaty closely I am in favor of its ratification as it stands. At the same time, if interpretative reservations are deemed necessary to secure ratification, I am in favor of any such reservations to the extent that they do not require submission to the other Powers for their approval. I do not favor reservations that would require such submission and approval, as they would place the Treaty in jeopardy so far as this country is concerned, and, in any event, cause injurious delay in the final establishment of peace all around.

JOHN G. MILBURN

New York, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The Open Letter to Senator Hitchcock points the practical way to progress, and its counsel is wholly in the public interest. The mind of the country is definitely made up that the Treaty as submitted shall not be ratified unless accompanied with specific reservations of the points so frequently recorded. On the other hand, the overwhelming sentiment of the country is that no action should be taken, particularly no action with a view to purely partisan advantage, that would send the Treaty back to Paris and reopen international negotiations as to its terms. Senator Hitchcock and Senator Williams, both of whom are patriotic men of large public experience, must understand these facts. I cannot believe that they will stubbornly stand in the way of quick action of the kind indicated.

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER

New York, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Considering conditions here and abroad I favor immediate ratification of the Treaty with rational reservations consistent with our Constitution and national policies and protective of the ideals and sense of honor and humanity that made us a partner in the war for worldwide Liberty founded on law and order.

SAMUEL REA

Philadelphia, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Ever since President Wilson last winter brought back from Paris the covenant of the League of Nations I have in public speeches and writing endorsed it, though insisting on modifications protecting American interest. Accordingly, I now emphatically endorse your open letter to Senator Hitchcock dated October 11.

JACOB GOULD SCHURMAN

Ithaca, N. Y., October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I believe the people of the United States desire the Treaty to be ratified as speedily as possible. Discussion has been so long and thorough that no new points are likely to be raised. Each side is standing stubbornly firm. Some compromise must evidently be made. Certain reservations have been suggested by a group of Senators which are conservative and are offered with the intention of making clearer the position of the United States. I can see no objections to such reservations, and I strongly hope that the Democratic Senators will at once earnestly consider coming to an agreement with these conservative Republicans. The Treaty must be ratified.

ALFRED E. MARLING

New York, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I fully approve proposed letter to Senator Hitchcock. Personally, I am strong for explicit reservations, but believe reasonable compromise imperative and prompt action desperately needed.

E. H. OUTERBRIDGE

New York, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I do not approve letter to Hitchcock. I think Treaty should be ratified with no reservations. In my judgment important reservations are equivalent to amendments and unimportant reservations are unnecessary.

MOORFIELD STOREY

Boston, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have read with very much interest your proposed open letter to Senator Hitchcock. While I think your position is sound, I do not see my way clear to formally endorse it. I have been among those who hoped that the Treaty might be ratified without amendment and without reservations which are in effect amendments. That being the case, it would hardly be consistent for me to join your appeal to Senator Hitchcock, although I quite agree that it is now apparent that a majority of the Senate will insist upon reservations substantially along the lines of those supported by Senator Lodge, and for that reason Senator Hitchcock and his adherents should fall into line.

PAUL D. CRAVATH

New York, October 10

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I am in favor of such reservations as will accomplish the purpose the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs had in mind when they submitted their recommendations to the Senate. I believe if a clear majority adopt such reservations as will be protective to this country that Senator Hitchcock and his associates should accept same promptly.

T. DEWITT CUYLER

Philadelphia, October 10

Book Reviews

Bolshevism Unadorned

BOLSHEVISM : MR. KEELING'S FIVE YEARS IN RUSSIA. By H. V. Keeling. London: Hodder and Stoughton.

BOLSHEVIK AIMS AND IDEALS. Reprinted from The Round Table. New York: The Macmillan Company.

UNDER THE BOLSHEVIK REIGN OF TERROR. By Rhoda Power. New York: Robert M. McBride and Company.

QUANTITATIVE analysis of the literature of Bolshevism up to the present time would show a preponderance of books and articles of a polemic character. This is unfortunate, for the impression is created that, after all, the issue is one of argument as to the merits and demerits of a theory and programme of social revolution for the reconstitution of society on a new basis and the institution of communism. The Soviet system of government, the Soviet Constitution, the elaborate scheme of elections and representation, have been discussed seriously as actualities, as plans that had been put into execution and tried out in practice.

Some day a serious study will be made of the movement engineered in this country to confuse the public mind in regard to the Bolshevik régime in Russia. The investigation will show that a carefully planned campaign was carried on, the object of which was to persuade people that the whole Lenin-Trotsky plot was a high-minded experiment undertaken to bring about a better state of society, and that it enjoyed the approval and support of the Russian masses; that to interfere with it in any way would be improper meddling with domestic concerns and a denial of the right of democratic self-determination. Oceans of propaganda have been poured forth in support of this thesis, and many ignorant but well-intentioned people have been deceived thereby. Most pernicious of all has been the propaganda industriously circulated among workingmen to make them believe that the Soviet régime was building a workers' paradise and that any attacks on it were lying slanders instigated by capitalists in the endeavor to prevent their own overthrow by the new dispensation. The object was clear: to reduce Russia to helpless chaos and then to prevent any interference on the part of the Allies and America, while Germany undertook the work of reconstruction and exploitation. To a considerable extent the object has been attained.

The best corrective of such disingenuous theorizing is first-hand, eye-witness testimony. Of this there has been an abundance from Russian refugees, but it has not carried due weight, because it has been offset by the tales of other Russians—Bolshevik sympathizers and agents—and by the suspicion that the witnesses were simply disgruntled émigrés. Now, however, we have the evidence of foreign observers of diverse experience and without private interests to serve.

Mr. H. V. Keeling is an Englishman, a lithographer by trade and a staunch labor union man. In February, 1914, he was sent to Petrograd to instal a patent photo-lithographic process that his employers had sold to a Russian company. Presently the war came and he decided to remain. He had picked up enough Russian to get on with and found plenty of work to do. After the Bolshevik revolution, he was employed for a time as a photographer under Lunacharsky in the Commissariat of Education at a salary of 1,500 rubles per month, the highest paid to an expert workman, but found that on it he was unable to keep himself from slow starvation. So he left the city and wandered over the country as a mechanic and tinker, picking up jobs here and there, and incidentally obtaining unique information as to the true state of affairs throughout Russia.

He does not like the idea of writing a book—he would rather be at the bench—but he feels it his bounden duty. As he puts it:

I have left a country where the conditions are so terrible and where I have so many friends—all workmen and peasants—that I should indeed be a coward, and wanting in the first elements of simple gratitude, if I were quietly and meekly to settle down to my own work without at least making an attempt to place the facts before those who I know are being deceived by the irresponsible talk of those who have never personally experienced the actual results of Bolshevism in action. It is very easy for those who have obtained their knowledge of Bolshevism through reading of the Decrees, or whilst living as the guests of the Higher Soviet, to relate wonderful fairy tales of magnificent ideals, but what I have to relate are the actual facts and results personally witnessed and experienced by one who was regarded and treated in every way as a workman of the first category.

It is a graphic picture that Mr. Keeling paints in his vivid narrative, nearly every paragraph being replete with material throwing light on the operations of the Soviet Government or on the conditions and opinion of the people. When the Soviets took over the factories, the managers and specialists were driven out and replaced by committees of workmen who had, of course, no experience in the problems of management. Production dropped and the cost of materials rose. To meet this a vicious circle was entered into of raising both wages and prices. As each factory ceased to show a profit, the Government stepped in with a subsidy paid in paper money printed off at a furious rate. The purchasing value of the ruble went to practically nothing.

A little later, many of the young and able-bodied workmen were conscripted into the Red Army, which was needed to keep down the rebellious elements that had begun quite early to express their dissatisfaction and disgust. Many joined the army to get food. Thus, the number of good workmen was further reduced and underfeeding greatly lessened the efficiency of those that remained. Towards the end of last year, Mr. Keeling visited a number of workshops in company with two Bolshevik commissars. It was painful to see these places, which were once flourishing concerns giving employment to hundreds of workmen, lying idle, with the machinery rusting and covered with dust. He asked what was going to be done with them, and was told that great central workshops were to be opened to replace them.

The author was shocked to get back to England and find that in some labor circles the Soviet was regarded as a workingmen's government. He relates from his experience that if a trade union did not please the Soviet, it was fined and suppressed and a new union formed in its place by the Bolsheviks themselves. Entry to this new union was open only to members of the old union who signed a form declaring themselves entirely in agreement with, and prepared completely to support in every detail, the policy of the Soviet Government. Refusal to join on these terms meant the loss of work and pay, together with exclusion from the first and second categories as regards food. The workingmen, therefore, were coerced, and were not allowed to have any voice at all.

Every incentive was held out to the poorer people to spy and report on the others, and special rewards were given to anyone who gave information that any member of a union was opposed in any way. In fact, there was built up a frightful system of espionage that not only corrupted the whole community, but bore with especial severity upon the laborers. His own union, the printers', was suppressed and a new one ordered. When the cards were circulated for the workingmen to sign, he found that in the several factories, numbering over 500 employees each, there were never more than six real Bolsheviks, and in one case the only Bolshevik was the Commissar. Yet they did not dare to refuse to sign the forms. Elections to the Soviet were an absolute farce. The men to be voted for were all selected in advance and no one but a Bolshevik was allowed to be elected to any post. The Bolsheviks were able to keep in power by maintaining a state of terrorism by means of the mercenary Red Army, which had special privileges in the way of food and pay, as well as unlimited license. In the army was an all-pervasive system of espionage, and the parents of the soldiers lived in constant fear of their lives, as they were considered as hostages for the conduct of their sons.

Most interesting were Keeling's experiences as he wandered through the country districts as a mechanic. He was always welcome in the peasant villages and he grew very fond of these simple folk and their kindly hospitality. The only danger he ran was that of being mistaken for a Bolshevik spy, for the Bolsheviks were everywhere feared and detested. From Mr. Keeling's testimony it is evident that the estimate recently made that the Bolsheviks numbered two per cent. of the population is a gross exaggeration. In some of the villages the conditions were not utterly bad. The villagers would somehow or other elect the men they wanted to the local Soviet and for a time would be free from oppression. But when the Commissar of the district heard of it, he would send the Red Guard to break it up and hold new elections, personally directed. The main object of the peasants was to conceal enough food from the requisitioning soldiers to provide for their own needs.

Last January, Keeling escaped by way of Finland. It was an exciting and dangerous exploit and it gives one a thrill to read a description of it. Once out of the clutches of the Bolshevik power, he returned to England, breathing a sigh of relief but depressed by the sufferings of the people left behind and longing to make his countrymen understand and give assistance. His is a simple and a moving narrative that impresses one with its absolute sincerity. It will take rank in the future among the valuable primary materials for the study of Russia under the Soviet tyranny.

"Bolshevik Aims and Ideals" is reprinted from the Round Table. It bears no author's name, though some have suspected that it came from the able pen of Dr. Harold Williams, who stands second to none as an authority on Russia. Although it is a small volume, it is not too much to say that it is altogether the most complete and authoritative analysis of the Bolshevik movement in Russia and of the movements counter to it that has yet appeared. In less than a hundred pages the author has given a résumé of the successive phases of the Bolshevik revolution and of its theory and practice that may well serve as a manual for anyone desiring to obtain a well-balanced, dispassionate account of one of the most remarkable episodes in all history. No educated and intelligent person should fail to read it.

Although of much less importance as first-hand testimony than Mr. Keeling's narrative, "Under the Bolshevik Terror" contains much that is complementary to it. The author, Miss Rhoda Power, was a governess in a Russian bourgeois family from a time early in the war until after the Bolshevik revolution. She writes in a simple, unaffected way of her daily life in this milieu, and while she has had no background of Russian experience, her tale is perhaps the better for this, for she does not attempt to generalize or interpret her impressions. And the reader likewise should take the narrative for what it is, personal impressions, and himself refrain from generalizing.

The family in which she lived and the life she describes are, however, typical of a certain class in Russia, and the vivid picture does not induce admiration or tend to give confidence in the future of Russia if it is to rest in the hands of such selfish, irresponsible people. The daughter of the household, for whom she is the companion, is an example of shallowness, aimlessness, and indulgence only too often to be found in rich middle-class families. Soon after the Bolshevik revolution the family finds its position difficult. They are living in the south of Russia, where the effects of the revolution are somewhat delayed, but where presently the power comes into the hands of the ignorant and criminal classes, and a reign of terror and an orgy of license and crime ensue. Adventures come fast and furious and the young English girl is a witness of the realities of Bolshevik rule far from the centre of government. Here her straightforward narrative of what she saw and passed through is a valuable contribution to our knowledge, for it is possible from it to catch the atmosphere of this phase of the revolution.

And this atmosphere is very red. Only a phlegmatic English girl could write of what she passed through in such a matter of fact way. While at Novochoerkassk she was in the midst of the bloody fighting in which the Bolsheviks overcame the Cossacks. The house in which she sojourned was invaded by the drunken brutes, demanding money and threatening the inmates with death.

During this scene we received a telephone message that our train would leave the station within an hour. It caused us infinite pain to abandon this unfortunate family, but we could follow no other course. "Tovarish," I said to one of the soldiers, "I must go out and get a cab." He had his head almost on my shoulder, and was trying to make love to me. "You can do what you like, little pigeon," he replied affectionately, and I ran to the door. When once outside, however, it was not so easy for me to do as I liked. There were soldiers on the pavement and they surrounded me. "What do you mean by coming out of the house? We shall kill you. Show your papers." They advanced upon me with their bayonets. "Now look here, little doves," I said as boldly as I could, "you can't go killing British subjects like that. It's not done." They looked quite unconvinced. "I am rather important," I said loftily. "There will be a row with the British Government if I do not arrive home safely." They seemed impressed. "Let the barishnia go," said one, and so I escaped to find my cab. After a vain search I returned to the house, where a number of soldiers were standing round the door refusing to allow anyone to proceed to the station. Argument was useless, and if it had not been for a Danish doctor, one of our fellow-travellers, who knew Russian sufficiently well to bluff, we should never have reached the train in safety. Most of the soldiers were drunk and their tempers had begun to get nasty.

The station was filled with members of the Red Guard, and there were traces of blood in the sand. . . . Here the men who had remained on guard told us that the scene had been appalling. The Red Guards and their camp followers, dancing among the dead bodies of the Cossacks, had sung and drunk the whole night, and in the morning they had shot the Ataman.

Miss Power was allowed to leave Russia via Moscow and Murmansk, for this was early in the revolution, before foreigners were proscribed. Not the least interesting of her graphic pictures is that of Murmansk, with its horde of hapless refugees, where she spent an uncomfortable six weeks in a wooden shed on the bleak shores of the Arctic. While Miss Power's volume covers only a small phase of the revolution in a limited field, it is full of interest and charm, and corroborates from another angle the general estimate of the preceding books as to the utter incompetence, confusion, and brutality of the movement which has, by euphemism, been termed the workmen's and peasants' revolution.

A History of American Prisons

PUNISHMENT AND REFORMATION. By Frederick H. Wines. Revised by Winthrop D. Lane. New York: T. Y. Crowell Company.

THIS is an historical summary of crime and punishment written up to 1910 by Dr. Wines, brought down to date by Mr. Lane. Very likely the former would cry out against the mutilation of his book could he be heard (he died in 1912), and any who knew Fred. Wines can imagine his remarks, for he had a "nimble wit and ready tongue." But the "mutability of literature" is greater if possible to-day than when Irving wrote of it, and the exigencies of the publishing business perhaps make the excuses for the deed in this case.

The reviser, in his preface, like the prisoner crying "guilty" in a loud voice, hoping thereby to mollify the court, frankly states that he has used the first eleven chapters of the original book, but cut out the remainder to make room for the developments of the last few years. Dr. Wines was eminently fitted to write a history of crime. His father, Edwin C. Wines, as Secretary of the New York Prison Association in the sixties, was perhaps more than any other individual responsible for the founding of the American Prison Association, the concrete result of the convention of 1871 at Cincinnati. The good accomplished and the progress made in the prisons of this country in the past fifty years may be said to date from that now famous convention. The younger Wines was steeped in prison affairs, and his employment for many years in the Department of Charities of Illinois gave him rare insight into the efforts at reform in the various States. His book presents an admirable account of the treatment of the wrongdoer from the earliest times. Until very lately punishment was the fundamental thought, not simply to punish for its own sake, but to prevent others from evil doing, but still chiefly to punish. Now we have progressed to the idea that it is worth while to try to reform the guilty man; he will be punished enough in the process.

The second part of the book tells specifically of present methods of treating convicts in the United States, and faithfully records many experiments and theories, some of them extreme in character, which have recently been tried or proposed. There is little said of the practicability of any of them; perhaps the true reformer should not dwell on such questions but look only to the goal of his desire. Much consideration is given to the self-government plans of the George Junior Republic as applied to a reformatory for boys in California, and to adult prisoners at Sing Sing by Mr. Osborne. The latter might have had much success if he had been content to go a little more slowly, but his vision of perfection overreached itself; and because those in power differed with him in some respects he withdrew, and the self-government plan had a setback from which it may be long in recovering.

Psychologic, psychopathic, psychiatric are recurrent terms in discussion. Translated into everyday speech they stand for patient study of the individual and earnest endeavor to treat him while in prison that he may be fit and able to stay out when release comes to him. There is no doubt that great improvement is bound to come from such studies. The deductions of Glueck from an examination of 608 consecutively admitted inmates at Sing Sing, quoted at length by the author, are most illuminating. Feeble-mindedness and its astonishing frequency in prisons is given intelligent treatment by reference to many recent studies. It is a tremendous problem.

No account is given of the wretched political use frequently made of the prisons in this country, nor is anything said of the situation in the South, where most of the States exploit the labor of the prisoner and, it is not too much to say, plan by their laws to hold him as long as possible for what can be made out of him. No intensive study there of the how and wherefore of crime; all the thought is on how husky and fit to dig coal or raise cotton the prisoner is and how long he can be kept. Perhaps that is another story, for the Criminal Law Reform people to tell, but it "smells to heaven" and ought to be talked about in season and out.

Feminine Humor

A WOMAN NAMED SMITH. By Marie Conway Oemler. New York: The Century Company.

BARBARA OF BALTIMORE. By Katharine Haviland Taylor. New York: George H. Doran Company.

BLUE-GRASS AND BROADWAY. By Maria Thompson Daviess. New York: The Century Company.

BELIEVE YOU ME! By Nina Wilcox Putnam. New York: George H. Doran Company.

HOLDING firmly to the faith that woman as well as man is equipped with a soul and therefore a sense of humor, we may yet observe that neither soul nor sense is altogether sexless. There is the big playground of major comedy where men and women may be or seem equally at home, but near-by plaisances offer more easeful entertainment for moments of relaxation. Here you may take off your coat and roar, or let down your hair and giggle, without fear of being eyed askance by unsympathetic parties, unfitted by nature for the giggle or the roar. It is not your sister's fault if she thinks W. W. Jacobs merely silly, or yours if the cuteness of Bertha Ruck happens to make you sick. Let us glance without current superciliousness at some current books of purely feminine comedy.

The Southern maiden keeps her place as heroine of this kind of story. Why is plain enough if you notice how natural the phrase "Southern maiden" still sounds, while "Northern maiden" has a slightly facetious ring. The old-fashioned girl is good enough for sweet, pretty stories, and even the aggressively young females of a later fashion must keep something of her in reserve to qualify. The more independent and dashing she may be in the index, the more thrilling her surrender in the final scene. Here, for an example, is the

"Woman Named Smith." To begin with, she is a Northerner, a city woman, a business woman in her middle thirties, plain and efficient. Ally her with the Hynds of Hyndsville, North Carolina, give her a Hynds House as a legacy, lift her into the middle of a family romance and mystery with its roots well in the South and the past, and you very quickly make another female of her. In the presence of Hynds House and the godlike Jelnik whose destiny is so "strangely" linked with hers, she becomes all tremors and blushes and maiden stupidity, and even quite expert at fainting on occasion. It is a tale of priceless heirlooms and lost jewels and secret rooms and ghostly scents and sounds, with everybody dutifully tying themselves up in a tangle of misunderstandings and cross-purposes and childish mystifications, quite according to the recipe of this kind of romance. That expert literary artisan, Miss Carolyn Wells, has just done a story out of almost precisely the same materials, ancient manor house, lost jewels, spooks, ingénue and all; though she has waived the Southern flavor and contented herself with Dobbs Ferry. Her publisher so clearly recognizes this as a staple product that he advertises "Doris of Dobbs Ferry" as belonging to a "Mystery-History Series." A later number of this series, "Barbara of Baltimore," is extremely girly and "cunning" in its dialogue, and contains pretty much all the aforementioned elements of plot and situation: old historic dwelling, secret passages, ghosts in the attic, stolen treasures, and the beautiful young man who this time happens to be a wealthy Briton, shell-ravaged and sent to America to be cured: we have met him frequently in fiction since the war began. There is a good deal in the book also about "ladies' wear," of various degrees of intimacy—a theme which appears to have endless humor for the clientèle this sort of fiction appeals to. It is proper also to italicise specially cute and bright turns of phrase, so that the reader's eyes may spot them in advance without effort and be prepared to twinkle.

There is no mystery involved in "Blue-grass and Broadway." Here the glamour (Southern heroine apart) is not of the past, but of stage-land; and in the contrast of the ingénue making her mark there at the first attempt. The mortgage on the old estate of Rosemeade in Kentucky is in peril of foreclosure. Poor grandfather mustn't be disturbed in his last days. Therefore pretty granddaughter will write a play and make a lot of money. She does! But the manner of her doing it entails a situation of real comedy. She is not a genius. does not take Broadway by storm. Her purple-ribboned manuscript simply happens to catch a manager's eye at a moment when he desires to discipline a spoiled star. . . . "She needs one good failure to tone her up. What's the name of the effusion in ribbons?" . . . "The Renunciation of Rosalind," murmured Mr. Meyer. . . . "We could call it 'The Purple Slipper.' . . ." Not unnaturally it is the gentleman-manager himself who falls in love with the ingénue authoress, and to the tune of much stage music the affair runs merrily and even wittily to its rightful close. There is broader but not less genuine fun in "Believe You Me!" Under that sprightly title are assembled five monologues by Mlle. Marie La Tour, who was born Mary Gilligan and is a famous parlor dancer, when the war breaks out. Her speech is that free and easy "American" which, as Mr. H. L. Mencken has pointed out in his recent book, "The American Language," is by no means without its own principles of grammar and syntax. Only two or three story-writers have had the courage to reproduce this speech in all its glorious emancipation from the vehicle still labeled "English." Miss La Tour varies her flow of language with an occasional stock phrase of journalese, which evidently to her mind presents the saving evidence of literary breeding. Beneath her flashy exterior and vulgar soul she is a good girl and a sensible, like so many of those who prance and smirk for the public's amusement. Her adventures as a war-worker are worth hearing of; and she has a pretty turn for aphorism: "A person certainly does need their strength to enjoy an American health resort."

H. W. BOYNTON.

The Run of the Shelves

"FANTASTICS" (Houghton Mifflin Company) is the name given by Lafcadio Hearn to a series of short papers contributed to the New Orleans Daily Item, 1879-1881, and, in reduced quantity, to the Times-Democrat of the same city, 1882-1884. Hearn is quoted as saying: "They are my impressions of the strange life of New Orleans. They are dreams of a tropical city. There is one twin-idea running through them all—Love and Death." Colonel Fairfax, sometime owner of the Item, testifies: "Hearn was really quite lazy about his regular work. We had to prod him up all the time—stick pins in him, so to speak. But when he would write one of his own little fanciful things, out of his own head—dreams—he was always dreaming—why, then he would work like mad. And people always noticed those little things of his, somehow, for they were truly lovely, wonderful."

Without disrespect to Colonel Fairfax, to whom destiny vouchsafed the honor of discovering Hearn in New Orleans, it may be said that these fantastics are the kind of sketches which seem lovely and wonderful to the class of people for whom "lovely" and "wonderful" are eligible adjectives. Their merit is rather evident than high. They are above journalism; they are beneath literature: more specifically, they vacillate between journalism and literature. They contain many phrases which would fit without discord into Poe's "Ligeia" or "Morella" or "House of Usher," the style and temper of which they sometimes rather vividly recall. But other phrases occur, in equal or greater plenty, which exhibit the eternal journalistic compromise between the conscience and the clock. Not that there is any hesitation or stammering in the utterance of the author of these sketches; they are, indeed, almost too supple and voluble, proclaim with too little reserve, in the excess of their plasticity, their affinity with clouds and dreams. The mood immerses the fact, the description overbears the narrative; and the voluptuous melancholy in which Love and Death consort will have its brief magic for that mood of youth which delights in the neighborhood of flame and shadow.

The publication of early works of this kind is supported by an approved and general practice. Of that practice the present volume is not an extreme or venturesome example. It is therefore no special reflection on the work before us to inquire if publications of this kind are a boon to the public or a help to the author. These sketches have their merits: they are pleasing; they are promising. But their value as pleasure is diminished by the temptations they offer to the neglect of higher joys, and their value as promise is abolished by the fulfilment. Of what avail in September—or in December—are the April estimates of the September crop? These beginnings are not literature, but biography; they show what Hearn was in 1879, in 1881; they should appear in the record of the life, in extract or specimen, in such bulk as the scale of that record authorizes or suggests. Why should the burial of noted authors be the signal for the disinterment of their crudities, or at least their insufficiencies? If twelve works by Shakespeare of the type and merit of "Titus Andronicus" were discovered tomorrow, they would have to be published. But their publication would clearly be an injury to Shakespeare and a misfortune to the world. Who would care to have his present reverence for Shakespere defiled, or even merely diluted, by adulteration with the sorrow or revolt induced by the perusal of twelve melodramas of that grade? Every inferior publication lessens the average merit of a man's output, and the test by averages, though unfair, is natural. If everybody read the entire product, the case would still have its inconvenience. But many persons read only one work of an author, and choose that work perhaps at random. An author's only protection against this source of injustice is the exclusion from the market of works by which he cannot be equitably judged.

Even the enemies of Greek admit that it has some value. The man of science, anyone, indeed, who uses the English language at all, finds it helpful to know the meaning of the many Greek words which the very scientists themselves have been active in grafting on to the English stock. This sort of knowledge is a hardly avoidable by-product of even a very little Greek study, but it can easily be made an end in itself, and even the possessor of a Shakespearean modicum of Greek may be glad to have scattered materials conveniently drawn together in a way to stimulate and guide further study. Such a purpose seems admirably realized by Prof. Horace A. Hoffman's "Everyday Greek" (University of Chicago Press). The little book brings with it no excess baggage; only such Greek words are discussed as have some survival in English, and nothing like an historical treatment is attempted even of these. The principles of compounding are succinctly set forth, and related words are grouped in a way that sheds many interesting cross lights. There is an adequate vocabulary.

Mr. George D. Herron, in his small but pregnant book, the "Greater War" (New York: Mitchell Kennerley), views the present world-situation in a vividness of contrast and sharpness of alternative which is rarely to be found outside of the novel or the theatre. We are faced with ruin on two sides, ruin from a restored Germany, redoubtable in defeat, employing as its instrument an international socialism which it has fashioned in its image and wrought to its will, and ruin from Bolshevism which he calls "freedom's most mendacious yet alluring enemy . . . the eventual harnessing of the proletaire to the triumphal chariot of the financier." Salvation, however, is open to us, though the opening is narrow and may close irreparably at any moment. Our savior is democracy, not, however, the democratic state as history knows it, which is as far from true democracy as organized Christianity is from Christ. What is this true democracy? Mr. Herron, who as critic is exceedingly lucid, gets no nearer to lucidity on this constructive point than the following rather baffling sentence: "The way into democracy is through the voluntary and administrative co-operation of industrial and commercial capital with associated labor." Mr. Herron's want of space has cramped his explanations. The proposed League of Nations is a sham, but its ratification is imperative as a step toward its replacement by a reality. The book, which, in the swiftness of its passage from vituperation to exaltation, reminds us of Shelley, is charged with an intensity of conviction and a passionate idealism which it is impossible not to respect.

Drama

Somerset Maugham and Zoe Akins

MR. Somerset Maugham, in "Too Many Husbands" (Booth Theatre, October 8th) treats of a British major reported dead who reappears after the armistice to find that another major has appropriated his wife. The theme is old, themes and husbands appear to be very much alike in their capacity for resuscitation. Mr. Maugham, however, is skilful in the refurbishing of a timeworn theme. In the usual handling of this plot, the two men are antagonists, and the lady is desirable; in Mr. Maugham's play, the men are comrades, and the lady is undesirable. While the men compete for the happiness of relinquishing their happiness, the lady, whose impartiality is boundless, dispels their embarrassment by relinquishing both. A third person is on hand, a sort of courier merging into cicisbeo, like the famous lover of the Queen of George the Fourth, to whom, after divorcing the two majors, she proposes to transfer her affections.

Out of this material Mr. Maugham evolves two acts of what may be called, with very little reservation, capital farce. The third act is largely horse-play and by-play. The drama is really over, and, like a soldier between armistice and discharge, beguiles the tedious interval at the pantomime and dog-show. The writing of plays is surely very hard when a man so adroit as Mr. Maugham cannot compel or persuade a farce even to keep up its own gait to the end of a prosperous evening.

The parts were well taken, with exaggeration sometimes, it is true, but with bounded and provident exaggeration. Miss Estelle Winwood's Victoria, excellent in points, scarcely justified itself as a whole. The sentimentality merely spotted the cynicism, which, in turn, merely spotted the languor, and the coldness of the part was a little benumbing to a play to which warmth of some sort—warmth of a buffet, if not a warmth of a handshake—was indispensable. Mr. Kenneth Douglas as Major Cardew was effective till the third act caught him in its impish toils. Mr. Lawrence Grossmith as Major Lowndes gave, in the first act at least, a really charming impersonation of the Englishman who, soldier and gentleman as he is, is pushed about by his instincts as helplessly and unthinkingly as a child in a perambulator.

Miss Zoe Akins's "Déclassée," at the Empire Theatre, is a play over which criticism need not linger. The first act indeed has merit; hectic undoubtedly, it is nevertheless a drama in itself, rounded, compact, and precise. In the second act the English earl's daughter and baronet's wife, whom her husband has groundlessly divorced, finds herself in New York, where she and the drama begin to drift in a fashion that means loss of caste to plays and women alike. This second act is a mere corridor, with the rustling and peeping appropriate to corridors. In the third act Miss Akins, hesitant between various issues, adopts that capital resource in emergencies—she summons a taxicab. Its wheels pass over the heroine, and she expires on a sofa in a finale in which the sugar of Dumas' dying Marguerite is mingled with the bromo-seltzer of Sudermann's dying Beata. If Miss Akins had any meaning in the play, her powers of concealment are extraordinary. There are strivings for psychology and there are memories of literature.

The surprise and pleasure of the performance lay in the acting of Miss Ethel Barrymore. In my former not very large experience of this actress I had found in her no trace of power. I had seen her in plays that called for power, and I had ungallantly told myself that power fled at her approach. It has ceased to flee. I do not know whether her acting caught fire from her flame-colored gown, or whether her imagination was stirred by the mixture in her heroine of the beau monde and the demi-monde, the two great delectations of that solid middle-class which serves as floor to the one and as ceiling to the other. At any rate she took the part of Lady Helen Haden with genuine if febrile vigor, and was effective in the rendering of a haughtiness which contrived to be reckless without forfeiting its reserves. The high gale of the first act became rather zephyr-like in the second, but the interest did not fail, and the drops—the vertical drops—from the dithyrambic to the tranquilly incisive were particularly happy in this play. Of course it is not a great part in any historic estimate of drama; a great part must be first of all a great whole, and Miss Akins's Lady Helen is not a whole at all. Harry Charteris in Act III tells Lady Helen with entire truth that her character is in pieces, and generously offers to put them together. The sensible Lady Helen was herself too generous to burden him with a task which had proved insurmountable to Miss Barrymore and Miss Akins.

The support was barely adequate. The intelligence of Mr. Harry Plimmer as Sir Bruce Haden bestowed largeness on a small part and fineness on a coarse one. Claude King's manliness found neither space nor ease in the straitjacket of the ignoble part of Rudolph Solomon.

O. W. FIRKINS

Among the Old Book Stalls

IN Paris the venders of second-hand books cling to the quais on the left bank. They spread out their wares in rows of weather-beaten boxes set on top of the river wall. Who can ever forget a morning ramble in May along the Seine, or the variety of things he found for sale between the Pont Royal and the Pont Saint Michel! The vender's stock ranges all the way from vellum choir books to butterflies, old coins, and seashells, with a yellow patch of fiction to attract the casual eye. Some of these portable junk shops held treasures worth digging for. I remember that an art student a few years ago found in a portfolio a bundle of drawings by the Old Masters which he recently sold at auction for a hundred times the price he paid. These stall keepers are as familiar as the row of plane trees along the quais, and their fascinating history by Octave Usanne is a handbook for all true lovers of book-hunting. In London the haunts are more scattered. However, the "grubber" knows those dingy stalls under St. Paul's, and certain shops in Charing Cross or Wardour Street where semi-precious gems are still brought to light occasionally.

New York has no neighborhood with bookish traditions like Paternoster Row, so that the second-hand dealers have clung to the main cross streets: Fifty-ninth, Forty-second, and Twenty-third, whose busy sidewalks are thronged all day long. Here they burrow into the basements of old high-stoop houses, and overflow the wide areaways. A dozen shops further down in lower Fourth Avenue are the nearest things we have to a Bookseller's Row. They are the first line of defense above the No Man's Land of commerce which stretches to the Battery. Away downtown, below the City Hall, there are a few shops hidden among the office buildings, but the trade for the most part has moved north beyond the circle of banks and brokers.

All these dealers have regular customers and most of them issue catalogues, those precious "text-books of literature" which the old-book lover devours with as fine a relish as the gourmet does his wine list. Some collectors even prefer to do their buying at home beside the fire, marking a catalogue like a man selecting flower-seeds or plumbing fixtures. But the sportsman takes the trail for a likely scent. As soon as a library has been sold or an auction completed, the book hunter mounts his hobby for a round of the shops. He does not pause outside at the five and ten-cent tables, filled with rows of faded fiction left to bleach their bones in the rain and weather. He steps inside to rummage. The true lover will not be fastidious about dirt, or fear to soil his gloves, for half the joy of the hunt is getting delightfully grubby.

If it is Americana or Old New York you seek, you may find odd copies of Valentine's Manual, filled with color plates of streets and houses long vanished in this day of skyscrapers; a bound volume of "The Mirror" to which Poe contributed tales and criticisms; early editions of Whitman, Hawthorne, and Washington Irving. But to make the game supremely worth the candle, you must be in quest of some long-sought volume. In six months I collected a complete first edition of Thackeray, in the old Smith Elder green cloth binding. This was in the face of quite brutal discouragement from all the dealers. One shop in Ann Street had a battered set, which they would not break, repeating that I was mad to try for another, as a similar set had brought an unbelievable figure at Southby's the year before. Undaunted my search went on; down into cellars and up into garrets, through dingy back rooms where the candle flame caught the glint of another prize high on the shelves, until one by one, all the treasure was unearthed.

There are books which merely by their titles can make vivid a past generation. To look through a row of old Annuals, or Keepsakes, or a stray volume of Godey's Ladies Book, with their mezzotint landscapes and languishing ladies, the fashion plates of the '50's or the flowery verse of N. P. Willis and Fanny Fern, is like overhearing an old lady talk of her youth. These all find a place on the stalls. Their day is still too recent for them to be of value, and now they wait in the dust while their gold-stamped wreaths and urns grow dull, pathetic tokens of our grandmother's time, for another generation to garner. They are not old enough to be rare, simply out of fashion.

You will often find copies of a series of gift books published in London over fifty years ago that are worth having for the pictures. The cover designs are horrible, the poetry quite as bad, but the full-page woodcuts, designed by the men of the '60's, are often masterpieces of drawing. They belong to that golden decade of English art when Millais, Rossetti, Holman Hunt, Madox Brown, Fred Walker, Charles Keene, DuMaurier, even Whistler, were among the list of artists who illustrated these "Picture Posies," "Legendary Ballads," and "Home Affections by the Poets." Some of the plates are superb examples of wood engraving that we can not match to-day.

The second-hand shops are open all day and sometimes at night, for the busy collector who likes to spend an hour over a box of old playbills or autograph letters. High noon is usually the busiest time, outside, at any rate. In Fourth Avenue there are half a dozen shops in one block where a group of idlers will gather during the lunch hour, to haul over the old magazines, to finger dusty engravings, or become absorbed in some technical book on the tables; but rarely to buy.

Charles Lamb always found so much that was appealing in these "street readers," that a mention of them loses half its flavor without his account of "the poor gentry, who, not having the wherewithal to buy or hire a book, filch a little learning at the open stalls—the owner, with his hard eye casting envious looks at them all the while, and thinking when they will have done. Venturing tenderly from page to page, expecting every moment when he shall interpose his interdict, and yet unable to deny themselves the gratification, they 'snatch a fearful joy.' Martin B., in this way, by daily fragments, got through two volumes of Clarissa, when the stall keeper damped his laudable ambition by asking him (it was in his younger days) whether he meant to purchase the book. M. declares, that under no circumstances in his life did he ever peruse a book with half the satisfaction which he took in those uneasy snatches."

You may accuse me of impiety for talking so long about old books before calling on Lamb, the Patron Saint of Book-Hunters. He is sure to pop up sooner or later, like King Charles' head when Mr. Dick had his say. But the days for spying out ragged duodecimos on the stalls has gone by. Lamb would find no more folios outside on his walks from the East India House. In these days of catalogues, like the rest of us, he would have to be content with smaller game. The bookseller's catalogues have brought about a surprising uniformity of price, so that the sooner the young book-hunter forgets about the old days of fabulous bargains and lucky finds, the better it will be for his morals and his collection. It takes time and patience, and then courage to the sticking point to buy on the strength of your own knowledge. Of course, there is a heaven-born instinct for finding books as there is for lighting on four-leaf clovers, but this belongs to the elect alone. Eugene Field had it to the despair of his family; so did T. B. Aldrich and Laurence Hut-ton.

The most genial bookseller I have ever known was old Tom Foley, or "Old Folio" as he was called, who, till a few years ago, kept a shop in a cellar on lower Fourth Avenue, behind Grace Church. Hundreds of books lined the low room and stood in piles about the floor. He usually kept the gas burning, to light up his dusky haunt, as well as for the small heat it gave him in winter. He had a room close by in St. Mark's Place, but got most of his meals on a tiny gas stove at the back of the shop. Tom was so crippled with rheumatism that he sat all day in an armchair reading his favorite author, "Sweet Master Walton," and occasionally pointing out his wares with a cane, when a customer stepped down to look around. He had been a mighty fisher in his day, and was never tired of telling of his great catches, or quoting from "The Compleat Angler," which with its quaint engravings had become his testament for solace and adventure.

It was here they formed the Second-hand Book Club. Of course only dealers were admitted to the meetings, when they came together once a month, to smoke for an evening and discuss the trade. Most of them were more prosperous than Tom, who looked, in his old coat, quite one of his frayed first editions. They were gatherings which Lamb would have loved, and I fancy his shade must have slipped in sometimes to chuckle with them, over their pipes and grog. At odd times the club met for dinner, at a cheap table d'hôte; but an evening at Tom's was always more easy, after they had joined together to buy him a Franklin stove. When a walking trip was proposed for a Sunday on Staten Island, they found it would be too hard for Tom. His chief objection was that there would be no chance for fishing. A compromise was finally agreed upon—a day along the Bronx River where he spent the time in vainly whipping the stream till dusk, after which they all gathered to dine under an arbor of a little French restaurant beside the water.

Poor Tom is gone now, and the Club has probably moved into finer quarters or dispersed. The old cellar is still a shop, with here and there a volume left from his day, like bits of ivy on a ruin, to greet you in memory of those brave times. When the wreck came, his copy of Walton was lost, I know not how completely. Some day my search may be rewarded; until then the quest is to the dauntless rummager.

LAWRENCE WILLIAMS

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little further into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available, without much trouble through publisher, book-shop, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles are in no sense bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help to make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

American Government

THE temporary disability of the President, and the constitutional questions arising therefrom, the conflict of the President with the Senate, amendments to the Constitution, enacted or proposed, the attitude of the Federal Government to the industrial situation—all these matters of daily importance lead one to the books which describe the actual working of our Government. The importance and reputation of Bryce's "The American Commonwealth" (Macmillan) may cause a reader to neglect a number of books by American writers who have combined accuracy with an attractive style. One of the most recent, a substantial volume of over 600 pages, is William Bennett Munro's "The Government of the United States, National, State, and Local" (Macmillan, 1919). John A. Fairlie, in his "National Administration of the United States of America" (Macmillan, 1905), describes the various departments of the Government. Similar are James A. Woodburn's "The American Republic and Its Government" (Putnam, 1916), with eight long chapters on such subjects as the Presidency, the Senate, etc., and Frederick J. Haskin's "The American Government" (Lippincott, 1912). More extensive studies, buttressed with many references, are "American Government and Politics" (Macmillan, 1914), by Charles A. Beard,

(Continued on page 506)

Steel

Up to 1906, there was no motor manufactured that could be depended upon to stand up under the gruelling conditions found in a steel mill.

To develop such a motor became the fixed determination of the Crocker-Wheeler Company and this determination was subsequently translated into definite accomplishment by C-W Form W Rolling Mill Motors. The bull strength and high overload capacity of these motors have enabled manufacturers to meet the arduous schedules of production incident to the super-production of steel.

Alb Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

EXPERIENCE RESOURCES FACILITIES

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

In White Armor

The Life of Captain Arthur Ellis Hamm,
326th Infantry, U. S. Army
by

ELIZABETH CREEVEY HAMM

The vivid, intimate story of a young man who turned his back on wealth to fashion his life in conformity with his own high ideals. It is the dramatic tale of his love, courtship, and marriage, and of his enlistment in the army to help "get the terrible business over" as quickly as possible, so that he might, with free conscience, establish and build up a true American home. Lastly, there is the record of his life as a commissioned officer overseas, and of his death in action on the Lorraine front just before the Armistice was signed. This touching story will be read with heartfelt sympathy by all who have lost loved ones over there.

"The interesting record of the manly and generous life of a young American captain . . . a tireless worker and a fearless leader." THE REVIEW.

At all booksellers: 12". Illustrated. $1.50 net and "The New American Government and Its Work" (Macmillan, 1915), by James T. Young, which not only tells of the powers of the Government, but aims to describe their results, and includes chapters on topics like "Public Opinion." John Fiske, in "Civil Government in the United States" (Houghton, 1904), achieved a text-book with a popular and readable style. It begins with the township and works up through the county and State to the national government.

(Continued from page 504)

Two good text-books, for reference, are A. B. Hart's "Actual Government as Applied Under American Conditions" (Longmans, 1918) and R. L. Ashley's "The American Federal State" (Macmillan, 1911). A sort of popular text-book, with interesting illustrations, is "The Citizen and the Republic" (Longmans, 1918), by J. A. Woodburn and T. F. Moran, while Charles A. and Mary R. Beard's "American Citizenship" (Macmillan, 1915) is brief, aims to interest, and considers many new questions of progressive politics. Jeremiah W. Jenks, in "Principles of Politics" (Columbia Univ. Press, 1909), deals with such general subjects as legislation and the suffrage. The origins and development of our political system is the topic of Henry J. Ford's "Rise and Growth of American Politics" (Macmillan, 1898). Rather a reference book than a volume to read through is Frank J. Goodnow's "The Principles of the Administrative Law of the United States" (Putnam, 1905).

A reader who wishes to investigate the opinions of Presidents may enjoy Woodrow Wilson's "Constitutional Government in the United States" (Columbia Univ. Press, 1911), William H. Taft's "The Presidency" (Scribner, 1916), Theodore Roosevelt's "American Ideals," Benjamin Harrison's "This Country of Ours" (Scribner, 1897), and Grover Cleveland's "The Independence of the Executive" (Princeton Univ. Press, 1913).

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Achorn, E. O., and Teall, E. W. The Unknown Quality. Marshall Jones. $1.50 net.

Bleackley, Horace. Anymoon. Lane.

Foote, M. H. The Ground Swell. Houghton Mifflin.

MacManus, Seumas. Lo, and Behold Ye! Stokes. $1.60 net.

Malet, Lucas. Deadham Hard. Dodd, Mead. $1.90.

Sinclair, B. W. Burned Bridges. Little, Brown. $1.60 net.

Thurston, E. T. The World of Wonderful Reality. Appleton. $1.75 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Brooks, C. S. Chimney-Pot Papers. Yale Univ. Press. $2.00.

Ellsworth, W. W. A Golden Age of Authors. Houghton Mifflin. $3.75.

Hearn, Lafcadio. Fantastics and other Fancies. Houghton Mifflin. $1.65.

Jenkins, MacGregor. Literature with a Large L. Houghton Mifflin. $1.00.

McGrane, R. C. The Correspondence of Nicholas Biddle. Houghton Mifflin. $6.00.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Bill Sewall's Story of T. R. Harper. $1.25 net.

Dinsmore, C. A. Life of Dante. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.

McLennan, J. S. Louisbourg From Its Foundation To Its Fall. 1713-1758. Macmillan.

Newbolt, Sir Henry. Submarine and Anti-Submarine. Longmans. $2.25 net.

Seitz, Don. Artemus Ward. (Charles Farrar Browne): A Biography. Harper. $2.00.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Weale, B. L. P. The Truth About China and Japan. Dodd Mead. $2.00.

Willoughby, W. F. Government Organizations in War Time and After. Appleton. $2.50 net.

DRAMA AND POETRY

A Book of Princeton Verse, II, 1919. Edited by Henry Van Dyke and Others. Princeton Univ. Press. $1.50 net.

Belasco, David. The Theatre Through Its Stage Door. Harper. $2.50 net.

Lowell, Amy. Pictures of the Floating World. Macmillan. $1.50.

Matthews, Brander. The Principles of Playmaking. Scribner. $1.60 net.

The Collected Poems of Rupert Brooke. Lane. $1.25 net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

Chas, J. S. California Desert Trials. Houghton Mifflin. $3.00 net.

Collins, Joseph. My Italian Year. Scribner. $2.50 net.

O'Brien, Frederick. White Shadows in the South Seas. Century. $4.

SCIENCE

Bond, A. R. Inventions of the Great War. Century. $1.75.

McFee, I. N. The Tree Book. Stokes. $1.75 net.

JUVENILE

DuBois, M. C. Comrade Rosalie. Century. $1.50.

Saunders, Marshall. Golden Dicky. Stokes. $1.50 net.

Scoville, Samuel J. Boy Scouts in the Wilderness. Century. $1.50.

Walsh, G. E. The Boy Vigilantes of Belgium. Century. $1.50.

THE ARTS

Robinson, A. G. Old New England Doorways. Scribner. $3 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Fox, D. R. The Decline of Aristocracy in the Politics of New York. Longmans, Green.

Hoffman, H. A. Everyday Greek. University of Chicago Press. $1.25 net.

Hutchinson, E. J. Women's Wages. Longmans, Green.

Thwing, C. F. The College Gateway. Pilgrim Press. $1.50 net.

Ward, Mrs. Humphry. Fields of Victory. Scribner. $1.50 net.

Putnam's Publications

Oct. 3,
1919

Antique Jewelry and Trinkets

Fred. W. Burgess

Author of "Antique Furniture,"
"Old Pottery and Porcelain," etc.

8°. Very fully illustrated, $3.50

A valuable handy-book of reference, entertaining, authoritative, and informing, for the connoisseur, the amateur collector and the general reader. Uniform with this author's other well-known works on old furniture and pottery.

The Notebook of a Spinster Lady

8°. $2.75

A charmingly written volume covering the years between 1878 and 1903. Its pages live with the most amusing pen pictures of the notables of that day. There are innumerable anecdotes of the men and women who made the later Victorian Era such an interesting page in history.

G. P. Putnam's Sons

New York

London

FIGHTING THE SPOILSMEN

Reminiscences of the Civil Service Reform Movement

By William Dudley Foulke, LL.D.

"No student of current day politics should be without this book."
The Outlook.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS $2.00 net

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 24

New York, Saturday, October 25, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	507
Editorial Articles:
A New Chapter Opening in Russia	510
The Hitch at the Conference	510
The Americanism of Roosevelt	511
Armenia's Danger	512
The Astor Fortune and Single Tax	513
Political Justice, 1793 and 1919. By William Haller	514
The Standard of Living of Steel Workers. By Francis Tyson	515
Gabriele d'Annunzio. By Vincenzo De Santo	517
Poetry:
Fairies. By Edmund Kemper Broadus	519
Correspondence	519
Book Reviews:
The Manifold Problems of Asia	520
Masculine Comedy	522
Dante	522
The Run of the Shelves	523
The Larger Education. By Foster Watson	524
Drama:
"Hedda Gabler" at the Neighborhood Playhouse	525
Books and the News: Prohibition. By Edmund Lester Pearson	526

THE prospect of a settlement of the Treaty question, both prompt and satisfactory, was never so bright as it is at this moment. Amendments destructive or dangerous to the Treaty have been voted down by decisive majorities; and on the other hand, the strength of the sentiment in favor of proper safeguards in the shape of reservations has been equally manifest. Danger is not yet past, however. The final outcome still depends upon the firmness and courage of the moderate reservationists in the Republican half of the Senate. They are evidently in a position to command the assent of the Administration Senators to their requirements, and there is no doubt that on this side they will stand firm. The real test will come in their dealings with their own side of the Senate. It is vital to the attainment of the end they have had in view all along that they shall not yield to the insistence of Mr. Lodge or anybody else in behalf either of mischief-making wording of the old reservations, or the addition of objectionable new ones. The great object for which they have asserted their independence of a bad leadership is on the eve of accomplishment; let them not falter in the hour of victory.

THE speech of Senator Lodge in the Senate and the meetings addressed by Senators Johnson, Borah and Reed will cause the thoughtful to reflect on a serious aspect of the anti-Covenant fight. For many years America was isolated by choice. It was the isolation of self-development, of the absence of interests over seas. Our hermit days are over, but we are faced with the danger of an isolation of a different sort, the isolation of suspicion and dislike. Thus England wishes nothing more earnestly than to be friends with us, for she sees in Anglo-Saxon solidarity the one sure foundation for durable peace, but it sometimes looks as though we were striving to make this impossible. And toward Russia, land of untold suffering and unmeasured sacrifice in the common cause, we have maintained a policy—or lack of policy—such that, unless prompt measures are taken, it will postpone indefinitely the resumption of our traditional friendship, based upon mutual advantage and the absence of conflicting interests.

In their speech-making tours over the country Senators Johnson and Borah have addressed large and enthusiastic audiences and have received great acclaim—from whom? From the anti-English, pro-German, and radical elements. They have driven to the support of President Wilson large numbers of self-respecting citizens who were outraged by an alignment against the League of a clientele that is redolent of Hearst and his propaganda. The Republican party does not desire the adhesion of this element and could not obtain it if it did. Senator Lodge has secured at a deplorable cost the few senatorial votes that it represents.

It is time to take stock of our position in the world. No matter what our strength or self-sufficiency, we cannot afford to be without friends among the nations or to invite the possibility of a hostile coalition. We must cease to play upon the national or racial sympathies and prejudices of our citizens of alien origin in our domestic politics, jeopardizing thereby our good relations with other lands. We may well strive to cultivate a little of the urbanity and national good manners that play so important a part in the improvement of international relations.

“YOU can not pacify hungry men with high-sounding platitudes, or feed under-nourished children with academic philosophy,” says Acting President Lewis of the United Mine Workers. But he fails to explain how the nourishment of the children is to be improved by their fathers working six hours a day instead of eight, or five days a week instead of six. Of platitudes it can at least be said that they don't directly cut down the food supply.

IT is hard for us in the East to understand the periodical flare-ups in California over the Japanese question. It is hard to determine how much of this excitement is artificially stimulated by the politicians for the purpose of scaring the American workmen and capturing their votes, and how much is due to genuine apprehension on the part of sober-minded and thoughtful citizens over the menace of an alien and unassimilable population, accustomed to standards of living far below the American level. The number of Japanese in California is certainly not formidable in comparison with the numbers of aliens found in other parts of America. They do not seem to have kept wages down; they are industrious and law-abiding; they have no sinister designs for the overthrow of our government. This does not mean that we want the bars let down for the admission of the yellow races. Far from it. We cannot afford to have another race problem on our hands. And if the Japanese, as is asserted, are not keeping their part of the “gentlemen's agreement” (which, as everyone knows, is merely “exclusion” strewn with flowers to save the feelings of Japan), the State Department should attend to the matter.

But it is most regrettable that Senator Phelan has seen fit to agitate in the Senate for more drastic anti-Japanese legislation at this time, when there are so many causes of friction and misunderstanding between the two countries that cannot be avoided—causes that go back to the early days of the Peace Conference, when Japan was prevented from getting into the League Covenant a recognition of what she called the principle of the equality of races, and that culminated in the recent discussions in the Senate. Moreover, Senator Phelan's strange and ignoble defense of the Shantung provision of the Treaty hardly predisposes one to take seriously what else he may have to put forth on Japanese matters. If Japan "must expand," he says, "then her expansion in Shantung" ("by agreement with China," he adds,—"surely with his tongue in his cheek") "is more acceptable to us than her expansion in America, both North and South. If we exclude Japan from America, as a wise national policy, we should not be unduly alarmed about Shantung." In other words, we should condone the wrong in China because we thereby save ourselves. The fatuity of the Senator's reasoning does not lessen the ignominy of his stand.

THE Secretary of the Navy has added this gem to the collection of fantastic warnings of the fate that awaits us if we fail to enter the League. We shall then, he declares, have to build a navy that will "more than match" the combined naval strength of all the nations that do enter the League. Now the Review is, and always has been, in favor of our entering the League of Nations, but only because it is convinced that doing so means taking upon ourselves the responsibilities of membership in a family of friendly and justice-seeking Powers, a new order of international comity not simply the effect of the League but rather the ground of its possibility. Mr. Daniels is evidently of a different mind. In fact even we ourselves cannot be trusted outside of the League. That at least would seem to be the implication of the alternative that he presents to us, in these valiant terms: "If we stand aloof and self-reliant, prepared to meet the world in arms, moving majestically along our own path toward our aims, crushing or prepared to crush beneath our feet those who oppose us—if this is to be our course, then we of the navy must build, build, build, while the rest of the country must pay, pay, pay." Oh, Honorable Josephus Bombastes, are we really like that—a nation of swashbucklers under the skin! And there is Mr. Chadbourne telling us that our industrial structure is "rotten and tottering." We wonder that any of us can sleep o' nights!

"TRUSTING you will be successful in your nobler work that you are now engaged in, lifting humanity into a higher sphere of culture and enlightenment." Such are the closing words of a letter found in the files of the closed Scandinavian-American Bank, of Fargo, North Dakota. The letter was written by the President of the Bank, and directed to Mr. A. C. Townley, who has figured somewhat notoriously as head of the Non-Partisan League. In the sentence preceding the words above quoted, the writer had said, "I trust you will devote a part of your valuable time now to bridge over this dangerous period, that we may not fear embarrassment and disgrace." The trouble was simply that the bank had been drawing heavily from its funds to finance Mr. Townley's Non-Partisan League and two or three subsidiary organizations. The correspondence shows that Townley had promised to secure deposits for the bank, principally of funds of the State. He had apparently done a good deal in that way, but a stream of new deposits can never avert the final catastrophe of unsound banking. Townley's "noble work of lifting humanity into a higher sphere of culture and enlightenment" on the funds of the Scandinavian-American Bank was not producing the necessary cash dividends, and the inevitable crash finally came, with all the disgrace which President Hagan had sought to stave off by begging the ennobler to secure the flinging of still more and more deposits into the ever widening chasm. And so it must be with all schemes of reform and enlightenment which are not willing to build upon the basic principles of morality and mathematics.

FOR the returned soldier the best is none too good—the public is clear in its mind about that. He deserves a job and a good one. If he is disabled he is entitled to be restored, at the Government's expense, to the highest degree of effectiveness he is still capable of. These are honorable obligations, to be discharged with the full measure that is born of a deep gratitude on the one side and accepted as a just return for services faithfully rendered on the other. But the American soldier is a gentleman, and a gentleman does not expect to be tipped. Still less does an association of the earth's best gentlemen—the American Legion—desire to destroy at the outset its great power for good by committing itself to a policy of obtaining tips for its members. Already the evil omen of a "bonus" appears here and there. Unscrupulous politicians and unscrupulous newspapers will compete for the cheap glory of helping it along. And the soldier, if he is not careful, may be caught off his guard. In the army a soldier quite properly takes everything he can get and asks no questions save where he can get more. Our soldiers—the vast majority of them—are now citizens. And as citizens they will readily perceive that they can heedlessly be made to part with something that is beyond price in return for a very dirty handful of silver. It is to be hoped that the view expressed by Major S. M. Stratton in Tuesday's Times is a general one among the members of the American Legion, and that it will in the end clearly prevail.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE expressed a wish, the other day, that people might treat ministers as they treat horses. "Please slacken reins in going up hill" is the usual appeal to drivers, to be read on notice-boards along country roads. The British Premier has a bold and summary way of dealing with adverse criticism. The campaign for economy of the Northcliffe press, to which the simile was a reply, calls up a different image of the minister—pulling the nation's wagon, with national revenues of £2,000,000 a day and daily expenditures of double that amount, down a steep hill to its ruin.

FROM the contradictory German and Polish reports concerning the situation in Upper Silesia two facts appear to stand out with sufficient clearness: (1) that the German Schutztruppen and Grenzschtütze have committed atrocities reminiscent of the worst exploits of Prussian frightfulness in Belgium; (2) that the Poles themselves are partly to blame for their sufferings by giving the Germans good cause for red-handed intervention. The Polska Organizacja Woilkowska has been carrying on a busy propaganda in Upper Silesia, and the Germans, in their turn, are accused of having provoked the Polish rising of August 15 and 16 prematurely, in order to quell the impending revolt more effectively and at less cost. But this very accusation brought against them from the Polish side implies an admission of the German charge that a revolution was brewing. The racial struggle is crossed by an economic conflict between German capital and Polish labor, and the German authorities have made the most of this twofold aspect of the situation by laying stress on the dangers of Bolshevism which threaten to disturb the work of reconstruction in those parts. It would suit German interests exceedingly well if the world at large could be brought to believe in the contention that the anti-German agitation among the Polish miners is identical with Bolshevik propaganda. That is what the Germans have been trying to do, so as to justify the temporary closing of mines and the expulsion of Polish laborers, whose places have been filled by the immigration of German substitutes. In this way the Germans have done all they could to secure a favorable issue of the plebiscite. If this mutation of inhabitants has been carried to the extent alleged by the Poles, the Allied troops will have little else to do than to see that the stable-doors are closed in perfect order after the horse has been stolen.

THE abnormal trade relations between America and Europe were again emphasized in the address delivered Monday evening by James S. Alexander, President of the National Bank of Commerce, before the International Trade Conference in session at Atlantic City. For ten months preceding the armistice, our exports exceeded our imports by about $248,000,000 per month. During the first eight months of 1919, this excess reached an average of about $400,000,000. The excess has been wholly in our trade with Europe, the balance with the rest of the world standing about even. Abnormal in its relation to imports, our export trade with Europe has also been abnormal in its character. Crude foodstuffs and raw materials have given way to foodstuffs partly or wholly prepared for use and finished manufactures, which means that we are sending goods for immediate consumption rather than the things which could be used in setting Europe's own industries again in motion. Thus the flow of return trade is not started, and the demoralization of exchange rates becomes worse and worse. The time has passed for the artificial bolstering up of trade relations by Government credits as war measures, and private enterprise and initiative must again come into play. It is hoped that the International Trade Conference will give a great impetus to the promotion of this object.

SENSIBLE advice was given to the Financial Advertisers Association, assembled in New Orleans the other day, by Mr. James I. Clarke, manager of the Service Department of the National Bank of Commerce. Mr. Clarke would draw the line straight and plain between legitimate "publicity" and mere advertising under the guise of news. In a self-respecting financial institution, the "publicity man" and the advertising manager will not wear the same hat. Advertising is all right, but should wear no disguise, and should be purchased and paid for at regular space rates, with no bonus in the shape of a "write-up" in the news columns. The test of legitimate publicity matter must be absolutely its news value, and if a financial institution has no matter to give out that will stand that test, independently of any question of advertising, it has no occasion for a publicity department. The advertising value of legitimate publicity matter must be only a by-product, never the underlying motive. If the order be reversed, editors are disgusted, readers are bored, and the end clandestinely sought is not attained after all.

ACRY for assistance goes up on behalf of Russia's artists, her men of letters and of science. It was bad enough in the days of the Tsars, but in spite of autocracy, in some part because of the very difficulties it threw in the way, intellectual life maintained a vividly and variously effective course. Under the present régime intellectual life is strangled. Those who are fitted to lead it are on the point of perishing. Sympathy for their plight will naturally arise in any mind not warped by the peculiarly dogmatic twist that is today destroying Russia itself. Russia's troubles spring in great measure from a failure on the part of those now in control to resist the false appeal of a dogmatism unrelated to the facts to which it is applied. If those of her sons and daughters who are capable of thinking straight are to meet with speedy destruction, the working out of her salvation is indefinitely put off. Yet it is precisely these people whom the present order is bent on hampering. With a view to aiding in the protection of copyright, the finding of employment for distressed authors and artists, the publication of their works in America, and in general to give them whatever aid may be possible, a society has been formed of which S. M. Ingerman, 219 Second Avenue, New York, is the Treasurer. Information concerning aims and methods may be obtained by writing to the society at that address.

WITHOUT a dissenting voice the New York Board of Aldermen has re-enacted daylight saving for next year. This is the first step in a very interesting experiment on the part of a clear majority of the people to get what it wants. The next step will consist of similar action by neighboring towns and an appropriate adjustment of railroad schedules. Obviously, the commuter who has to start an hour earlier for his office will not be compensated by the extra hour in the afternoon if there are no trains, at the hours he wants them, to carry him to his destination. All this will either work effectively or work to some considerable confusion. But in either case Congress will be in the way to see a great light—a light that is not generated by any of the lighting companies.

GREEK and Latin seem unconscious, after all, that they were among the slain in the great war. Some of the prominent high schools of the country, such as Scott High School, of Toledo, and the Germantown High School, of Philadelphia, report a heavy increase in the enrollment for Latin. The Board of Education in Cincinnati has established a six-year Classical High School, in Walnut Hills, with provision for nearly a thousand students, in which the curriculum will be based on what innovators may regard as a hopelessly archaic combination—classics, mathematics, history, and the sciences. Thoroughness in fundamentals is the ideal, and the scheme seems to have been well thought out by Superintendent Condon. There is no sound reason why any city of several hundred thousand inhabitants should not have one high school of this type. It will be noticed that no exclusion of scientific study is involved. Along with his Latin and Greek and Mathematics, the student may get his initiation into the basic sciences, and we shall be surprised if the Walnut Hills Classical High School does not send some of the very best material into scientific departments of the colleges. Montclair, New Jersey, has restored Greek in its high school, another example which few cities of any size might not follow with profit. If our large city high schools, whenever a given number of pupils applied, would offer to furnish instruction in Greek, scores of classes would soon be organized.

PERHAPS the sorely harassed professor has been kept a little too much in the foreground in the push for increased college endowments. If the colleges are to maintain standards satisfactory to their constituencies, they must be able to secure and retain men of suitable preparation and ability. But such men are not reduced to the alternative of continuing in poorly paid college positions or starving. Most of them could go into much more lucrative work with little difficulty, and many of them are now finding themselves forced to do so by the present cost of living. The college is in a worse predicament than the professor. He can turn to other fields of work, it cannot. It must either have very largely increased endowments, or find its credit injured by the continual loss of good men from all its departments of instruction. The "poor professor" has been long-suffering rather than give up certain non-financial emoluments of his calling; but now that the increasing cost of living has made the situation in so many cases impossible, he is finding it only too easy to take care of himself elsewhere. It is the college that is in danger.

A New Chapter Opening in Russia

THE doom of Bolshevik rule in Russia seems at last to be actually impending. Long since, the blood-stained ruffians at Moscow saw the hand-writing on the wall and realized that only Red revolution in other lands would avail to save them from their fate. They continued to cling to power in desperation, in the midst of a people that hated them unutterably, only because of the fatalistic inertia of the starved and terrorized masses. Latterly they have made feverish but futile overtures of peace to the neighboring peoples that they had earlier ruthlessly attacked, and now they see no hint of pity in the malignant glances of the unhappy beings whom they have tortured with the most cruel social experiment of all history. They know the end that awaits them.

From the outset they had everything in their favor. Theirs was the inside position; theirs were the railroads, the arms, the vast amounts of munitions and supplies left over from the great war. At their command were a hundred million simple peasants, ready to believe in them and easily satisfied if only they were given the opportunity to gain a modest livelihood and be accorded justice, and freedom from extortion and oppression. Their opponents were penniless refugees, and so thoroughly had they spread abroad their cunning propaganda of falsehood that these opponents found little genuine support where they had the right to expect it. But the fatal weakness of Bolshevism lay in its moral bankruptcy and in its utter lack of constructive ability. Its programme was altered from day to day with cynical effrontery, to meet the demands of shifting political or economic expediency, though a few of its leaders continued to affect the pose of fanatical adherents of its dogmatic theories and talk the trite patter of communism and class-warfare.

The anti-Bolshevik forces gathered strength slowly. The difficulties were enormous and disheartening. They were without money, arms, and supplies; they lacked unity and were scattered on a dozen fronts. Numberless risings within Soviet Russia were put down with ruthless brutality, and the cowering population could not raise a hand to help its would-be rescuers from without. Finally Siberia was liberated, and from its sparse population the liberal and patriotic Kolchak organized an army for the redemption of his country. But vicious Bolshevik propaganda saw to it that he was denounced as a tyrant and reactionary, bent on the restoration of Tsarism, and recognition was withheld from him, when recognition would have meant the saving of millions of lives and years of chaos. The indomitable Denikin, the successor of the brave Alexeiev, held out with a little band of devoted Cossacks in the North Caucasus, for many months cut off entirely from the outside world. The story of the heroic exploits of his Volunteer Army is perhaps the most romantic of the whole war. Step by step they fought their way to the sea and learned that Germany had been defeated. Then came British aid, and with a mighty sweep they reclaimed South Russia with its 40,000,000 people and great industrial resources. To-day they are almost at the gates of Moscow and their victorious campaign has sounded the death-knell of Bolshevik rule. But it should not be forgotten that it was the work of Kolchak that made this possible and that his retreat last summer, disastrous as it was, proved the undoing of the Soviet armies. In the northwest, Yudenich, gathering together a pitifully small force from many groups, and suffering from the interplay of local intrigues and conflicting nationalist interests, is bringing rescue to the starving remnants of Petrograd. Hemmed in on twelve fronts by advancing armies, the Bolsheviks are at bay, threatened from without and crumbling from corruption and revolt within.

When at last the curtain is rung down upon this tragedy of unparalleled bloodshed and suffering, will it be rung up at once on a fresh drama of civil strife? Who is to be the ruler of the new Russia, whose the power that is to undertake the task of restoring order and reconstructing civil life? Will the rival ambitions of victorious leaders start the conflict anew, and will the partisan dissensions to which the Russians are singularly addicted prolong the chaos? If so, the burden of responsibility must fall heavily on the Allies and America. The prompt recognition of the All-Russian Government at Omsk, a recognition that would have been accorded long ago had it not been for the senseless flirting with the Bolsheviks, would do much to stabilize the forces in Russia that are working for order. That Government has achieved a practical unity among all the Russian groups, and the maintenance of its legal continuity in the present crisis is all-important.

Some of our childish theorists affect to believe that all that needs to be done is to hold an election and summon a Constituent Assembly. One has but to picture to oneself the utter demoralization of civil life, the destruction of all institutions of government, the break-down of communications, the ignorance of the masses, and the menace of an intervening period of uncertainty, to realize the futility of such theories. Denikin and Kolchak are high-minded and self-sacrificing patriots. Kolchak is the acknowledged head of the Russian Government, but he is far from Moscow, has a weak cabinet, and may at any time, thanks to Allied policy, find himself entirely dependent on the Japanese and subservient to their demands. Denikin, who has pledged allegiance to Kolchak, will be first in Moscow. He has about him a group of able councilors, far stronger than the cabinet at Omsk. If the Government at Omsk is recognized at once, Kolchak may find it expedient in the emergency to hand over authority to Denikin, in the assurance that the legal continuity of the Government would not be interrupted. The supporters of Yudenich include many powerful financial and industrial leaders, who in the nature of things are less unselfish in their patriotism and think chiefly of regaining their property. They may prove a disturbing factor if strong support is not promptly given to the present Russian Government.

In the background looms another danger, the measure of which it is not easy to take at the present moment. Like a panther ready to spring but biding his time, stands the well-trained professional army of von der Goltz. Civil strife would furnish the longed-for opportunity. It would be welcomed as were Rurik and his Varangians at Novgorod. A civilian army of German engineers and industrial organizers would follow in its train. Order and prosperity at German hands would mock the Allies and America, who failed the Russians in their hour of need. Such a dénouement would mark the débâcle of a statesmanship that won the war only to lose it.

The Hitch at the Conference

BY the time this issue of the Review reaches its readers, the question whether the Labor Conference at Washington is to accomplish anything or not may have been virtually settled. If the Conference fails, it will be in spite of the fact that a real desire to be effectively useful has animated nearly all the delegates. If it succeeds, it will be in spite of the fact that the procedure adopted was such as to precipitate a struggle upon the most vital and the most difficult of all controversial issues before anything had been achieved toward bringing the assembly together, either through the development of helpful programmes upon less crucially disputed matters or through the stimulation of a general good understanding.

There are many desires which all men of good will at the Conference have in common, irrespective of their industrial status or connections; there is just one subject upon which a division of the sharpest and most deep-seated kind exists. That one is the degree of power which the great national labor organizations are to have over the industrial activities of the country. And it happens that that division is at this particular moment accentuated in an unusual degree by a strike of almost unparalleled dimensions, in which it is the one controlling issue. Any principle announced by the Washington Conference which would be, or would be regarded as being, a decision of the question upon which the steel strike is being fought out, would inevitably throw a tremendous weight into the scale in favor of the side whose stand it justified. Even if such were not the situation, the pronouncement would be watched with intense jealousy on both sides. As has been pointed out at the Conference, there are thousands of small establishments—concerns employing less than 250 workers each, but in the aggregate representing a large percentage of the whole industrial force of the country—in which the owners and managers look upon freedom from dictation by the national labor organizations as vital to their welfare, or perhaps to their existence. But with the colossal steel strike in the very throes of decision, every element of difficulty inherent in the abstract question is intensified by its immediate and crucial bearing on this concrete case.

Nor is the difficulty diminished by that concealment of its real character in which—doubtless with the best of intentions in many cases—refuge has so generally been taken. On the surface, all that labor asks is that the employees in any establishment shall, in the case of any difficulty, have the right to be “represented by representatives of their own choosing”—a proposal the justice of which would, if we knew nothing about actual facts and conditions, be pronounced absolutely self-evident. But it is in the light of those facts and conditions, and not in the abstract, that the proposal must be viewed. In the mind of the labor group, the adoption of the proposal without qualification would have a perfectly definite practical consequence. In every serious labor controversy, the great national organization of the industry concerned puts forward its claim to be reckoned with as the representative—through its officers or delegates—of the employees; and hereafter, whenever that claim was denied, the decision of the Washington Conference would be pointed to as settling the moral right of that claim. Accordingly, a long step would have been taken toward abolishing all individual arrangements between employers and employees which did not acknowledge the supremacy of the great labor organizations. And of course, with this achieved, the universal substitution of the closed shop for the open shop—a constant, though often unavowed, aim of the labor organizations—would become a mere question of time.

Nothing could be more misleading, therefore, than to say that the question at issue is that of the right of collective bargaining. The time has been, indeed, when that principle was disputed, and unquestionably the employing class was in former days not only unreasonable and unintelligent, but unfeeling, in its denial of the right. But that time is long past; the days when employers refused to deal with their employees otherwise than individually are gone, never to return. A sounder argument in favor of the proposal that employees shall have the right to be “represented by representatives of their own choosing” is that, in the nature of things, it is often impossible for them to find, among their own number, persons who can urge their case with the necessary ability, and also that representatives who are in the service of the employer are subject to intimidation in the prosecution of their cases, and to reprisal in the event of success. This is a real difficulty; but in order to meet it, it is certainly not necessary to lay down a principle which will in practice be understood as an acknowledgment of the right of the great unions to universal control of the labor situation.

There is no reason why the Conference should undertake to settle, by a single sweeping dictum, a question of such vital and comprehensive importance. Its dictum would, of course, in any event, have no compelling authority. The representation of the country at the Conference is largely haphazard. The President has, indeed, in his choice of the group standing for the public—upon which group rests the responsibility for the introduction of the disputed resolution—evidently sought to include men of all shades of opinion. Outright socialism and the most orthodox conservatism are represented in its membership. But no one can say that the group as a whole carries the weight of extraordinary authority; and still less can it be said that the resolution it has offered is the product of prolonged and thorough consideration. Now that it has been offered, it has got to be dealt with; for it seems plain that to shelve it altogether would be to abandon all hope of anything being accomplished at all—the Conference would either break up or be reduced to futility. Accordingly, as we write, the best that is to be hoped is such modification of the resolution as would grant its large and general purpose, but would prevent its having the specific effect which the labor group desire to accomplish through it. Even so, it might justly be welcomed by that group as a gain for labor. If the labor men spurn any gain short of that which they had had in view, they will be guilty of just such unreasonableness as, in past times, they have charged the employers with exhibiting. For it is surely unreasonable for them to demand that they shall attain, by the snap judgment of a hastily assembled Conference, an absolute verdict upon an issue which has been for years, and still is, the centre of most acute controversy, and upon which the country at large is far from having come to the conclusion which the labor group desires to have recorded. Upon that issue, as upon many others, we must, in the future, as in the past, work with patience; the best that we can hope for from the Conference is an increase of good will and of understanding in dealing with it.

The Americanism of Roosevelt

ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL WEEK is well timed. The better part of a year has elapsed since the Colonel's death, and in that period has been going on a steady confirmation in the public mind of an impression which many hoped might remain full and strong. Death and time add dignity to real greatness, and the fact that the trivial has already fallen away from the man is the best evidence of his quality. He always commanded affection, yet something more than affection is attested by the almost continuous stream of visitors to the grave. In his case, it is as though that historical perspective for which biographers are constantly straining had set in much sooner than usual, and had let his contemporaries glimpse him with the eyes of future generations.

Roosevelt was fortunate in his end. He died in big times, when the question of Americanism had already become paramount and consequently when what was probably his most dominant characteristic—love of country—had occasion to show its depth and intensity. What would have been his judgment concerning the immediate issue which confronts the Senate it is needless to inquire. His judgment was not infallible, even on questions of broad policy, and no further words from him could now add much to the influence which his memory is accomplishing. In all the dispute over what constitutes genuine Americanism, there has never been anyone so rash as to doubt that, whatever it is, it was possessed in full measure by Roosevelt. His life until shortly before his death furnished glowing pictures of the sort of hardy activity which made this country what it is. Yet he was not provincial. An interested student of the history of all ages and a traveler in many lands, he believed that a strong national feeling was an indispensable bulwark of civilization. He had looked forward to some kind of league of nations as a desirable instrument with which to fight the war spirit, but to the One Big Nation which the new-worlders pictured as the solution of all international problems he was opposed on the ground of common sense. He favored America's playing a large part in the business of the world, yet even at a time when he was honored by the personal attention of European monarchs there was never any thought that he would come back with a new international programme. A cosmopolite, he was an American through and through.

This is the aspect of Roosevelt upon which attention might well be focused during Memorial Week. For it bears strongly on great issues upon which the country to-day is endeavoring to reach right decisions. It should be clear that any arrangement with other nations which would make impossible henceforth such love of country as Roosevelt had, or which would remove the possibility of producing future men on his lines, would be too costly a sacrifice. However noble the impulse to cast in our lot with others, it must be frowned upon unless it safeguards to ourselves the rich opportunities which were his. That, though a difficult test to employ, is one which appeals to our deepest and most trustworthy instincts. Here is the irreducible minimum beyond which we ought to be unwilling to go. Fortunately, leadership of this sort is not entirely absent from the discussion in the Senate, though party politics have frequently frustrated it. There is a sturdy group of men who, while rightly jealous of the American spirit and determined that it shall still be free to develop in directions long ago marked out for it, have every desire to see this country assume heavy responsibilities for the good of the world. The problem is one which demands the exercise of as deep-seated and generous an Americanism as Roosevelt at his best was capable of.

The question of the melting-pot is also one which in the near future will tax the best thought and the best instincts of this country. Already the sentimental cry is heard, and in quarters where it is likely to do the greatest mischief—in certain college faculties—that the newspapers are engaged in a conspiracy to put the foreign-born element in a difficult position. The charge is foolish and naive but it will be hard to silence it unless we can draw upon the example of such men as Roosevelt. He liked to emphasize the mixture of foreign blood in him and was forever claiming kinship, however jocosely, with the most obscure races represented by new arrivals in this country. But by any attempt on the part of foreigners to cast suspicion on our institutions he was outraged. We shall have need of this sympathy and this righteous anger in all the readjustments of industrial and social conditions which are contemplated. In a letter just recently published the Colonel informed his old Maine guide, Bill Sewall, for whom he had obtained a ranch in the West, that if he was willing to work without sparing himself the first year, and to work hard for many years, he could count upon a respectable living. This is a different spirit from that which is fostered by sentimentalists, and which at least implies that this country owes a comfortable existence to all immigrants, while of the reciprocal responsibility there is scant mention.

If in stressing the sterling Americanism of Roosevelt and his great qualities, we have said nothing about his faults, it is because his faults, of which he had his share, furnish no lesson comparable in value at this time with that to be got from his virtues. The memorial planned for him includes several features, but in all the intention is, we believe, to emphasize the man in relation to the country he loved so well. A symbol will thus be created which he who had known and understood many peoples would most have liked.

Armenia's Danger

"IN Anatolia the soul and heart and vigor of the Turkish state has always lain," says Sir W. M. Ramsay in an article on "The Conditions in Asia Minor" in a recent issue of The New Europe. That is why the leaders of the Nationalist or Young Turkish party have seized on that part of the Ottoman Empire to initiate a patriotic revolt against the Entente. Mustapha Kemal Pasha a month ago usurped command of Turkish forces in Asia Minor acting, probably, as an agent of Selim Effendi, an ambitious heir to the Sultanate. The Government at Constantinople made a feeble show of disavowing the movement by charging Abdullah Pasha to go and summon Kemal to resign his self-assumed command. But instead of Kemal it was the Government that had to resign as a result of the Young Turkish rising, and a friend of its leader, Djemal Pasha, was appointed Minister of War in the new Cabinet.

This bodes little good for the future of Anatolia, which, since the armistice, had thought to see the dawn of a new life. For Kemal represents the Young Turkish policy of centralization, which has been the curse of Anatolia in the past. "The cure for the evils of western Asia lies in the wise restoration of local self-government," says Sir W. M. Ramsay. A successful issue of Kemal's adventure would preclude the application of that cure. Much will depend on the prestige of the Entente and its power to enforce its will on the Young Turkish schemers. Unanimity among the great Powers and a definite line of conduct are needed to command that prestige. But both are, unfortunately, in abeyance. A sensational editorial in the Temps of October 9 advocated a policy toward the new situation in Asia Minor which is diametrically opposed to that of Great Britain. The paper favors absolute abstention from interference with this revival of Young Turkish rule, and the re-establishment of an independent Turkey not very different from the pre-war Empire, although shorn of Mesopotamia, Arabia, Syria and Palestine. A crusade against the Young Turks, the Temps argued, would give them a pretext for fresh massacres of Greeks and Armenians. We fear, on the contrary, that the policy of abstention advocated by the Paris journal is the very way to expose those races to the atrocities it professes to be anxious to save them from. The extirpation of the Armenians forms part of the Young Turkish programme of Ottomanization, and their political conduct in the past makes it difficult to attach any weight to Kemal's favor-begging declaration that he deplores the massacres of Armenians and has issued orders to respect their lives and properties in the future. If he means what he says, no interference of the Entente would endanger the Armenians; and if he does not, the great Powers need not hesitate to furnish him a pretext, where any stick will do to beat the poor dogs.

But we have better authority to go by than these doubtful promises of Mustapha Kemal. Dr. James L. Barton of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, who has recently returned from a six months' sojourn in Armenia, has told in the Christian Science Monitor what the remnant of the Armenian people has to expect from the Turks if these are left in absolute control. The Young Turks, he says, are everywhere arming themselves with guns and munitions supplied by the Germans during the war, and their forces are joined by regiments demobilized under the terms of the armistice. Enver Pasha, in Dr. Barton's opinion, is at the back of this movement. There is every reason to believe that this statement is correct. Enver Pasha is a nephew of Mustapha Kemal, and one of the leaders of the Young Turkish régime during the war who were responsible for the Armenian massacres. His uncle has, of course, contradicted the rumors concerning a secret understanding between Enver Pasha and himself. But it is more than likely that the Turkish revolt in the Persian province of Azerbaijan, which is said to be the work of Enver Pasha, is part of a concerted action of the two. The nephew's record is such as to make one fear the worst from his return to power. The Armenians know what their lot would be. "Although food is very difficult to obtain, they did not ask for bread," says Dr. Barton. "What they wanted was safety. If we can have safety, we can get bread somehow."

That safety the Temps would deny them under pretence of wishing to spare them a renewal of the massacres. Jealousy of England, and a secret fear of her Arabian policy, which the Syrian agreement has only partly dispelled, seem to be responsible for this stoical abandonment of the Armenian people. The wish to counterbalance that policy by means of a restored Turkey is stronger with the editors of the journal than the feeling that Armenia has a claim on the protection of the civilized world. This attitude is the real ground of Great Britain's insistence that the United States should accept a mandate for Armenia. Not the absence of undeveloped oil fields, as Senator Borah sarcastically hinted, makes such a mandate for England undesirable, but the knowledge that her acceptance of it would pour Armenian oil, which according to Senator King of Utah actually exists, on the smouldering fire of French jealousy and distrust.

The Astor Fortune and Single Tax

THE death of William Waldorf Astor has naturally been made the occasion of a great deal of comment upon his personal career, a career quite singular in the circumstances and character of his expatriation. It is well worth while, however, to utilize the opportunity which public interest in his affairs presents for dwelling upon the part which the Astor fortune has played in relation to the single-tax movement. During the better part of a century, the vast increase of value in the real-estate holdings of the Astor family has furnished the one shining example of the enormities of the unearned increment. The case of the single-taxers has rested in the general mind less upon the inherent merits of the abstract argument than upon the effect on the imagination of a few dramatic examples. But it is a remarkable fact that in all this time the Astor fortune has remained the only one that is of sufficient prominence to be familiarly referred to.

If people were in the habit of stopping to think quantitatively in such matters, this circumstance would be enough, of itself, to give rise to serious questionings. If land-holding or land speculation were the royal road to wealth which it has been represented, how does it come that, in all these decades in which American riches have been piling up by leaps and bounds, the Astor fortune remains, as it was in the day of small things fifty or sixty years ago, the only accumulation of wealth obtained through the rise of land values which has been great enough to attract national attention? Millionaires and multi-millionaires have been made by the score, some of them in the space of but a few years; which of them has got his wealth by means of the unearned increment? Henry Ford is making annual profits which in the course of four or five years pile up to an amount equal to the whole value of the real estate possessed by William Waldorf Astor as the ultimate result of generations of the most successful investment in the most rapidly rising real estate in the country. Mr. Woolworth, beginning as a poor boy, built up, by the simple process of selling miscellaneous articles at five and ten cents apiece, a fortune quite comparable to that of Mr. Astor. And a thousand examples could be mentioned of more or less similar success attending undertakings which, like his, were in no way helped by special privilege of any kind. But where are the instances of like success in the business of land speculation—a business which, be it remembered, has for its field of opportunity nothing less than the entire land area of this country with its marvelous expansion in industry and wealth?

Nor does the consideration of the matter stop with the question of the building up of extraordinary fortunes by speculation or investment in land. How does it stand in regard to the ordinary investments made by shrewd judges of business opportunity? Of such judges the American business world is full. What does one find in the inventories of the estates of our rich men when they die? Very rarely does real estate form any considerable part of the fortunes which they leave. All their lives they have scrutinized the merits of every important opening for the investment of their accumulations, and of these openings that presented by land is never absent. Why do they not seize upon it, if it is the Golconda that single-tax orators represent it to be? Above all, why does so very little of their investment take the shape of the purchase of vacant land and of that "holding it out of use" which is supposed to be so tempting?

There is but one possible answer to these questions. Particular instances there are, and not a few, in which the holding of land with a view to profit from its increase of value proves a brilliantly successful venture. It is these instances which strike the imagination and remain fixed in memory. But to one such instance there are twenty in which the profit is no more than normal, and hundreds in which there is not profit but loss. And the shrewd investor knows that, so far from land speculation being an "open-and-shut" game, it is a business for the successful prosecution of which the utmost sagacity and judgment are required. Taxes and interest go on unrelentingly, year after year; the big advances come only at long intervals and only in specially favorable situations. It is more than doubtful whether, taken as a whole, investors in land get as much as an average return on their money, not to speak of the fabulous gains that they are supposed to enjoy. Whatever may be true of a limited number of individuals, there is no such thing in this country as a class fattening upon the unearned increment of land values. And, though the fact is not perhaps clearly apprehended, it is probably owing to a more or less conscious perception of it that the single-tax crusade has made so little headway. To confiscate gains while making no compensation for losses does not appeal to the American instinct for fair play.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.

Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

EDITORS

FABIAN FRANKLIN

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Political Justice, 1793 and 1919

THE right of private property, the right, that is, to control any part of the flow of the products of labor, is a mere social patent secured and maintained by physical force and giving rise to all social evil. In a world of reason and good will the products of labor would automatically go to those that had most need of them, remaining in the possession of the producers only until such need were known. In such a world, so fertile is the earth and so infinite the capabilities of man, there would be only peace and plenty for all. This is not the case at present because, from time untold, the few among whom reason and good will, for inexplicable causes, do not prevail have chosen to seize control of property by violence, violence which prevents truth from being known and good will from acting. Ostentation and luxury, the traditional code of manners and morals, concealing the evil men do and suffer in a mantle of social graces and an odor of sanctity, these things are violence, and violence none the less effective for not being overt, the flourishing of the bludgeon sufficient without the blow. Hence come poverty, ignorance, fear, vice, crime, war, and all unrighteousness. Change to a better world, however, can not in general be brought about by more violence, since war and revolution change only masters in rivetting chains, but by rational persuasion. At the same time, it must be admitted, reasonable and kindly men, convinced that a better world lies just beyond their grasp, need not stop at a few blows to seize it and bring it in, justified for one more war that they may end war forever.

The truth having been conveyed to all by argument and no more force than is necessary, the incubus of old governments and all the evil they cause will drop from humanity's shoulders. There will then arise in each individual the conviction that he only serves his own interest who forgets it. The only form of social organization needed will be some simple instrument for keeping truth alive and for circulating such special information as may be needed for it to function. This will be no more than a series of local councils with power to inform us concerning the wants of men and the means of supplying them in order that we may spontaneously produce and convey to each other whatever we require, and these councils will be held together by nothing more than a central Amphictyonic assembly with like powers. By some such process and instrument, and by no others, can man's inhumanity to man be finally done away.

Such is the central thesis of the book called "Political Justice," which William Godwin was permitted by Pitt to publish in 1793 at the price of a guinea a copy on the ground that it was calculated to do mischief only among such persons as possessed not a shilling. That it contains much that we all may desire without believing that we are likely to get it immediately, few will deny. It was not ostensibly an apologia for any particular scheme of radical reform, but it is in effect the complete apologia of all such schemes. The world has long rung with the antiphony of voices crying, "Do you believe in murder?" over against those who cry, "Do you not believe in the brotherhood of man?" It is hard to vote against the millennium, and the last refuge of the radical has always been the counsel of perfection. Godwin, for instance, supposes that a number of persons incarcerated in a madhouse have persuaded themselves through the chinks of their cells that they are being treated in an unreasonable and unkindly manner. What need they do to gain justice? Nothing, save quietly to refuse obedience to all commands and, having calmly persuaded their keepers that men are brothers, to walk out of their prison.

Godwin had an extraordinary genius for being absurd, but if we substitute for madmen industrial workers and for their bedlam modern industrial society, we have the essential elements of the theory offered in defense of all movements now called, more conveniently than clearly perhaps, Bolshevist. If the theory is sound, is it not illogical of us to try to put the madmen into strait-jackets before they walk abroad, or to object if, instead of quietly laying down their tools before beginning to argue, they throw them into the machinery or at our heads? It is, however, more strikingly noteworthy that the Russian equivalent for Godwin's local council is soviet, for his amphictyony the all-Russian Congress of Soviets, and that the constitutions and decrees of those bodies, so diligently published in this country, might easily have been a modern redaction of "Political Justice." To be sure, the soviets have felt constrained to use machine guns to facilitate the communication of truth and the spontaneous flow of commodities from those who had them to those who had not, but even that policy is confirmed by the neat theory according to which Godwin lets in at the back door that devil of physical force he had shut out at the front.

These are obvious parallels, but we have had of late another fully as complete in quite a different quarter. It is worth noting that the personal origins of Mr. Wilson appear to have been, like Godwin's, among English Calvinistic dissenters. Now Calvinism, when inverted into politics by the eighteenth century, took the form of a mystic faith in an absolute good dwelling in man as a mass of morally undifferentiated individuals and in an absolute evil dwelling in particular persons and institutions. Theological Calvinism asserted that, though men might be saved, man was wicked; the political Calvinism of such persons as Godwin and Mr. Wilson asserts that men are wicked but that man is good, capable in some miraculous way of apprehending truth and communicating it, if not to the persons to whom he entrusts his affairs, at any rate to the philosopher who holds this particular doctrine. Godwin fails to explain how it was that the primeval Pitts and Cannings were ever permitted to fall away from the pristine reason and good will of their natures, but his faith in man as the indubitable vox dei is not therefore shaken. That voice speaks intelligibly to William Godwin, and however men and systems seek to stifle it, he hears the truth that it would utter. So Mr. Wilson appeals with a religious fervor from the wickedness of governments and rulers to the righteousness of peoples. The German Government and certain Germans might wrong the world, but the German people never. The truth might not be in the chancelleries of Europe, in this Senator or that Representative or in the whole Congress of the United States, but it was in the people and by them transmitted, however the elections went, to Mr. Wilson himself.

When, in the light of these considerations, we examine the arguments for the new solemn league and covenant of which Mr. Wilson is the sponsor, it is easier to understand one reason why they have in many quarters been received with no warmth of zeal even if without hostility. The chief advocate of the league asks us to believe that the League of Nations can function, not as an authoritative government, but through such a council for investigation and advice as Godwin proposed as the ideal form of social organization. We are asked to expect its success because of the immediate practical validity of the principle that in this present imperfect world truth can with relative ease be ascertained, can be communicated, and can furnish sufficient motives to action without further compulsion. A central committee is to discover the facts as to the needs of men and the means of satisfying them. Though the committee is to have no power to compel obedience, no one is expected to seek his own interest in hindering its investigations. No one is expected in any way to prevent it from reporting its findings, and all peoples are expected spontaneously to act, through governments formerly suspect, in accordance with them, sinking immediate self-interest in universal benevolence.

The Standard of Living of Steel Workers

It would be idle to insist that nothing has ever happened in the world to give color of reason to such expectations. The great inter-allied commissions of the war, as the American member of one of the most important of them has pointed out, though mere "fact-finding" and advisory bodies without power, did somehow cause momentous and beneficent acts to occur. Action in such cases, however, was strictly consistent with the rule laid down by Burke that men's sense of political right inheres in some tangible interest and that they act from adequate motives relative thereto. In other words, it did not rise from anyone's excited consciousness of the truth residing in altruistic principles, but from the character of particular men under the stress of compelling circumstance. That the public defence of the League has not convinced many thoughtful persons of the tangible interests it may serve, that it has not inspired confidence in the men who are to direct this greatest of fact-finding commissions, is profoundly to be regretted. Mr. Wilson's argument has been too much in the strain of fervid affirmation of his own mystic political faith in the principles of universal benevolence and individual wickedness. We may well believe that men must ultimately be ruled in their acts by intelligent good will or perish, but whether they are now so ruled, we may be permitted to doubt. The League of Nations will to some end function, but we have no sure conviction as to what that end will be. If Mr. Wilson's faith is justified, if mankind does indeed stand upon the threshold of political justice, the future will have reason to revere him as such a seer as we have not often honored. Meanwhile, without failing in our devotion to the idea of justice, but remembering what things are even now being done in its name, we may have courage still to question. We are asking whether the difficulties in the way of his covenant's success are not so great as to demand some special grace from heaven unless our latter state is to be worse than our former. He on his part is asking the old question, whether we do not believe in the brotherhood of man. We do, but we may not therefore be prepared to accept even in these terms the much disputed doctrine of salvation by faith alone.

WILLIAM HALLER

THE "Workshop of the World" at the headwaters of the Ohio is credited with producing a full fourth of our munition material during the war. The coming census will, no doubt, return a population for Greater Pittsburgh, or Allegheny County, of 1,250,000; perhaps more than 350,000 are male wage earners, in about 3,500 establishments. The great majority of these workers are engaged in basic industry; more than a third in steel work alone. Fully two-thirds of the steel workers are unskilled laborers. In most of the big plants about two-thirds of the workers are foreign-born, usually non-English speaking. To this class belongs almost all the unskilled force, save a small number of negro workers, five to ten per cent. of the total, who were introduced from the South with the ceasing of immigration from Europe. The speeding-up and over-exertion of the war, only more intense than in the period preceding, has been followed by a reaction in the direction of great restlessness and mobility; for no new hordes are pressing into our valleys to bid for the jobs and create a surplus of labor. An unwonted independence is seen among the foreign workers. What, then, is their lot that they should be dissatisfied with it?

The wage of this great unskilled labor force is uniform and standardized. It was but 17½ or 18 cents an hour before the war; now it has been raised by repeated steps throughout the war to 42 cents; and a late war-bonus measure, announced first in September, 1918, provides time and a half payment beyond the first eight hours of toil, or an average of over 48 cents an hour for common labor for most of the workers, who work the long day.

Tubal Cain is relentless; steel is of necessity a continuous industry, run on a two-shift basis. At a conservative estimate, about half of the employees in the steel industry worked during the war a day turn of ten and one-half hours and a night turn of thirteen and a half hours, in alternate weekly shifts. The mode wage for the groups is, then, for twelve hours' average work, totalling, with the bonus payment, $5.88 a day. During the war, too, the industry was on the seven-day basis, except in the finishing mills. This involved always for blast-furnace crews and in large measure for the open-hearth and rolling-mill force seven days' work a week with 24 hours' continuous labor at "the turn," or change of day and night shift, every other Sunday. With the addition of clean-up and repair work, done always on Sunday, perhaps as many as a fourth of the steel workers have the seven-day week, although it should be made clear that some of the Sunday workers have another day of the week off. In many processes work is not incessant, and there is opportunity for rest from the heat. The effects of the long day upon family and civic life are the most costly.

There is some public misunderstanding concerning the extent and privilege of eight-hour work. Judge Gary testified before the Senate investigating committee that in the United States Steel Corporation some 69,284 employees were working the twelve-hour day; 199,896, ten hours, and 88,904 "averaged an eight-hour day." But in this last figure must have been included office force, locomotive engineers and firemen on corporation lines, and skilled men like brick-layers, carpenters, and machinists employed around the plant; or perhaps it took into account part-week work. So far as the large steel mills are concerned, only the workers in some of the plate and tin mills and the small crews of the two or three Bessemer converters, still operated in the Pittsburgh district, work the eight-hour shift. A recent statement of classified hours by the superintendent of a large Corporation mill showed only two score men working eight hours in a force of nearly seven thousand.

The ten-hour working force, in addition to some of the wire and tin mill operators, includes a considerable section of the unskilled laborers doing shovelling work. The ten-hour common-labor wage, seemingly about as prevalent as the longer shift, is now $4.62. In some plants these yard and general workers constitute a majority of the force. It is to be hoped that the forthcoming report of the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics on wages and hours of labor in the iron and steel industry, 1913, 1915, 1917, and 1919, now in press, will provide classified figures as to particular jobs by hours, that authentic generalizations may be made concerning prevailing hour and wage groups. It might be mentioned here that a considerable amount of steel mill labor is paid on the "tonnage" rather than the hour-rate basis.

The great problem of the steel industry is obviously not the inadequacy of wages under these conditions of the prevalent long-day and high-war rates, where semi-skilled work of many kinds brings a wage ranging from seven dollars a day up to thirty dollars a day in the very small skilled group of rollers and leaders. Certainly, at the most liberal estimate, the cost of living since 1914 has only doubled, while the average wage-increase of the unskilled labor force has been as much as 150 per cent. Of course, food costs are high in the Pittsburgh district. The Monthly Labor Review of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for August, 1919, pp. 4-5, gives the latest available figures summarized from the cost of living survey of the bureau of 1918-1919, undoubtedly the most intensive and complete budgetary study yet attempted in the United States. The annual expenditure for food for white families with annual incomes of from $1,200 to $1,500 was $535 on the average, Pittsburgh standing twentieth on the list of the ninety-one cities of the nation in height of food cost. And of forty-three cities where families of the same size (equivalent to 3.35 adult males and to $1,300 total annual expenditure) were selected, Pittsburgh stood ninth on the list, with $559 as the average annual expenditure for food. The company store is still a factor in the steel mills, particularly in the smaller towns of the district; and it is perhaps true that unlimited credit encourages extravagant expenditure. But as a force counteracting the rapidly rising cost of living and preventing depression of the standard of life, it must be remembered that unemployment and seasonal employment so long inherent in steel production was almost entirely eliminated by the incessant capacity production of the war period. As Andrew Carnegie phrased it long ago, steel is either prince or pauper; in the war steel has been prince. Not only have investors profited; but many of the steel laborers, more particularly the foreign workers, now have a surplus in Liberty Bonds and other savings.

Nevertheless the speeding, excessive work, over-exertion, and fatigue serve in a measure to explain the disquiet among the floating single-man labor force—how large we do not know—and the increasing discontent among the family group. And this is true in spite of the fact that every effort has been made by the Corporation to bring about physical improvement in working conditions by providing lockers, shower baths, drinking fountains, and the like. It should be stated also that the safety system of the steel industry has been for some time of first rank in the country. More fundamental, even, is the post-war policy of the Corporation in eliminating seven-day work as rapidly as possible. The big Carnegie mills and furnaces of the Pittsburgh district were, before the strike, already practically back to six-day work. Only shortage of labor deterred the full operation of this policy.

When all has been said, however, the hard problem of the steel workers is that of living conditions almost as much as that of working hours and methods. To put the issue concretely, land is no longer cheap. Nature, bounteous in her gifts of billions of tons of coal, has made the hillsides of our river valleys difficult and costly places for the building of homes for people. And there has not been the incentive for organization and creation in housing and education that existed in the provision of machinery for increasing production and profit. Land in coal-deposit districts is fabulously high, and speculation has enhanced its rent. The physical configuration of Pittsburgh, crowded between rivers and hills, is a basic consideration. The mills command the river-valley sites and still further raise land values. Housing, the problem of all the industrial sections of the nation, is in a peculiar sense the problem of Pittsburgh. Perhaps only a population of raw peasants from Austria-Hungary and the Balkans would be content with the ugly shacks scattered over the hillsides or find livelihood in the four and five-room shanties or frame tenement flats that rent for eighteen to twenty dollars a month. The visitor wonders often how some of the ancient places manage to hold together and to cling to the sloping hillsides. When the single-man boarding houses, well-nigh universal in the foreign groups, are remembered, some conception may be formed of the widespread congestion and decline of the standard of living. Estimates of the shortage of houses vary from 20,000 to 80,000, according to the standard taken: for instance, if the sanitary code applicable to cities were enforced, a considerable percentage of the dwellings in which the foreign and negro workers live would have to be condemned.

The war overtook us "just as we were beginning to put our house in order," said one of the Corporation officials the other day. In fairness it must be said that large housing projects were planned; Judge Gary referred in his testimony to a housing expenditure of $39,000,000; at Homestead, it is understood, land was leased and ambitious plans drawn up; yet plates of some of our battleships were made in Homestead under the shadow of old hovels inhabited now by negroes, who but lately replaced Slovaks and Poles; the latter in turn had followed the Irish of the nineties into the same squalid quarters. Man, wife and child, and eight to twelve boarders are not unusual in one home. Three and four-room quarters are the rule; and modern sanitation has not yet conquered the hillsides, or even penetrated all of the valleys. Bad housing contributes largely, along with ignorance, to the heavy toll of life that the community pays. Infant mortality is an exceptionally good measure of community solvency; the average in the city of Pittsburgh is 122.5 as contrasted with New York's 91.7 and New Zealand's 50. And, as the study of the Federal Children's Bureau showed so graphically for Johnstown, it is likely that among the families of immigrant steel workers one child in every four dies in the first year of life. In the Pittsburgh district only at the Clairton plant of the Carnegie Steel Company and at the Woodlawn operation of Jones and Laughlin Company have company houses yet been provided on any extensive system.

The members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Education investigating the strike in Pittsburgh on October 11, 12, and 13, after two days of testimony, emphasized the issue of Americanization as the phase of the question of most immediate concern to the country at large. The members of the Committee were seemingly amazed at the surprisingly small percentage of naturalized foreign-born workers in the steel mills and were perturbed by the prevailing lack of a knowledge of the English tongue.

The strike was found to be almost entirely a movement among the unskilled workers in the steel mills; when it is clearly understood, as stated before, that in most of the big mills of the Pittsburgh district the foreign-born employees make up sixty per cent. of all the workers, and that the number rises to ninety-five per cent. of the unskilled working force of these mills, the intimation that the issue is one between Americans and the foreign born is easily comprehended. In some of the mill towns outside of the Pittsburgh district the percentage of foreign-born workers is even higher; yet there have been almost no opportunities or incentives for gaining citizenship and becoming adjusted to the American standard of life. For instance, Captain William B. Hunter, Deputy Burgess of Monessen and head of the Citizens Protective League, testified that in a population of 23,000 in that industrial town there were only between 2,000 and 3,000 native-born Americans; that in a school population of 4,500 there were more Italians alone than American children; and that no effort had been made to secure teaching in English at private Slavic schools, or to organize adult English education.

The long day emerged once more, at the hearing, as the basic issue of the controversy; about a score of witnesses testified in reply to incessant questioning of the Senators concerning their failure to become citizens, that they had had no time for education or naturalization during their years of residence here. In reply to specific questions, August Mann, Superintendent of the Donora plant, American Steel and Wire Company, testifying for the company, admitted that two-thirds of a force of 4,300 were foreign and non-English speaking. O'Reilly, a roll setter at the same mill, stated the day before that of the men in the plant only 582 spoke English. He called attention to the fact that the census showed only 15 per cent. native Americans in the town of Donora. Superintendent Mann said the company itself had tried to provide schooling; last year a canvass of the mill for a class after working hours had met response from but eighteen of "the boys." He admitted in reply to Senator McKellar that it would increase the efficiency of the plant if the foreign-speaking workers could be induced to learn English. A Sunday meeting for that purpose "got nowhere." This is the almost universal experience where efforts at providing facilities for learning English and citizenship have been made.

Senators Kenyon and Walsh, and their more conservative colleagues of the Committee, were seemingly convinced, after their visit to Pittsburgh, of the need of compulsory education for the foreign-born, as a deterrent of industrial unrest and the growth of Socialism. Congressman Clyde Kelly, who comes from Brad-dock and knows the steel workers, has already introduced a House bill providing for "declaration of intention" at entry or within one year, and for compulsory citizenship five years thereafter, with deportation as the penalty. Perhaps a more discriminating plan of restricting immigration is that advanced by the National Committee for Constructive Immigration Legislation, which proposes limitation of entry on a percentage basis, admission to be determined by the number of immigrants from any country who have already become citizens here.

The objection to this and similar coercive legislation is the difficulty of enforcement and the possibility of grave injustice—to say nothing of the arbitrary restriction upon increase of the labor force at a time when continued industrial expansion is essential. Any measure will indeed be shortsighted which denies satisfaction to the true demand for labor. And it must be borne in mind that the transition to the three-shift system in the steel industry would require a forty per cent. increase in the labor force. The real problem is the definition and enforcement of this true demand for labor in terms of standard of living. Some economists go so far as to advise the consideration of a new contract-labor provision, which shall bond the manufacturer heavily, and furnish administrative control for the enforcement of minimum standards.

The frequently suggested Federal legislation for an eight-hour day, or for the minimum wage, is out of the question by virtue of Constitutional limitation—instanced by the recent adverse decision of the Supreme Court in the Child Labor law. Both the subterfuge of the interstate commerce clause and the weak "general welfare" provision are ineffective. Professor J. R. Commons, of Wisconsin, about a decade ago advanced the more constructive, if almost as radical, proposal that the taxing power should be used to obtain shorter hours and improved living conditions. His suggestion was that a discriminating excise or internal revenue tax, to be administered through the Tariff Commission, should be operative in protected industries. The plan would ensure the passing on of the promised advantages of the tariff to labor by securing fair and reasonable standards for the workers. The employer might be compensated for increased costs involved by remission of the excise, or by revision of the tariff schedules upward.

There is real need now for further study and deliberation on the problem. During the war, the War Labor Board made a considerable contribution towards fixing minimum standards by Government supervision. Such methods, though they may seem to be innovations in American life, will more than justify themselves if they serve to obtain uninterrupted production and avoid struggles over distribution which defeat their ends by the bitter animosities they create. These conflicts are particularly dangerous for the stability of American life when antagonisms are transferred, as seems to be the case in the steel industry, from the economic to the racial field. Yet it is most desirable that needed changes should be brought in through voluntary effort; the eight-hour shift, for instance, would have to be introduced slowly to be fully successful. Certainly there can be little hope from a panacea or legislative short cut that tends to make us minimize the crucial and difficult local questions of civic leadership, coöperation, and effective community organization for housing, recreation, and education.

FRANCIS TYSON

Gabriele d'Annunzio

WHATEVER d'Annunzio was before the war makes very little difference in estimating his service to Italy and to civilization during the world conflict. If he was corrupted he cleansed himself and found regeneration in the intense, pure, and sacrificing love which he showed for his country and for the holy cause of the Allies. Very few men have contributed more freely and more effectively to the achievement of our common victory than Gabriele d'Annunzio. His self-imposed mission was to open the eyes of the Italians in order to make them see what their duty was; to kindle enthusiasm in them; to encourage them to brave and noble actions; to strengthen them morally at hours of trial; to pray with them, to suffer, fight and die, if necessary, at their side. The call for a fearless, spiritual leader he answered with the fervor and enthusiasm that must have animated the ancient crusaders. On May 4, 1915, upon his arrival in Genoa for the dedication of the monument erected at Quarto in honor of Garibaldi and his thousand volunteers, he delivered his first war message to the Italian people:

Here I am in your midst. I returned to Italy to pray with you first and then fight at your side. But why do you acclaim me in this manner? If I came to announce a great victory you could not welcome me with greater enthusiasm. Well, I am the harbinger of victory. . . . We have no choice but war and war will give us victory.

On May 12 the poet arrived in Rome, where he was acclaimed by the people as their prophet. His first public address, on the same day, had an indescribable effect. The pent-up emotions of the inhabitants were let loose and it became immediately evident that there was no power in Italy to resist the will of the people. The Government under Salandra was still undecided as to the step Italy should take. The anti-war party under Giolitti, the friend of von Bülow, was still very active. But d'Annunzio had with him the people of Rome as well as of all Italy. On the following day, May 13, he told the thousands that had gathered around him that it was no longer time to talk but to act.

"If it is a crime," he cried out, "to incite the people to violence, I willingly commit that crime. We are being betrayed. The honor and safety of the Patria is at stake. Go, act. Spare no one who opposes your sacred rights."

For several days he continued to fan the patriotic fire which was increasing in volume throughout the land. The climax came on May 17, when he addressed a monster meeting at the Campidoglio. At the conclusion of that address he brought forth the sword that had been used by Nino Bixio, Garibaldi's sturdy companion in the expedition of the Thousand, kissed it reverently and exclaimed: "The hour has come. Ring your bells!"

In a few minutes the crowds invaded hundreds of belfries and began to ring the bells. Hundreds of thousands of voices were crying: "War, war!"

The people of Italy had declared war on Austria. Giolitti, who had tried to overthrow the Salandra Cabinet and resume the control of Italy, had to abandon Rome clandestinely in order to save his life. Von Bülow, head of the German propaganda, hastened to invoke the protection of several cordons of Italian troops around his palace. On the 20th, Parliament convened in plenary session to take the necessary measures for the formal declaration of war. On that same day d'Annunzio made the following sober and inspiring declaration to the people of Italy:

"Victory belongs to those who have faith in Victory and swear by Victory. We believe in Victory and swear by it. We swear that we shall win."

This phase of his work in the great war being finished, the poet prepared himself for active participation in the struggle. On June 20 he enlisted as a volunteer in the Italian army with the rank of lieutenant.

In order to appreciate fully his work as a soldier, we must bear in mind that he was, at that time, fifty-two years of age, and that his health was anything but flourishing. For forty years he had been pouring out his life over his books. During those years he had not only produced a score of volumes, but each one of them represented what would have taken a less genial mortal years of preparation. "Blessed are those who are twenty years of age," he had said at Quarto, evidently regretting that he was so much beyond the days of youth.

D'Annunzio did not choose an easy task for himself, as his age, position, and the fact that he was a volunteer would have entitled him to do. After fighting for a short time with the land forces he perceived that he could render a greater service in the air, and he learned to fly. One of the considerations that made the poet join the air forces, I believe, was his desire to travel rapidly and carry out his work of inspiring the Italians troops more effectively. He went from one place to another along the several hundred miles of the front in Italy. He went repeatedly to the Albanian front and also to France after Italy sent the quarter of a million troops to aid the Allies in the West. Whenever there was a ceremony or an occasion for him to address the soldiers, with a view to raising their morale and making them better fighters, d'Annunzio was present. His eloquence and implicit faith in ultimate victory were especially efficacious in times of trial. During the Italian reverses in the fall of 1917 he worked like a Trojan night and day. On October 20 of that year he spoke the memorable words "Rather than give up Venice to the enemy let us raze it to the ground!" which electrified the whole world, but had a miraculous effect on the Italian troops, who suddenly realized the magnitude of the defeat that stared them in the face. On the following day we find him on the line of the Piave infusing confidence and determination to resist into worn-out troops who were gathering on that frontier of freedom. "Here they shall not pass," he was crying out at the top of his voice, up and down the line, and the tens of thousands who heard him repeated in unmistakable tone: "Here they shall not pass!" A friend of mine spoke of d'Annunzio's plane in those days as an "angel of victory hovering over our shaken but not broken ranks."

So far as I have been able to find out, d'Annunzio was not only by far the oldest aviator in any army, but also one of the most active, for he knew no rest as long as the war lasted. He took part in hundreds of bombing expeditions, as well as in numerous expeditions of propaganda. Flying over Vienna on August 10, 1918, he dropped thousands of loose sheets from his plane which read:

The fortunes of war have turned; they have turned to our favor irrevocably. Your hour has passed. The hour of Germany which dragged you to abject humiliation has passed forever. As our faith was the strongest so our will predominated.

Viennese, do you want to continue the war? It is your suicide. The whole world is against you. One million and two hundred thousand Americans are fighting in France today. By September there will be two million of them! America is building twice the number of ships the German submarines are still able to sink.

Learn to know your enemies. We fly over Vienna. We could drop bombs by the ton, but we only drop a tricolor greeting, the symbol of liberty. We Italians do not make war on children, women and old men. We make war only on your blind, cruel, tyrannic government which gives you neither peace nor bread, but feeds you with hate and false hopes.

The Allies will never make peace with your present government or the government of Kaiser William. On the other hand they are willing to make peace with the peoples of Austria-Hungary and Germany, a peace based on liberty and mutual respect. The Allies are ready to furnish you with food and all you need immediately after the declaration of peace.

This undertaking was the most spectacular in the poet's life as a soldier. But he took part in hundreds of other enterprises which were just as daring and dangerous as that one. The raid of the port of Buccari, on February 10, 1918, was, in fact, more dangerous than the flight over Vienna. He describes this remarkable feat in his booklet "The Bef-fa (Jest) of Buccari." Thirty men in all, and he one of them, having made their wills, set out, in three small vessels, on an expedition of defiance to the enemy. For almost three years the Italians had been challenging the Austrian fleet to come out and accept battle in the open sea. The Austrians never stirred. Finally, d'Annunzio conceived the idea of taking personally a written challenge to the enemy. He put three copies of it each in a floating bottle which was thrown into the water right under the noses of the hundred guns which were pouring a stream of fire upon the intruders.

"To spite the very cautious Austrian fleet," the note read in part, "which is still glorying over the tiny victory of Lissa, we, the sailors of Italy, who laugh at all dangers and difficulties and who are always ready to dare the undarable, have come here in your very commodious haven to defy you and laugh at you."

After his flight over Vienna all Italy was anxious to do him honor. A committee composed of some of the most illustrious names of the country was formed for the purpose of conferring upon him the greatest honor any Italian could hope to receive, that of being crowned poet of Italy on the historical Campidoglio, repeating the ceremony of the year 1341 when Petrarch was crowned with laurel. But upon receiving on August 17, 1918, the formal invitation to go down to Rome for that purpose, d'Annunzio answered that the war was still on and that he could not spare the time.

"A few tons of bombs dropped on the enemy," he told the committee, "is worth more for the present than all the honors and eloquence in the world. I shall come to Rome only after we win a complete victory."

D'Annunzio remained at his post of duty as a soldier until the last day. His military work was summed up in an official bulletin issued by the Supreme Command on February 5 of this year in connection with the conferring upon him of the gold medal for military valor, which is the highest an Italian soldier can receive.

Poet and soldier of Italy . . . apostle of faith, creator of energy, preacher of duty and sacrifice. We are proud of having had him with us, and while we celebrate him as a stout-hearted soldier, we do not forget his tenderness at the sight of his companions who fell in battle.

Signed: Major General Bongiovanni, Commander General of Aeronautics.

D'Annunzio may be forgotten as a poet, but as long as men remember the great war he will always be spoken of as the prophet and hero of one of the Powers which helped to save civilization from the aggression of the Teutons.

VINCENZO DE SANTO

Poetry

Fairies

Underneath the beech trees,
Lights and shadows glancing,
Surely there are fairies
In the sun-spots dancing!

Underneath the beech trees,
Underneath and in them,
Wait a host of fairies,
Wait for you to win them.

Fairies they are quick folk;
Never may you bind them;
But underneath the beech trees
You can always find them.

EDMUND KEMPER BROADUS

Correspondence

The Personal Equation in the League of Nations

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Trickling through the percolator of the world news, information is accumulating as to the genesis of the "covenant" of the League written into the peace treaty, or, as Mr. Wilson prefers to intimate, "inextricably intertwined" in its provisions. It is immaterial whether one be anti-Wilson or pro-Wilson; for in either case his determination to have his own way is obvious to friend or foe. His recent threat to tear up the treaty rather than communicate aught but an unconditional ratification to the Paris Foreign Office is symptomatic either of that determination or of his then approaching nervous breakdown.

Whatever the action of the Senate may be, that action must be certified to Paris by the State Department in the discharge of a merely ministerial duty under the express words of Article 440 of the Treaty. The work of the American negotiators (if any object to the use of the plural, let it go as a use of the plural of excellence!) is over. They (or He) are (or is) functus. The Senate is now discharging its constitutional duty and prerogative—and with the first gleam of real interest in the distinctive rights of this country since the Versailles conference opened. Hence it is not inopportune to note that the working of the League is going to depend very largely on the personnel of the Council, and the individual motives of and influences behind each member.

Friends of the treaty assume that that personnel is a known quantity. Assume it is for a year or so. Is that an argument pro or con? How is the pressure of their joint or several influence so far being effectively exercised? In re Bulgaria and Thrace? In re Rumanian aggression? In re Turkey and Armenia? In re Fiume? Are they in fact acting jointly or is it true, as charged, that, for example, in the case of Fiume, one member alone has assumed to communicate a threat in terrorem unless his will be done?

Their successors, however, are to be elected by the Assembly. Bourgeois, France's first choice, is not sure of a long lease of life. Mr. Lloyd George might have a political fall. Italy's representative is likely to prove protean. We might have none, after Europe's experience of our representative omniscience. Anyhow, the personnel may change, and the governmental policy represented by each new member may change. National sovereignty remains. New treaties and new alignments of interest may emerge. Can we expect of new Russia, new Germany and Japan a vow of treaty-celibacy? Is the recent cordial treatment of Germans in Japan without significance? Should they unite, a League with no international force but economic pressure could meet their demands only by a new Alliance and instant mobilization. A League without real teeth and the power to bite, and controlled by motives of high humanitarianism must be at a disadvantage if confronted by the sudden aggression of one or more powerful nations—not so controlled.

Membership in the Council means no more than service as an arbitrator named by one party to a dispute. Each acts for his nominator and the third arbitrator acts as arbiter. Each will hold a brief for his own nation and its affiliated interests. The requirement of unanimity in acting detracts from efficiency in an emergency.

The United States has isolated itself by the mode of activities of its Peace Commissioners. Yet, assuming to be the apostle of freedom and of unselfishness, it hesitates to assume a mandate for Armenia, the first duty expected of it under such a League. Whether such hesitation or refusal be justified or not, the fact remains that we, of all the proposed members of the League, are still likely to act with an eye single to our interests. In any event I doubt the power of the Senate or of the Executive to coerce the action of Congress in advance, in this particular or in any other as to which the Constitution vests power in that body.

The working of the League is accordingly dependent for success on the personnel of its Council—and that is to be indicated by x^5 as an unknown quantity. If our present representative is to remain the American member, what guarantee have we, as Mr. Cleveland once observed at a Princeton trustee meeting, that American rights will be asserted and protected?

HENRY W. JESSUP

New York, October 20

Safeguarding the Country Against Bolshevism

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

If any reliance can be placed upon dispatches concerning the military and political situation in Russia and Siberia which are appearing daily in the newspapers, the overthrow of the Bolshevik régime in Russia by the Polish and loyal Russian forces seems to be nearing accomplishment. Granted, if only for the sake of argument, that this is so, the necessity of seriously considering the effects of Lenin's downfall on other countries as a protection to their interests should be recognized before it is too late.

That Lenin and his lieutenants will be forced to seek asylums in other lands than that which they have succeeded in destroying, unless they prefer to surrender themselves to the mercy of their conquerors, unless they are captured before escaping, seems to me to be highly probable. The many statements attributed to the Red premier to the effect that he intends to spread Bolshevism to other countries, such as England and the United States, appears to support this theory. Therefore, his expulsion from Russia would afford him an opportunity to put his threats into practise. The escape of only a part of his gang would be necessary for such an attempt, or attempts, as several nations would no doubt be selected as offering free scope for activity.

Unless stringent measures are now taken by the Federal immigration authorities, the possibility of the return of a former resident of the Bronx accompanied by a few "friends" appears to me to be exceedingly likely. The freedom which has been accorded here to others of his class to foment sedition would indeed appeal to him.

May I, therefore, urge upon your readers the importance of rendering our liberty safe from this new and very threatening menace? It is high time that some definite policy be formulated effectively to combat this danger.

E. H. CAMPBELL

New York, October 1

Book Reviews

The Manifold Problems of Asia

THE AWAKENING OF ASIA. By H. M. Hyndman. New York: Boni and Liveright.

THE PROBLEM OF THE PACIFIC. B. C. B. Fletcher. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

THE ORIENTAL POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES. By Henry Chung. New York: Fleming H. Revell and Company.

THE NEW MAP OF ASIA. By Herbert Adams Gibbons. New York: The Century Company.

THE present Administration has been criticised for sending half of the American fighting vessels into the Pacific and thereby violating the fundamental principles of naval strategy that a fighting fleet should never be divided. It might be retorted that in any event each division is strong enough to protect its end of the Panama Canal until it can be joined through that waterway by the other half. Whether or not this be an adequate answer, the permanent stationing of so many of our war vessels in the Pacific is a definite recognition of the fact that the United States has political and commercial interests upon that ocean that are of very great importance. As to a possible enemy, nothing is gained by concealing the fact that Japan appears destined for that rôle. There is no reason in the nature of things why war should ever occur between the United States and that country, but there is every reason why it should be recognized by the peoples of both countries that at the present time their respective national aims with regard to eastern Asia are in absolute conflict. America desires the open door; Japan seeks special interests, and, in certain regions, paramountcy of control.

The four books listed above are all of very recent appearance and are exclusively political in their scope and purpose. Of the three the least important is perhaps that of Mr. Chung, because it covers ground that has previously been covered by other writers. The work is, however, well done, and the volume is additionally interesting because from the pen of a native Korean. The title is not accurately descriptive, for fully as much space is devoted to tracing the development of Japanese ambitions and governmental methods as to outlining the course of American Far-Eastern diplomacy. Mr. Chung is convinced that "consolidation of Asia under Japanese domination, is the vision of the Japanese statesmen; and toward the attainment of this national goal there is unity of purpose among Japanese leaders." The tone of the volume is, however, by no means acrimonious, and the facts are stated in clear and logical order, and in good English. In an appendix occupying nearly one-half of the volume are given the documents in the case.

The "Problem of the Pacific," by Mr. Fletcher, is also a title which is not fully justified. It is made up of more or less detached comments upon political conditions in the various countries that are within or border upon the Pacific Ocean. The reader is not, however, greatly assisted in solving any "problem" by illuminating and reasoned generalizations; indeed, it is nowhere clearly stated what is the problem of the Pacific. The statement is made in the preface, written by Sir William MacGregor, that its kernel is: "Shall any of the possessions held by Germany in the Pacific be restored to that Power?" This is certainly a far from helpful statement. Throughout the British islands of the south Pacific, including Australia, in Mr. Fletcher's opinion, the central economic need is to secure an adequate supply of labor. But he does not look to Japanese or Chinese immigration to satisfy it. The mother country, he says, must give her assistance, and, in Australia, the control of the central Government over lands and railways must be increased in order that effective means may be devised for attracting thither desirable settlers. Provided radical alterations are made in the terms and the details of their service, he is willing that Indian laborers should be allowed to enter to replace the natives who are dying out. "The white man will not be able to do the manual work required in the coming days, and the Indian or some one else must be given a chance." On grounds of financial economy, also, Mr. Fletcher urges in Australia a greater centralization of constitutional power in the Commonwealth. "One has to admit," he says, "the growing feeling in Australia that unification must come, because the States will not economize. In this war they have been competing more or less with the Commonwealth for loans in the London and local markets. Especially has New South Wales been a sinner in this respect; and public opinion has grown that Australia in self-defense must get rid of a great deal of States' top-hammer."

Mr. Hyndman makes the statement that his book, "The Awakening of Asia," was held up by the British censor for more than two years, and the reason for this is evident in the frankness with which political conditions in India are discussed. Mr. Hyndman is well known by his earlier writings upon Indian affairs, and the chapters which deal with that country constitute the most interesting portion of his volume. What he has to say regarding China and Japan does not add greatly to the information which other writers have furnished. It is interesting, however, to find Mr. Hyndman expressing an opinion which is but repeating the judgment of many other writers familiar with conditions in Far Eastern countries, that the introduction of western civilization into Asia has been by no means an advantage to the people whose modes of life and thought have been affected. But Mr. Hyndman certainly has no warrant for saying, as he does, that European administration, religious propagation, and trade have been almost wholly harmful. Here he is led to an extreme statement by reason of his decided views as to the evils which have attended British control in India.

As regards the imperialistic character of Japan's ambitions, Mr. Hyndman has the same conviction that practically all other students of political conditions in the Far East have reached. But it would be interesting to know the grounds upon which he founds some of his assertions. For example, he says: "Japan had (by 1915) made all necessary preparations to meet any difficulties that might arise. She had established several thousand Japanese laborers within striking distance of the Panama Canal, she had made careful surveys of convenient landing places in Mexico, notably at Tobolobampo, she had entered into relations with the Mexican leaders, she had drafted preliminary agreements with Ecuador touching a naval station in the Galapagos Islands, and she had so placed herself in regard to the Philippines that the United States would find it impossible to keep control of those islands against her, permeated as they were with Japanese agents." Or what shall we say of this statement? "Americans themselves freely admit that the still rising Power of Asia has ample grounds for serious ill-feeling against the Great Republic. Breaches of international law and national pledges have been committed by the United States Government time after time. The 150,000 Japanese—mostly trained soldiers, by the way—who have taken the place of the Chinese on the Pacific Slope are regarded with the same hostility as their forerunners from the mainland of Asia. A massacre of the Japanese immigrants, before they could organize and defend themselves, was not long ago considered possible." A writer who will make such assertions as these has no ground for complaint if no great value is attached to his views with regard to Indian affairs, although as to them he has a better claim to speak with authority. He declares that Great Britain continues to draw to herself great amounts of Indian wealth for which no adequate return is made; that color and race prejudice is becoming stronger every year; that general dissatisfaction on the part of the natives is increasing; that only one penny per head is spent on education by the Government and only 1.9 per cent. of the population goes to school; that native Indian arts are disappearing; that famines are increasing in number; that the agricultural population, already "the most poverty-stricken mass of human beings in the whole world" and constituting four-fifths of the whole of the inhabitants of Hindustan, are becoming even poorer.

As for imperial British rule, the author has the following to say: "India with its 315,000,000 of inhabitants has for just sixty years been under the management of the most extraordinary and fortuitous system of foreign domination known in the history of man. The rulers come in succession from without, educated, until their appointment at the age of more than twenty-one, in accordance with methods as remote from, and as irreconcilable with, Asiatic ideas as it is possible for them to be. Alike in their work and in their pleasures, they keep so far aloof from the people they govern as is possible. Very rarely do they marry Indians: still more rarely do they settle permanently in the country. The head of the Government, who himself is brought out fresh from Europe, and is entirely ignorant of India, does not remain in office more than five years. His subordinates return 'home' frequently for their holidays and go back to England permanently to live on a considerable pension after their term of office is completed."

Without admitting the blackness of the picture which Mr. Hyndman has drawn, practically all English statesmen admit that radical changes in the manner of governing India are needed. These changes, as are foreshadowed in several important Parliamentary reports that have been made, will give to the Indians control of their own affairs considerably greater than that which they have previously had. Whether in this the relaxing of the legal imperial bonds will result, as was the case in the other self-governing Dominions of the British Empire, in a tightening of the psychological ties of union, is a question which no one is able to answer. Yet the experiment must be tried.

Since Mr. Gibbons a few years ago published his "New Map of Europe," volumes from his pen in explanation of current international relations have followed one another in such quick succession as to make one apprehensive of their scholarship. In fact, however, though not buttressed with footnotes and references, they have been scholarly works, exhibiting a wide range of geographical and political knowledge, and a power of lucid analysis and exposition, but possibly a too censorious mind. He seems to disapprove especially of British policies. If, however, all the facts and their values are such as he sees them, he is, perhaps, justified in his strictures. Of one thing Mr. Gibbons is convinced, and that is of the futility of the Treaty of Versailles, either as an instrument of justice or as providing a settlement of national claims that will tend to promote peace, or a plan of compelling peace if need arises.

In this, his latest book, Mr. Gibbons is concerned with the results reached at the Paris Conference only in the sense that it makes no attempt to solve the many problems relating to the Asiatic interests of the Powers concerned. The only matters in the Far East which it attempted to determine are those relating to the German interests in China and the Pacific, and the disposition of these, as arranged for in the Treaty with Germany, is such as to provoke rather than to prevent, future trouble.

Mr. Gibbons' volume deals comprehensively with all the European possessions or spheres of influence or control in Asia and Australasia, but the most interesting of his chapters are undoubtedly those which are concerned with India, with the disintegration of the Ottoman Empire, and with Zionism. In view of the recent Anglo-Persian Treaty, what Mr. Gibbons has to say regarding Persia is of interest, although, at the time he wrote, that treaty had not been made public. The chapters dealing with China are the least satisfactory. It does not appear that Mr. Gibbons has ever been in that country and no one can pass intelligent judgment upon the results effected or to be expected from the establishment of the Republic who has not studied the situation at first hand.

As regards India, Mr. Gibbons points out in a striking manner the way in which Great Britain has been urged on to a continual expansion of this Empire by a conviction of the necessity of preserving control over all the routes, by sea or land, from which India can be approached or attacked. As regards the government which Great Britain has given to that country, Mr. Gibbons expresses highly condemnatory views. "The title of no people to rule over another," he says, "is more questionable in its origin and in its development than that of the British to rule over the Indians." "No Britisher tolerates assumption of social equality on the part of a native, even though ruler of a large State." "Economically, famines are more and more frequent, and the British authority seems to be less able to cope with them than formerly. Trade returns show that England is taking a hundred and fifty million dollars every year out of India with no commercial or material return. This has been going on so long that India has become the most impoverished country in the world." When dealing with a question of India, even the intelligent and highminded Englishman is declared by Mr. Gibbons to have a "perverted or rather unawakened moral sense." These statements are strikingly similar to those voiced by Mr. Hyndman. Indeed, Mr. Hyndham, who has been for more than forty years a student and writer of Indian affairs, is cited as an authority.

Mr. Gibbons' discussion of the fate of the Ottoman Empire and the future of the Ottoman races is exceedingly interesting and valuable. But the question is too complicated to give even a summary of Mr. Gibbons' analysis of it. It may be said that here as in other regions Mr. Gibbons discerns none but purely selfish and nationalistic motives actuating the greater Powers at Paris. The project of establishing a Zionist State in Palestine comes in for his condemnation as a device whereby English influence is to be dominant there; as in violation of the rights of the Palestinian Arabs, Christian as well as Moslem; as likely to provoke French opposition and thus to endanger Franco-British friendship; as tending to revive anti-Semitism in France, and, indeed, in other countries, especially in the Moslem world. The Arabs, he says, are far more Mohammedan than the Turks, and, religiously speaking, have more hatred of the Jews than of the Christians. It is pointed out that the Turks are religiously a tolerant people, and have seldom resorted to persecutions of non-Moslem peoples except when they have aspired to political control or political equality. Mr. Gibbons says that he has known personally most of the Young Turk leaders and that not one of them was a religious fanatic. And speaking of the "Young Turks," it may be observed that Mr. Gibbons gives a very excellent explanation of their failure to regenerate the Turkish state. The chief cause of their failure, aside from their political inexperience, was their belief that they could create a popular consciousness of Ottoman nationality by a process of "Turkicization" of the various races within the Empire.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

Masculine Comedy

THE MAN WHO UNDERSTOOD WOMEN. And Other Stories. By Leonard Merrick. With an introduction by William J. Locke. Limited Edition. New York: E. P. Dutton Company.

AFTER THIRTY. By Julian Street. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

JURGEN: A Comedy of Justice. By James Branch Cabell. New York: Robert M. McBride and Company.

IF masculine and feminine comedy really differ, it may be in their attitudes towards youth. The imaginative woman of middle age, you may say, regrets and worships youth while the imaginative man of middle age regrets and laughs at it, or laughs at himself for regretting it. This is Leonard Merrick's dominating note, though sometimes his laughter is pretty plaintive. He himself has been, or was, for some time a "Conrad in quest of his youth." The theme echoes in several of the tales now collected in the new limited edition, under the title "The Man Who Understood Women." You hear it in the old actor's lament for his lost romance, with its mocking title, "A Very Good Thing For the Girl," in "The Woman Who Wished to Die," with its pair snatching belatedly at the joy of youth; in "The Child in the Garden," with its demure Victorian title and its impish flouting of the virtuous middle age. Queerly enough, in the last story of the lot (chronologically an early story perhaps?) Mr. Merrick lets himself handle precisely the "Conrad" material with something very much like Victorian sentiment. Here we have a gay, dreaming youth bending to the treadmill and becoming a man of acknowledged "success." At the moment when he has won general recognition as a great lawyer and a "dry stick," a relic of his youth turns up to mock him. Long ago in his stage-loving days he has written a farce—accepted by a manager but never produced and almost forgotten. Now it is to be "put on" in the provinces, and the author, under his old pen-name, is invited to rehearsals. The upshot is a rebirth of the "Bob Lawless" whose shoes have been filled by that dry stick, Robert Blackstone, prominent member of the bar; and a "heart interest" which does not (as so often with this writer) crumble to dust in our hands. Of course he does not even here lapse into the grosser errors of the sentimental method. He does not try to make us believe the farce a masterpiece: "No Flies on Flossie" tottered for six nights, died and was buried" sums up that work. Nor does he force Robert Blackstone, K. C., to throw up his job in order to make way for the cheerful "Bob." But his smile, as he tells his story, lacks the bitter (not embittered) quirk which may as much as anything have protected him from the embraces of a huge public.

"After Thirty" is the humorous study of a period which has had relatively small attention from Anglo-American story-tellers. It is neither hay nor grass, youth nor age. The humor and pathos of a later decade have been much played on since the day of that "Princess and the Butterfly," which Bernard Shaw reviewed under the heading "Mr. Pinero on Turning Forty." But the perilous thirties are only now being opened up (with us) as a field for literary comedy. And as a rule it has been the woman of that age who made her appeal to the story-teller. Mr. Street's amiable philanderer, Shelley Wickett, is an amusing and by no means far-fetched type. His amours remain within those bounds of racial continence which seem so quaint or so downright incredible from the European point of view. Shelley is never physically "unfaithful" to his mate; and however he may rove, his heart is true to Poll. As for Poll, or Molly, she understands within reason. Her own eye and ear have ranged, once or twice; and she has learned the secret that "husbands and wives become a little tired, now and then, of always knowing, in advance, exactly what the other is going to do and think and say." Therefore she is patient with the erring one until a certain coarsening of his taste touches her pride too roughly: "A wife has to have something to take pride in," she cries, turning upon the bewildered Shelley. "And if she has to put up with a philandering husband, about all she has left is to take pride in the kind of woman he philanders with." In the end Shelley has to be jolted awake by rude means; but there is a fair outlook for him and his Molly when the curtain falls.

In "Jurgen" Mr. Cabell treats the same theme (among divers themes) in an infinitely larger and more imaginative fashion. His fable of the henpecked pawnbroker who was once poet and lover; who gets back a year of his youth at his old wife's expense, adventures after happiness in wild places, and returns enlightened and content to his shop and scolding mate: there could be no better vehicle for this writer's wit and fancy. He has often done the brilliant and unexpected thing, with an air which one would call indifferent if it did not betray a certain defiance. To a recent volume of essays he appended a series of the most unfavorable reviews of his books that the press could be made to yield. On the other hand, he glosses the present volume with a number of prefixed "quotations" from alleged comments on the Jurgen story. "Too urbane to advocate delusion, too hale for the bitterness of irony, this fable of Jurgen is, as the world, a book wherein each man will find what his nature enables him to see; which gives us back each his own image; and which teaches us each the lesson that each of us desires to learn." Whether the book is really big or merely a colossal "stunt" one cannot be sure; but it is worth the re-reading which will sooner or later answer that question. Here are eloquence and a nimble fancy, a darting eye and a musing brain behind it, playfulness, malice, tenderness—indecency. For it is a book of male humor in the good and less good senses—frank—"Rabelaisian," as we say, ignoring the fact that there is a Rabelais wherever men smoke and dine untrammelled. It frolics in print and somewhat excessively. In his learned "Foreword" Mr. Cabell mocks at the critic who shall play prude with his innocent tale, this "folk-tale of Poictesme," which he now conveys for the tale's sake to English readers: "And this tale of old years is one which, by rare fortune, can be given to English readers almost unabridged, in view of the singular delicacy and pure-mindedness of the Jurgen mythos: in all, not more than a half-dozen deletions have seemed expedient (and have been duly indicated) in order to remove such sparse and unimportant outcroppings of mediaeval frankness as might conceivably offend the squeamish." This is disingenuous to the point of impudence; for even the unsqueamish male draws the line somewhere. Our jester's erotic symbolism is over-insistent, and so mars a fantasy which contains much beauty, in substance as well as in form.

H. W. BOYNTON

Dante

LIFE OF DANTE ALIGHIERI. By Charles Allen Dinsmore. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

FULL as the world is of books on Dante—concerning whose abundance it may be said, as of the multitude of angels, that "determinato numero si cela"—it is still possible for a lucky Dantist to produce a work that shall interest other Dantists. The thing is being done every year. A new nest of facts, a novel but plausible theory, a fresh line of interpretation will command attention from the most jaded of specialists. But to publish something that shall catch the eye of the unattached literary browser and hold him until he really shall have breathed the atmosphere of Dante—that is a performance rare indeed, so difficult are the first steps of introduction between parties that seem at first sight to have nothing in common. Unless all signs fail, however, this baffling social feat has been accomplished by Mr. Dinsmore, whose new book will be, into the bargain, a delight to the tired Dante man. So cunningly does our author stalk his subject, so deftly does he attack it, so unremittingly does he keep up the interest, that one could scarcely conceive a browser walking the earth today "si duro che non fosse punto." Mr. Dinsmore is no novice at the art. Already two works by him have commended him to Dantists, and Dante to the public. His "Teachings of Dante," many years ago, struck at once a sympathetic chord. His "Aids to the Study of Dante" has bountifully lived up to the promise of its title. Now, thrice steeped in the spirit of the master, full of knowledge and enthusiasm, he leads the way sure-footed over the stream and through the seven gates into the Noble Castle.

To begin with, he furnishes a background. In fifty-odd pages he gives us a picture, first of the great 13th century as a whole with its ideals and its politics, then of old Florence, her history, her disposition, her families and feuds. "Divisions and struggles have their compensations. If not too exhausting, they quicken the mental and moral qualities of a people to great activity. They save from self-indulgent sloth, they train the citizens to self-sacrifice, devotion, steadfast loyalty to a common cause. The glory of Florence was synchronous with her militant and fevered life. All her immortal works were done during those periods when the tide of battle flowed frequently through her streets. Her world-famous citizens, from Dante to Savonarola, were born and trained during her periods of storm and stress. When quietness and order settled upon the city after the expulsion of the Medici, then the people had peace, but it was the peace of spiritual and intellectual death." This Part closes with a thoughtful comparison of Babylon and Jerusalem, Rome and Athens, Venice and Florence, in each case a contrast between stability and brilliancy, between solidarity and individualism.

Against this background is projected, during the 160 pages of Part II, the career of the hero, as far as it is known or can be inferred, both his inner and his social life, both his political and his literary activities. Considering how scanty are the data that have come down to us, the fulness of this narrative—a fulness attained without padding or prolixity—bears witness to the author's resourcefulness. All that can be ascertained is so treated as to bring out its complete significance and its effect on the poet's temperament. Insoluble problems, such as that of the personality of Beatrice, are discussed with discretion. Interesting comparisons are made between the slowly developing youthful Dante and other young poets, particularly Milton.

The career of each was divided into three distinct periods of nearly equal length. Each enjoyed a studious and leisurely youth, rich in opportunities for gathering poetic material and for refining his genius, each early won generous fame for lyrics and sonnets of unusual beauty, each at about the same age dedicated himself to a lifelong task by which he hoped to gain terrestrial immortality. . . . Then for each there followed approximately two decades of severest discipline. The contemplative singers, dreaming of immortality, were snatched from their gentle, iridescent worlds of ideals and cast violently upon the rocks of actual evil conditions. Each was made fit to write a world poem by experiencing the world's fiercest passions and its elemental struggles. . . . The nineteen muscularizing years of the English poet were prolonged for the Italian to twenty-three. Thus for two decades at the same period of their lives these two poets held their supreme ambitions in the background while absorbed with concerns of more immediate moment. Each knew instinctively that he could not write an epic until he had lived heroically; that the characters from which issue immortal poems are not fashioned by the splendor of dreams drifting through the mind, but by toil, sorrow, and spiritual victory. . . . In despondency, disillusionment, and faith the one proposed to justify the ways of God to men, the other to reveal to men the true path to God. Milton was engaged for some six years on his "Paradise Lost," beginning in 1658 and finishing in 1665. Dante was absorbed in the "Divina Commedia" for an equal period—from 1314 until his death in 1321.

The third and most important Part treats of Dante's character and genius. Here we learn the true meaning of the "Divine Comedy" to its author and to us, its political and religious message, and we are made to feel its stimulating, uplifting effect on the reader. Here are shown to us the intellectual mysticism, the imagination, the refined sensitiveness, the consistency and reserve, the craving for love and truth and the hatred of evil, the fondness for order and horror of discord, the energy of will, the faith which, in Mr. Dinsmore's phrase, constitute "the Secret of Dante." A highly suggestive, original little chapter sets forth the maturing influence which the conception and the working out of the "Commedia" exercised on Dante's own nature and talent. Seven pages suffice for a survey of his "Defects of Character." A consideration of his artistry in its varied phases leads to a brief "Conclusion."

Mr. Dinsmore's own artistry merits all praise. His choice native vocabulary makes so easily and richly with Dantesque snatches that the novice will find himself happily reading Dante before he knows it. The volume is attractive, too, in outward form. In addition to a map of the 13th century Florence, it contains seven handsome illustrations, among them portraits of Dante, Farinata, Boniface VIII, and Guido Cavalcanti.

C. H. GRANDCENT

The Run of the Shelves

THE making of many books is a custom which our race has derided and deplored. The need of making the books, however, was a check upon their increase. That check is no longer operative. A book like Mr. Don C. Seitz's "Artemus Ward" (Harpers) is a demonstration that in our day books can be written, printed, published, bought, and read without being in any effectual sense made. Mr. Seitz has provided lodging for so many facts. A book more destitute of fashion, of feature, of any of the things expressible by derivatives of the Latin facio, it would be difficult to imagine. It is not a bad book exactly; it lives in a sort of Nietzschean twilight, "Beyond Good and Evil." Its facts will give pleasure to people who like anecdote and laugh easily.

Charles Farrar Browne, who added an "e" to a name whose homeliness had satisfied his parents, and who replaced it by the pseudonym "Artemus Ward" in his commerce with the public, was overtaken by consumption in England in 1867, dying at thirty-three in the ripeness of his talent and the blossom of his fame. He had beyond question that "genius to be loved" which Mrs. Browning, thinking of quite another person, declared should obtain for a man the "justice to be honored in his grave." Mr. Seitz might have honored Charles Farrar Browne better if he had loved him less. He has come upon many new or half-new sayings and writings of the funmaker, and his insertions are comprehensive and indiscriminate. There is a dangerous post-mortem phase in the career of writers when a reputation becomes a preservative of the very things that threaten its own endurance. The following "mournful rejoinder," as Mr. Seitz very fittingly terms it, was made by Artemus to a friend who told him on a certain retributive morning that he didn't look like a humorist: "No. I am a headachist." Bright men do certainly say things of this kind, and the memories of friends are relentless.

Much is made by the critics whom Mr. Seitz quotes (Mr. Seitz himself in the matter of criticism keeps strictly to the side-lines) of the relief which Browne's platform humor derived from the "accidental pathos," the "hesitating, perplexed candor," of his delivery. It was that "lively work upon a sad and solemn ground" which Bacon found so agreeable in his essay on "Adversity." Now, in Browne this contrast was temperamental, and writing was his specialty; it is accordingly very surprising to find that a leading trait and the prime defect of his written humor is the entire absence of this species of relief. Everything is not only funny but facetious, not only humorous but jocose. Far more diverting than nine-tenths of the pleasantries ascribed to Browne himself is John Bright's naive criticism of the celebrated Mormon lecture: "Its information was meager, and presented in a desultory, disconnected manner."

In 1917, under the somewhat pompous title of "Aristodemocracy," Sir Charles Waldstein, now Anglicized into Sir Charles Walston, published a voluminous treatise on ethics, in which he sought to bring the world "from the Great War back to Moses, Christ, and Plato." His aim was to re-state the old moral truths of human experience in terms suitable to modern civilization. Now, as a supplement to that work, he adds a smaller volume, which he calls "Truth: An Essay in Moral Reconstruction" (Putnam). In a series of brief chapters he unfolds the functions and need of truthfulness in various departments of private and public life. What he has to say in regard to the essential place of this much neglected virtue in international diplomacy, in the conduct of certain officials, such as tax collectors, in the management of newspapers, and the like, is sound and timely. No doubt his conclusions are for the most part familiar enough; but occasionally, as in his analysis of the relation of truth to efficiency, he presents certain facts of human nature in rather a new light and in a manner likely to arrest attention. No one can get harm from reading the book, and some may derive benefit; but it is a pity that the moralist manifests so deep a relish of his own wisdom, and quotes from his own earlier publications so complacently. Truth cries for a more disinterested lover. We might recommend the reader of the present work to peruse, or re-peruse, "The Religion of Nature"—"that fine soliloquy of Wollaston's," as Gray called it—which made something of a sensation in the early years of the eighteenth century. It is in fact a masterly disquisition on truth as the essential prerequisite of all virtue. Benjamin Franklin was employed upon this work as a compositor in Palmer's printing office, and was probably a good deal influenced by it in forming his own religious opinions.

The Larger Education

IN 1862, after years of warfare, without and within Italy, Carlo Cattaneo declared: "In to-day's struggle, schools are of more value than armies. For the latter conquer, but schools convince, and thus triumph permanently."

The argument has been raised that militarism and education are not inconsistent. Philosophically, we must be prepared with an answer to the question whether education is to be subsumed under militarism, or whether warfare itself (when it breaks out) is a part of the great human educational process. Educationists maintain that priority of education over militarism is proved for every practical purpose by the consideration that education is universally essential in the development of the child into the man; at most, warfare is only an occasional necessity. Hobbes insisted irresistibly—and the ordinary man hardly needs persuasion—that a perpetual state of universal warfare would be intolerable. A perpetual state of universal opportunity for education is, on the other hand, becoming the only thinkable condition of future human progress.

Nor do we accept as successful the attempt which is made, consciously and unconsciously, to unite the two forces of militarism and education, bridging over their contradictions in aims by the intense inculcation of "patriotism" in the school. The idea of a narrow "nationalism" has been read into education by politicians without due regard to possible consequences. The glorification of military deeds of the past, concentration on national military successes, and on forceful men as national heroes have invested the "patriotic" with a glamour which renders it difficult of analysis from a distinctively educational point of view. The excellent educational (as well as political) side of the insistence on patriotism is so attractive that it is forgotten that it is all the more likely to suffer from the excess of its own good qualities. Self-centredness in the individual human being is readily recognized by impartial spectators as unpleasing, and as a hindrance to his highest development. But in a group or a nation, even in a small one, and, a fortiori, in a large one, it is often curiously regarded as a positive virtue. We have witnessed the effect of patriotic obsession in the case of a Treitschke, a Delbrück, and others. How striking is the warning of Mommsen: "Have a care, gentlemen, lest in this state, which has been at once a power in arms and a power in intelligence, the intelligence should vanish, and nothing but the pure military state should remain!" Patriotism, then, in the sound state, has its necessary educational limitations. The overwhelming answer to undiluted patriotism is that self-centredness in the nation is as detrimental to the highest educational progress as is self-centredness in the individual. On the other hand, it is the sine qua non of pure militarism.

The "new" educationists, having thrown over the ballast of Greek and Latin, and having espoused subjects relatively easy to explain to the ordinary man, feel secure in the plea of modernity. Mathematics, the natural sciences, the vernacular language, literature, and history, a little music, a little manual work, a little civics, and perhaps occasional patriotic lessons; surely such a curriculum, founded on modernity, saves the school from militarism and from all forms of obscurantism. Yet, in avoiding the dogs and wolves of Scylla, the "new" school runs grave risk of falling into the whirlpool of Charybdis. In Great Britain there has never been any fear of education falling a prey to military exploitation, but schools have come within the reach of another grip—that of industry and commerce. Parents are only too eager to encourage the turning of modern studies into some practical, "useful" direction; more definitely, into vocational education. It is urged that the vocational training solves not only the parents' problem, but also the educational demand of the nation.

Yet, judged by the standard of self-centredness, vocational education occupies merely an intermediate position between individual and national self-centredness. From the social and human standpoint, it combines, or may combine, the disadvantages as well as the advantages of both. It shares the dangers of the local and the national forms of self-centredness in so far as it is sectional rather than human. It tends to narrowness, to limitation. Yet the highest aim of education is to help the mind to direct itself at will away from its immediate environment of locality and occupation, or, as it has been said, to "estrangle itself from itself," so that it may enter by sympathetic imagination into the "best" of what has been thought and done in the past, or of what in the present is being done at a distance. The "new" or "modern" education in as far as it is confined to the "practical," the "useful," the "local," the "national," in short, the present and near at hand, suffers from the defect pointed out by Shakespeare:

Home-keeping youth have ever homely wits.

We must never forget that education is a form of mental travel. Its aim might be described as that of sending the youth en voyage, intelligently. Hence the inadequacy of regarding the local as the staying-place, rather than the starting-point of education. We know the breadth of view ordinarily characteristic of the "traveled" man. We should seek in our schools and colleges to afford the educands (who are as yet, and possibly likely long to remain, untraveled) opportunities of trained soundness of judgment and width of perspective, in its measure of possibilities, like the traveler's. The fewer the opportunities of the pupils for personal physical observations of things at a distance (whether in time or space) the more earnestly should the school endeavor, by sound methods, to fill up gaps of knowledge, and to round out the limited scope of the pupils' knowledge.

Moreover, with the World War there has come to us all a great encircling, cosmopolitan environment, involving enormous scales and standards, historically, geographically, and morally, for which the merely local and occupational are absurdly inadequate measurements. Not since the time of the sixteenth century Renaissance, or even the more distant Crusades, has there been such a unity of aim amongst the best spirits the world over. It is this new post-war humanism which seeks to be brought into relation to education. The "new" education, to-day, should be something newer (and paradoxical as it may seem, at the same time older) than the "new" education of the pre-war decade. The Allies, at any rate, have borne testimony to the need of enthusiasm for a common humanism, instead of a lonely absorption in their own individual national concerns. And so, the new educational outlook must reflect the new human aspirations towards common ideals. The nation which will save its educational soul must lose it in something larger than any solely environmental interests. Education for locality and for vocation only justifies itself in so far as it points pupils towards the higher intellectual, moral, human interests, which transcend, in their educational implications, the personal, the local, the vocational, and even the national aspects. The latter type of knowledge—the earliest and the nearest to the child—supplies the earliest concrete subject-matter of instruction. But the human implications must shine through the whole of the fields of instruction, whatever the starting-point, whether subjects be called "new," or whether they be "old;" be they local, or be they national.

Whether the humanism necessary as a readjustment to new world-wide ideals implies a change in the school and academic curriculum is another question. To some extent, the subjects, and certainly their method of treatment, I think, should be reconsidered. But humanism itself is not so much a problem of the subjects taught as of the quality of the spirit brought into the teaching. The spiritual rapprochement of all the Allied nations has come with a swiftness unparalleled in the history of the world. It is unique in that it has permeated at the same time both the teacher and the pupils of the present generation. The marvelous resources for almost immediate information—the wireless, the telephone, the telegraph, the newspaper, the letter-post—make distant environments almost as impressive to our mental vision as our local surroundings. Multitudes of boys and girls, as well as adults, visualize scenes abroad in the mind's eye more vividly than the school-ground itself. This is the opportunity for education to unite the local and the ultra-local into a sense of the human. Whilst the flood of information has thus so indescribably both quickened and widened "wits" at the same time, the restraint of knowledge has disciplined the will. Multitudes of our people, teachers and taught, have readily acquiesced in censorship on knowledge, and waited patiently for news on which hung their deepest happiness, at the moment, and for the whole of their future. Both in receptivity of knowledge, and in the harder task of self-control and foregoing of information, for the good of a cause common to many countries—a new educational spirit of humanism is now in existence. Self-centredness has been suspended. The entente cordiale is not simply an Anglo-French understanding; it has become a human sentiment. The problem is to include this as the spirit of educational endeavor, and to secure the continuity of the humanist spirit for the future as well as for the present generation. In Great Britain there are great educational possibilities. Already, that country is committed to the project of compulsory education up to 18 years of age, and if the new Continuation Schools can rise to their high opportunity the cause of humanist education has a great future before it.

In England we can look back to a striking example of the effect of war on educational thought, none the less significant because so well known. In the great struggle against the spirit of despotism by which the country was threatened from within in the Great Civil War of 1642-49, in the very midst of that war, John Milton issued his tractate "Of Education," June 5, 1644. Amid the grim expenditure of blood which threatened the extinction of the best of his fellow-countrymen, Cavalier and Puritan, Milton was brimful with the eagerness of his high spirit, and yet saw no solace except in the thought of the future influence of culture and education. He longed for youth to become "renowned and matchless men."

This confident Miltonic spirit in education is wanted more than ever to-day throughout the nations, in primary, secondary, and university grades. It will not be produced, of course, by grandiose curricula, though Milton gave curricula the benefit of the doubt by suggesting his truly Titanic programme. Milton wished to give the best to the select spirits of his time; we, for the future, may contemplate it as the heritage open to all. For we have learned that the masses of the people also are entitled to their share in the "best." The quickened stimulus which England has received towards the great world outside, once realized, can not be allowed to dwindle, without losing a noble educational opportunity. Educationally this wider outlook provides the remedy against self-centredness of groups and sections, as it does against militarism. "Armies conquer; schools convince"—and convince permanently. We shall not seek to follow Milton's curricula, but we shall inevitably lose educationally if we do not seek to imbibe his spirit. "To govern well is to train up a nation in true wisdom and virtue, and that which springs from it, magnanimity. Take heed of that."

FOSTER WATSON

Orpington, Kent.

Drama

"Hedda Gabler" at The Neighborhood Playhouse

I BEGIN by the proffer of praise and homage to the Neighborhood Playhouse for its courage and bounty in bringing the English players to act "Hedda Gabler" in New York. Ibsen after Broadway is as great a relief as Hedda after Tesman. I shall leave Broadway to extract what solace it can from the reflection that Tesman, conversely, might be a relief after Hedda.

I followed Miss Octavia Kenmore's Hedda with interest, if also with tranquillity. Miss Kenmore is a woman whom the eye willingly follows, and even where her acting was bloodless I did not find it insipid. At times, especially in the first act, she evaded the ear and the mind, she was gliding and fugitive, she drooped and swayed, her speech became a succession of asides. Hedda is frivolous without being fragile; the originality of her, the terror, lies largely in the opposition between the massiveness of her temperament and the flimsiness of her character. Regina in "Ghosts" is appalling in the same way. There is iron in Hedda; there is no iron in Miss Kenmore. Hedda is truculent and insolent, where Miss Kenmore is, or comes close to being, pouting and saucy. The actress parted from Hedda again and again; I think she was glad to part from Hedda. In her relation to the stronger woman she was almost like Mrs. Elvsted—at once clinging to Hedda as a resource and shrinking from her as a menace.

I did not feel that Miss Kenmore always forsook nature in forsaking Hedda. She became natural in another fashion. The last act was well done in a way, though not in Ibsen's or in Hedda's way. The attitude in death was original and superb, but within half a minute of the shot, the audience was laughing at a mannerism of Tesman's, and Miss Kenmore cheerfully acquiesced in the theory that it was all a joke by the promptness of her smiling resurrection. Mr. Charles Henry Meltzer, writing to Miss Kenmore, is quoted thus: "By sheer intelligence and art you almost bridged over the abyss between the two women whom the author has named Hedda." Mr. Meltzer is, of course, quite right about the author's two Heddas, but he seems to think that almost bridging a chasm is almost as good as quite bridging it—a notion which, in the Alps or Andes, he might be tempted to reconsider. To my mind Miss Kenmore finds one Hedda and fumbles for the other.

Mr. Leigh Lovel's Judge Brack is primarily a lawyer, a Dickens lawyer, of the sapless Tulkingshorn or phlegmatic Grewgious type, who draws the net around Hedda with the effect of foreclosing a mortgage, and utters the convulsive final words: "People don't do such things" with the air of announcing: "The court is adjourned." He has address of a kind, but no pungency. His Judge Brack is resignedly elderly, while Ibsen's is combatively young. An amour in middle age, like a picnic in October, is conceivable, but one fails to imagine a picnic in November or an amour in Mr. Lovel's Judge Brack.

Mr. Albert Bruning's Tesman is a success; it is even more remarkable than successful. The play is crowded with Tesman; Tesman dominates and overrides the play, the little Tesman, who in Ibsen's version was the fly upon the pane, buzzing indeed, but petty in its obtrusiveness. Mr. Bruning's Tesman is large-limbed (Ibsen's seems almost frisking), with movements ponderous even in flexibility, and every detail in the acting is capitalized. Much of this, though confounding, is really good, and the part would have been memorable if Mr. Bruning had been able to inform and enrich its entire substance with the shadings and undertones of its supernal moments. No fool is pure fool; Tesman is a not unlikable, perhaps a not unlovable, fellow. The blending of the farcical and the human in certain parts of Mr. Bruning's work was admirable; latterly the farce gained upon the human nature.

Nothing else calls for particular mention except the unfinished yet appealingly human portrayals of Miss Tesman by Miss Augusta Haviland and of Berta by Miss Ruby Hallier.

I thought the severe but tasteful auditorium congruous with Ibsen, but the meagre stage seemed encumbered by its own properties, and the action was left to pick its way through the lanes in the furniture. The performance was at times too rapid for the full grasp of the more delicate particulars. Ibsen can be properly acted only by those who share both the fineness of his insight and the courage of his leisure. For actor and auditor alike Ibsen is a man whose "nectar crowns the lips of patience"; even spectatorship should be perusal in a sense, though of course it should be far more than perusal. For the chisel of Ibsen, which works slowly, because it works firmly, I felt that the actors now and then substituted the hastiness and smudginess of the brush. I wanted to cry: "Give me time"; and I felt that Ibsen, if present, might have joined in the cry.

O. W. FIRKINS

Books and the News Prohibition

THE frequent rumors that war-time prohibition is about to end, that it is not to end, that it is really going to be enforced, that restaurants will continue to sell light wines, that this is not violation of the law, that it certainly is violation, that whiskey called sherry and sherry called ginger ale may still be obtained,—all these items in the news show that the enactment of the prohibitory amendment did not lay the subject forever on the shelf. Even in the face of the amendment, a reader may care to study the subject.

He is offered a choice of books which may cause him to smile. "A Text Book of True Temperance," by M. Monahan, sounds as fair, upon the face of it, as "The Cyclopedia of Temperance," edited by Deets Pickett. And so, perhaps, it is. But as Mr. Monahan's book was published by the United States Brewers' Association, and Mr. Pickett's by the Methodist Book Concern, readers will naturally expect to hear the Text-Book appeal to St. Paul in behalf of wine, and the Cyclopedia call upon the Proverbs to show that wine is a mocker. Those who have time to spend upon this kind of controversial book may enjoy L. A. Banks' "Ammunition for the Final Drive on Booze" (Funk, 1917) with its selections in prose and rhyme on the order of the sentimental ballad, "The Bar-Keeper's Wife"; Wilbur F. Craft's "Why Dry?" (International Reform Bur. 1918); Charles Stelzle's "Why Prohibition?" (Doran, 1918), a book of smashing argument, rather than sentimental appeal; and Richmond P. Hobson's "Alcohol and the Human Race" (Revell, 1919), which even an unsympathetic critic admits is calm and unimpassioned, though its arguments are time-worn and likely to appeal only to those already convinced.

Two books for reference, from their nature necessarily more impartial, are Wayne B. Wheeler's "Federal and State Laws Relating to Intoxicating Liquor" (American Issue Pub. Co., 1918) and Lamar T. Beman's compilation, "Selected Articles on Prohibition . . ." (Wilson, 1917). The latter, a "Debater's Handbook," consists of excerpts from articles on both sides.

Alcoholism is studied in George B. Cutten's "The Psychology of Alcoholism" (Scribner, 1907), T. N. Kelynack's "The Drink Problem of To-day" (Methuen, 1916), by various British medical men, and J. Starke's "Alcohol, the Sanction for its Use" (Putnam, 1910). The recent work by George Elliot Flint, "The Whole Truth about Alcohol" (Macmillan, 1919), is a readable and vigorous onslaught against the prohibitionists, upon the text "alcohol is an evil, but . . . not all evil." Dr. Abraham Jacobi, who introduced the book, called it a "protest against the outrages of pessimistic prohibitionists," and the New York Times characterizes it as "a fair statement." A prohibitionist would undoubtedly condemn it as unfair and untrue.

On the prohibitionist side one looks in vain for any such effort for truth as in the books issued by the Committee of Fifty. These volumes, their authors and promoters, have been attacked, sometimes violently, by prohibitionists. But probably in preference to any other books named in this article, an honest investigator should read: F. H. Wines' and John Koren's "The Liquor Problem in its Legislative Aspects" (Houghton, 1897), "The Liquor Problem; a Summary of Investigation Conducted by the Committee of Fifty" (Houghton, 1905), John Koren's "Economic Aspects of the Liquor Problem" (Houghton, 1899), and Raymond Calkins' "Substitutes for the Saloon" (Houghton, 1901). Another book, not issued by the Committee, but written by one of its investigators, is John Koren's "Alcohol and Society" (Holt, 1916). It is praised by non-partisans, but is repugnant to the temperance societies.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 25

New York, Saturday, November 1, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	527
Editorial Articles:
Now for a Genuine Conference on Labor	530
When the Public Strikes	531
The Treaty Bill in Danger	531
When the Dew Is on the Corn	532
An Artists' Haven	533
The Threatened Coal Strike. By Edward W. Parker	534
The Hungarian Tangle. By Examiner	535
Correspondence	537
Book Reviews:
American Syndicalism	538
Dreams From France	540
An Impartial View of the Irish Difficulty	541
A Poet's Life of Corneille	542
The Run of the Shelves	542
Consider Ludendorff and Me. By Subaltern	544
Drama:
John Masefield at the Garrick Theatre. By O. W. Firkins	545
Music at the Metropolitan. By Charles Henry Meltzer	545
Books and the News: Armenia. By Edmund Lester Pearson	546

THE President's condemnation of the coal strike, and his appeal to the strike leaders that they assent to his plan of settlement of the dispute by investigation and arbitration, has the unquestioned support of public opinion. In Congress there appears to be a remarkable approach to unanimity on the subject, in spite of the almost uniform disposition of that body to cater to the "labor vote." It is fair to assume that this tone of feeling in the present instance is due both to the conviction of the members that the strike is, as the President declares it to be, a terrible blow aimed at the national welfare in a time of extraordinary trial, and to realization of the fact that, however formidable the labor element may be, a defiant offence against the public good in such an exigency as the present will arouse resentment infinitely more formidable.

The President is ready "to appoint at once a tribunal to investigate all the facts with a view to aiding in the earliest possible orderly settlement of the questions at issue between the coal operators and the coal miners, to the end that the just rights, not only of those interests but also of the general public, may be fully protected." Rejection of this proposal—insistence, in the face of it, upon a strike which means, if it is to succeed, "the shutting down of countless industries and the throwing out of employment of a large part of the workers of the country"—could be justified, if justified at all, only by desperate conditions among the workers. Such conditions cannot be alleged. Conflicting statements are made about the facts in regard to wages; but from the statement of Acting President Lewis, of the United Mine Workers, it may be inferred that the average earnings of the miners are not much less than $1,200 a year, although the mines are operated, on an average, only three or four days in the week. They may be justified in demanding better arrangements and better pay; but there is nothing in the situation to warrant refusal to await the result of an orderly investigation. If they persist in their defiance of the rights of the public, they will find the nation overwhelmingly arrayed against them. And the President has made it plain that the full strength of the Government will be put forward to protect the public interests.

WE should be glad to be able to speak as whole-heartedly on the issue of violation of contract by the miners as on their violation of general principles of right conduct, and their offence against the public welfare. It may be that, as a matter of law, their agreement as to wages, which was to run, as the President says, "during the continuance of the war, but not beyond April 1, 1920," binds them to its observance until the Treaty of Peace is ratified by the Senate and the end of the war is formally proclaimed by the President. But it can hardly be expected that the miners themselves should regard this interpretation of the intent of the agreement as more than a legal technicality. If the limit of April 1, 1920, had not been set—if the agreement had set no other limit than that of "the continuance of the war"—would any reasonable person insist that the contract must continue in full force indefinitely, for years perhaps after the troops were disbanded, simply because the Senate and the President were unable to get together on the terms of a formal treaty? The President himself, in his veto message on the Prohibition bill, has furnished the miners with an argument which, to their minds, must seem unanswerable. He asks Congress to repeal war-time prohibition on the ground that it was "an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied by the demobilization of the army"—in other words, the act was a war act, and the war is practically, though not technically, over. Does not the same consideration apply to the miners' agreement? A contract is a contract, to be sure, and cannot be repealed by act of Congress. The miners may, therefore, have no case at law; but it looks as though, so far as this point is concerned, they had a pretty good case in equity.

AGITATORS who imagine that a "one big union" of all who work with their hands could be used as a unit to terrify the country into the concession, of revolutionary demands should learn a lesson from recent history. People high in authority in Germany had persuaded themselves that in case of war with the United States, they would have the immediate and decisive aid of "one big union" of German-American citizens. But their first tangible evidence of this union of their imagination was when they met a large share of its possible membership in American uniforms on the western battle front. And most of the remainder were at work in making or transporting munitions, while the actively pro-German part, numerically insignificant, were taking a rest within stockades, under cover of American rifles. The "one big union" field here is already pre-empted by the union generally known as the United States of America. It comprises in its membership the vast majority of the workers of whom Bolshevistic agitators dream as the supporters of the "one big union" which is to revolutionize this country. Let them once succeed in bringing the matter squarely to the test, and they will find that most American workingmen themselves will carry guns, if necessary, in order to vindicate the right of this greater union to live, and to enforce its authority over any and all opposition.

American manhood will fight Bolshevik dissolution as readily as it fought Prussian militarism.

CONSIDERABLE mystery surrounds the release from custody of Robert Minor, the American Bolshevik who was arrested and held by the American military authorities at Coblenz, charged with circulating seditious literature among the American soldiers, in the interest of the Russian Bolsheviks and the German Spartacists. This release was made the subject of inquiry in the Senate, and on October 23 Secretary Baker made a statement in regard to it which does not entirely clear up the matter. It would appear that the evidence upon which the case against Minor rested was the testimony of an agent of the Military Intelligence, who had ingratiated himself with Minor and the Spartacist conspirators, and this evidence alone, without corroboration by other witnesses, was regarded by the Judge Advocate-General as insufficient to convict Minor of the serious charge, although he was personally convinced of Minor's guilt.

Secretary Baker's explanation gives rise to several conjectures. It now appears that immediately following the release of Minor additional important evidence became available. Nevertheless, Minor was allowed to depart, and making his way to America, to take up again his work of Bolshevik agitation with brazen effrontery. The question insistently presents itself as to why, in view of the known facts, he was not detained pending further investigation, and what was the source and inspiration of the telegram sent from Paris to suspend action against Minor. Furthermore, it seems strange indeed, in view of Secretary Baker's statement that on the day after Minor's release the War Department obtained corroboration of the charges against him, that no action has been taken to place him again under arrest and bring him to trial.

THE surprise defeat of the British Cabinet is a symptom of the general revulsion, noticeable all over Europe, from that unquestioning submission to Ministerial dictatorship which the necessity of war had forced on the people's representatives. From a controlling body, jealous of its sovereign rights, Parliament had been degraded to an obedient flock of followers, and the War Cabinet, Lloyd George's Government within the Government, ruled supreme. The coupon election was an attempt to create a permanency out of war's makeshift, and the people, still under the spell of the glorious victory, were fooled into renewing the payment of those sovereign rights with which that glory had been bought. Several bye-elections which went against the Government were the first indications of the people returning to a normal state of mind. The adverse vote over a clause in the Alien bill is even more significant, coming as it does so soon after Lloyd George's success in settling the railway strike, which gave fresh vigor to his popularity. The breach struck in the Cabinet's position has, indeed, been patched up, but the weak spot will be exposed to fresh attacks. The old struggle of parliaments against autocracy has to be fought anew in another form in this democratic age.

THE part played by the labor members in this passage at arms between the Cabinet and Parliament deserves to be put on record. The question at issue was an amendment, proposed by the Government, and intended to alter the drastic clause withholding pilotage certificates from all aliens in favor of a number of French pilots for whom special provision had been made in the existing Pilotage act. The opposition against it was led by the Unionist wing of the Coalition party, and when the Labor members became aware of the advantage they could score by supporting that revolt within the Coalition, they voted with the anti-aliens against the amendment, thus sacrificing to an immediate party gain the principle of international brotherhood. We wonder what impression this will make on the comrades across the Channel who pilot the ship of Labor through the cross-currents of French politics. The French pilots have, indeed, got their privilege granted, after all. But they do not owe this satisfaction to the support of British Labor but to a compromise between the Cabinet and Parliament, the latter having consented to reconsider the decision in exchange for a return to Cabinet responsibility and a promise of more regular attendance of the Prime Minister in the House of Commons.

ICH bin ein Pilger, der sein Ziel nicht kennt,
Der Feuer sieht und weiss nicht wo es brennt,
Ich bin ein Träumer, den ein Lichtschein narret,
Der in dem Sonnenstrahl nach Golde scharret.
These lines are from a poem by Erich Mühsam, one of the Spartacist leaders, who is atoning with long years of incarceration for his share in the mad communistic experiment at Munich. Mühsam has fallen a martyr to his strained idealism. The tragedy of his fatal self-deception is strikingly expressed in these verses. They are significant not only of the poet's errantry, but of the aimless wandering of all his fellow-believers in latter-day communism. Pilgrims to a shrine they do not know, led astray by the glowworms of Utopia into the bog of national self-destruction, they are blind leaders of the blind, pitiable for their deficiency, but criminal for presuming in their blindness to guide their fellow-sufferers.

THE German ex-Crown Prince has expressed a desire to bring back the old simplicity of court life, says the Times correspondent in Holland. The wish is father to the thought in foolish people. In the wise it is a child of necessity. Caricaturists have discovered in Willy of Wieringen's features a likeness to wily Reynard the Fox. It now appears to be more than a superficial resemblance. There is vulpine wisdom in the pretense that grapes, which do not grow in the inclement air of Wieringen, are a sour and offensive kind of fruit.

"BELLA gerant alii, tu felix Austria nube." Let others make war—thou, happy Austria, make marriages. By marriage, not by conquest, so ran the boast of the Hapsburgs, had the Austrian dynasty extended the realm. Henceforth this imperialistic abuse of one of the sacraments will be impossible. By passing an act abolishing the name of "German Austria" and substituting the title "Republic of Austria," the National Assembly has precluded all possibility of expansion by matrimonial connections. The vow before the altar of two crowned individuals has ceased to have a binding force for the union of nations. By their free will only can that union be consummated. But the freedom to unite is not granted to peoples unconditionally. It is limited by being made subject to the consent of the comity of nations. This right of control was, although under protest, recognized by Germany when she cancelled the clause in the new Constitution providing for the incorporation of Austria with the Empire. And the National Assembly at Vienna, in its turn, has, under compulsion of the Supreme Council, eliminated from the recently adopted Constitution the provision declaring Austria to be a composite part of Germany. Bella gerant alii, tu felix Austria nube. Austria has, none the less, waged her war, and bitterly atones for it by this compulsory vow of celibacy.

WHAT one would like to do to a man who was actively disloyal to his country in time of war, and what one can do in all fairness and with due regard to processes of law, are two quite distinct things. But it is reassuring to observe that there is at least one place where such a man is not made welcome—the Congress of the United States. Of course, those whose disloyalty merely suffered an eclipse, went as it were into dignified retirement for the duration of the war, are under no particular disability. In fact, the forces of law and order were recently put at the disposal of those who wished to indulge a long-suppressed taste for German opera.

WHAT constitutes demobilization? This is a question on which the Administration should throw some light at once. If war-time prohibition should be further continued on the ground that the conditions of the bill which made it operative on July 1 still exist, an authoritative statement to that effect would be welcome at this time. Some days ago Representative Rainey said that the War Department regarded demobilization as completed. If this is true, or even if the public thinks that it is true, and if the Administration is lending itself to the expediency of keeping the country dry until Constitutional prohibition shall take effect, it is helping to promote a spirit of lawlessness at a time when that spirit is causing much concern in various spheres of activity.—The Review, Oct. 18.

If the War Department now considers demobilization complete, why, asks the droughty Review, should not the ban on liquor be lifted at once? It expresses the fear that the Administration may be "lending itself to the expediency of keeping the country dry until Constitutional prohibition shall take effect." This the Review condemns as "helping to promote a spirit of lawlessness." But it is not lawless to take the trouble to read the law, as the Review appears not to have done. War-time prohibition is to end, not merely with the completion of demobilization, but with the proclamation of peace by the President; and the Attorney-General has held that this can not be until after the Treaty is ratified. We supposed that everybody knew this. Certainly, the liquor-sellers know it.—The New York Evening Post, Oct. 22.

The law—which was quoted verbatim in an earlier number of the Review—says nothing about "the proclamation of peace by the President." The President's view of it was stated as follows in a cable message to Secretary Tumulty printed in the newspapers of June 29:

I am convinced that the Attorney-General is right in advising me that I have no legal power at this time in the matter of the ban on liquor.

The act provides that after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President, it shall be unlawful, etc.

This law does not specify that the ban shall be lifted with the signing of peace, but with the termination of the demobilization of the troops, and I cannot say that that has been accomplished.

When demobilization is terminated, my power to act without Congressional action will be exercised.

It will be noticed that the President's refusal was expressly based on the fact that he could not say that demobilization had been accomplished. The reader will observe, too, that the Review was making no demand that "the ban on liquor be lifted at once," but only that the Government make its position clear to the public.

THE crime, however, of being "droughty" is one which—to use the language of a famous speech once familiar to every schoolboy—we shall neither attempt to palliate nor deny. We have repeatedly declared our conviction that Constitutional prohibition is a monstrosity. War-time prohibition is a matter of merely passing interest, but Constitutional prohibition is of abiding importance as related to the principles of government in general, to the spirit of our own historic union of self-governing States, to the ideals of individual liberty, and to the character of personal and social life. In every one of these respects except the last, we look upon Constitutional prohibition as a great and unalloyed evil. As regards the last, every man of sense must admit that rigidly enforced prohibition will do a great deal of good; but that the good will be purchased at a tremendously great sacrifice, personal and social, is our profound conviction. To think of drinking as merely the satisfaction of a morbid or half-morbid physical craving is to ignore what it has done to cheer and solace and refresh millions in all ages, to make a genial social atmosphere such as nothing else has been able to produce, to furnish that occasional escape from strain and dullness which so many of the finest spirits that the world has ever known have found of inestimable help and value to them. We do not believe that the sacrifice ought to be made, and we are in some measure doubtful whether even the gain which we admit it will effect, and which we admit is very great, will prove in the long run to be a real one.

In any case, the settling of this question in such a way as to place it permanently beyond the control of the people by any process of statutory legislation is both juristically and practically a monstrosity. The Review would have been glad to have the opportunity of doing what little it could to oppose its consummation, had the Review been in existence before the thing was done. As for the Evening Post, so far as we can remember, it confined its expression of judgment to solemnly informing its readers, from time to time, that if the moral sense of the people demanded the amendment the amendment would be passed. The conclusion to which the Evening Post was itself impelled, either by its moral or its intellectual sense, was a secret which it kept carefully locked in its bosom.

THE hearty approval of good citizens goes out to Governor Smith in the vigorous rejoinder he has made to the abuse long heaped upon him by Hearst's newspapers. One reason why New York has suffered so often from unfit officials has been the supposed necessity of nominating candidates able and willing to keep the peace with Hearst. His support during a campaign need not necessarily condemn a candidate, as it may be merely a baited hook for the future, not compensation in advance for compliance already guaranteed. But the well-known record of years past makes his continued support, after election, a warrantable ground for suspicion. The spectacle of a public official under the domination of such an influence is abhorrent. When the Governor asserts that he could have had Hearst's support by paying the price, the statement may be accepted at once as entirely consistent with all that is known of Hearst methods. Unfortunately, the necessity of defeating Tammany makes it difficult for voters to express at the polls their approval of the Governor as against Hearst.

IT should interest any son of Harvard, during the present movement for increase of endowment, to read over the address of James Russell Lowell delivered thirty-three years ago, during the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary. Admitting that Harvard teachers had not won much distinction by pushing forward the boundaries of knowledge, he laid the blame largely to the fact that the energy which might have been ample for this higher service had been consumed on labor which should not have been exacted from them. "They have been underpaid, and the balance made good to them by being overworked." But the one thing from Lowell's address of thirty-three years ago which the Harvard of to-day can best adopt and endeavor to realize is its clean-cut and lofty definition of what he held up as the appropriate Harvard ideal. "Let it be our hope to make a gentleman of every youth who is put under our charge; not a conventional gentleman, but a man of culture, a man of intellectual resource, a man of public spirit, a man of refinement, with that good taste which is the conscience of the mind, and that conscience which is the good taste of the soul." As the finished product to be desired, without raising questions of content of curriculum or method of instruction, at what point would even the most modern educational theorist be willing to attack this definition?

Now for a Genuine Conference on Labor

SECRETARY LANE has a happy faculty of hitting the nail on the head. He has never been more successful in doing so than in his simple statement of the cause of the breakdown of the Conference at Washington. "The Industrial Conference," he says, "never really got started. It died at its birth, because questions arose which it was not prepared to meet then." That is the truth, and, so far as the mere fact of failure is concerned, it comes very near to being the whole truth. It is easy enough to contend that if the employers' group had been more conciliatory, some form of resolution about collective bargaining might have been adopted. It is easy enough to contend that if the labor group had remained in the Conference, instead of incontinently bolting when it failed to have its way, all the groups might eventually have been brought into some kind of agreement. But the difficulty lay, at bottom, neither in the votes, nor the speeches, nor the personal bearing, of the delegates; it lay in the fact that there is really a big issue which has neither been fought out nor thought out, and which it was chimerical for a hastily gathered assembly of miscellaneous persons to expect to settle by the adoption of a mere form of words, however cleverly put together.

The resolution upon which the Conference suffered shipwreck may or may not have meant what the employers' group—i. e., a majority of that group—regarded it as meaning. But here is the dilemma: it either did mean to make a vital change in the relations at present existing between the labor unions on the one hand and employers and non-union workmen on the other, or it did not. If it did, the employers' group were not prepared to yield to the demand; if it did not, there is no reason why the labor group should have made its acceptance the indispensable condition of their willingness to do anything whatever to improve existing conditions. The fact that the labor group broke up the Conference when they failed to get the resolution adopted—though they displayed a readiness to accept what on the surface looked like important qualifications to the resolution—seems to show that they looked upon it as meaning a fundamental gain in their campaign for universal unionization. This does not prove that it was wrong; it does prove that the matter was not one to be disposed of without infinitely more careful consideration of its real purport, and its probable practical effect, than the Conference gave to it.

The President's Cabinet has done wisely not to accept this failure as final. Its present plan, of calling together a new Conference, "representing the body of the public and not divided into groups," and consisting of "approximately fifteen of the most prominent Americans," opens up the possibility of accomplishing results which the recent Conference, even if it had held together, was hardly fitted to achieve. Everything will depend, to be sure, first upon the choice of the men, and secondly upon the method they will adopt. Assuming that the membership is of the right calibre, the Conference, if it is to attain any valuable result, will have to realize that this can be got only at the cost of a lot of hard thinking about both the facts and the opinions which underlie the whole situation. And it will have to be willing to lay down the outcome of that thinking in such a form that the actual practical effect of the recommendations will be patent to all men.

In regard to a great many questions—questions with which the recent Conference, too, might have dealt helpfully, had it not been run on the rocks—this last requirement will present no special difficulty. On such subjects as working conditions, profit-sharing, regular contact and understanding between workers and management in a given establishment, automatic adjustment of wages by reference to an index-number of prices—on these and many other things, whatever conclusions the Conference may arrive at, there will be no special difficulty in making them plain. These are not the subject of bitter controversy, and they involve no principle vitally affecting the structure of industrial and general life. It is the questions of the rights and powers of organized labor that will put both the wisdom and the courage of the Conference to the test.

The new Conference may arrive at no definitive result on these questions, and yet be far from having been a failure. For it may, without solving the problems, throw such light on them as will enormously help the public to take a just view of specific controversies when they arise. The indispensable condition of such helpfulness is that what is said shall have a real and substantial meaning. A mystic formula, which may be interpreted in any specific instance as meaning whatever the interpreter chooses, is worse than nothing. We want to know what those fifteen eminent Americans really think about the closed shop—the province of its legitimate application, the dangers of its universal prevalence. We want a clear and firm recognition of certain rights of organized labor; but we want also an unmistakable assertion of the duties corresponding to these rights, and of the absolute supremacy of law. We want to have an authoritative statement of the limitations to which, in the opinion of the Conference, the right to strike ought to be subject, especially in the case of occupations in which a strike means paralysis of the essential activities of the community. We want a statement of the principles which determine when refusal to arbitrate a dispute is to be regarded as an offense against the public good and against public morals.

However well this work may be done, it is idle to expect that it will bring to a sudden end the age-long controversy over the "rights of labor." But it is not too much to hope that it may bring about real progress, and tend greatly to diminish the frequency and the duration of industrial conflicts. To quote Secretary Lane again, we "want to see a new conference of leading minds that will think in practical terms, a real council of national defence against the kind of civil war which some seem to think another irrepressible conflict." So far as the crucial questions of controversy are concerned, to think in practical terms means, above all, to think in such a way that the practical intent and working of your conclusions shall be fairly evident; the trouble about the resolution offered in the recent Conference was that it was an attempt to cover by a few smooth words a difficulty that all men know to be too deep-seated for such treatment. As understood by many, perhaps most, of the delegates, it would make almost no change in existing relations; but in the opinion of one of the leading members of the employers' group its real purpose was "to force, if possible, the hundreds of thousands of employers in industries throughout the country to recognize the labor unions whether they will or will not." In the findings of the new conference, there must be no possibility of such confusion of counsel. If it thinks "in practical terms," it will not only promote many particular schemes of amelioration, but will do at least something to clarify thought, and promote good understanding, even on the most critical of controversial issues.

But the men chosen for this task must frankly face the fact that its difficulties are real, and not due merely to wanton perversity. To ascribe the trouble wholly to the failure of men to look at things in the right spirit is an error as fatal as the opposite error of regarding the trouble as being immovably rooted in the everlasting nature of things. If the idea that nothing is possible leads to paralysis, the idea that everything is possible leads to futility.

When the Public Strikes

WE are beginning to hear from the Third Estate—the public. Its gigantic outlines are beginning to define themselves, the giant's strength is tugging at its hamperings, it gives forth mutterings indicating that it will shortly be broad awake. Enceladus is getting ready to arise. Only now and then in the history of the world has the usually good-natured giant cast off his chains. The rest of the time he is a good deal of a butt, gladly suffering plausible fools to an extent that incurs the contempt of some high-minded people who forget to praise him for his ultimate wisdom in refusing to be led to his own destruction. He has been fooled so often that he has developed a kind of skeptical caution that makes him slow to correct abuses, in the hope that they will somehow correct themselves, and equally slow to embark upon hopeful experiment lest the last state prove worse than the first. It is only in the long run that the public is either wise or strong.

But the longest run comes some time to an end. At such rare times in the past, the public has become effectively conscious of itself. It has realized that it exists by virtue of no mere mythological or philosophical license of speech. It has seen clearly that it is no mere huge residuum, helpless and unorganized, the result of an elimination of all small, well-defined classes that know exactly what they want and propose to get it. The public is no such No Man's Land over which opposing forces contend. It is not defined by negation—it comprises all those people who are able and willing to live a life of their own with a decent regard for the rights of others to do the same. It has its enemies, and now and then it feels bound to take notice of them, to destroy them, usually by somewhat drastically educating them—and itself.

The public has long recognized its criminally-minded enemies, and it is gradually learning how to deal with them. It once found its enemies in kings, and it spent a good deal of effort toward limiting the harm that kings could do, even if in the process it has not yet wholly learned to govern itself. It again recognized its enemy in ecclesiastical oppression and it proceeded to put the church, if not where it belonged, at least out of the places where it did not belong. It recognized an enemy in human slavery and it destroyed it. The public does not often strike, but when it does it strikes hard and at the big and obvious thing.

With one of these rare crises the public is faced to-day. In the struggle between "capital" and "labor" it is giving signs that it is no longer minded to play the disastrous rôle of innocent bystander. It has a stake in the game and it proposes to see fair play and some observance of the rules. In such a contest it is natural that the public should find itself in sympathy with much on both sides. It is itself composed almost entirely of people who labor—all such naturally wish to see so much general improvement of the conditions of life as may be possible. At the same time, it realizes that a civilization which may be broadly defined as "capitalistic" is the only one that can supply it with a life that a human being would find tolerable, furnish it with food and shelter and the joys of the chase that reside in the pursuit of happiness. It values a constitution which guarantees the right to play the game, but it would gravely distrust a constitution which pretended to assure each individual that he would win it. Realizing all this, it has for some time set itself the task of educating "capital." It has made a good deal of progress, setting metes and bounds in various directions, and finally inducing in the mind of "capital" a willingness, an eagerness almost, to clear away the many remediable faults that remain. Capital has grown aware of the existence of a public and begins to defer to it. But there has been as yet no sign that "labor" recognizes the existence of a public. Quite evidently the public has now in its hands the task of educating "labor."

Just as the public is very far from feeling hostility to "capital" as an institution, finding indeed its sole hope in it and its objection only to certain practices and men who take advantage of these practices to the public's detriment, so it cannot possibly regard "labor" as in itself an enemy, since most of the public themselves labor. But in certain practices of "labor" and in certain men who turn these practices to public disadvantage it now clearly recognizes its enemies. Its mind is growing clear on several points. The Boston police strike defined in its mind one point beyond which the right to strike does not extend. The steel strike convinced it that it could not afford to tolerate on the part of a few revolutionary minded leaders an assertion of power which they did not possess but hoped out of the resulting turmoil to obtain. It put up with a transportation strike in New York for one day, but to trust to that tolerance another time would be rash. Toward the threats of the future it is beginning to set a very determined face. How is the game to go on if one little group after another picks up its toys and goes home? The public proposes to see that the game goes on. It is not in the least inclined to listen to the few who want to get up a brand-new game.

But how is the public to teach these very elementary and obvious things to "labor," or rather how is it going to maintain an existence while "labor" is learning them for itself? At first glance the modern public does not appear very self-reliant; a too nearly complete specialization of functions has left it ill able to take care of itself. The British public, however, trained by the rigors of four years of war, gave a very good account of itself in the recent railway strike. The public at a pinch stepped in and did its own transporting. Our own problem is harder, distributed as we are over distances that are continental and with less of war's hardening discipline than has fallen to the lot of the European peoples. But the American people may as well make up their minds now to prepare for an emergency. It must learn to shift for itself in a pinch. It must be ready to mine its own coal, to transport its own materials, and above all to get along without those things which the stress of an emergency will render impossible of supply. It will be an arduous and costly business, but it offers the only means of persuading those who do not yet know of the existence of a public, or who under bad leadership have defied it, to resume with full consciousness their place in it. The issues are not less than those of life and death, and life is worth having at the cost of a little sharp discipline endured with perfect confidence of ultimate success. When the public stands ready to strike it strikes once and strikes no more—at least for a very long time. All its members—and that means almost everybody in the country—earnestly hope it will not have to strike at all.

The Treaty Still in Danger

THE Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate has brought in a mass of reservations bristling with all manner of difficulties, many of them breathing a spirit of hostility to the proposed League of Nations, and some of them calculated to rob it of all efficacy. It is of course impossible to claim for these reservations what had all along been claimed for those offered by Republican Senators who had declared their anxious desire to have the treaty ratified without subversive change, and who had shown how this could be effected while safeguarding our country against danger or injury. With these reservations adopted by a majority of the Senate, the alleged purpose of either the Republican leaders or the Administration forces to defeat the Treaty by preventing a two-thirds vote in its favor might well be regarded as an empty threat. Neither Mr. Lodge and his coadjutors on the Republican side, nor Mr. Hitchcock with the President behind him, could afford to go before the country as having wrecked the Treaty when so fair an opportunity had been presented of saving it.

Should anything like the Committee's fourteen reservations be adopted, the situation will be wholly different. If the Treaty should then fail for want of a two-thirds vote, the Democratic Senators who voted against it would be fully justified in placing the blame for failure upon the Republican marplots who had wantonly piled up needless and fatal obstacles to its adoption. And even if the two-thirds vote were obtained, the President could not be blamed for rejecting a result the acceptance of which would be an absolute stultification of his own repeated declarations.

In the event of such an outcome of the struggle in the Senate, the group of Republican Senators known as "mild reservationists" will be placed in a pitiful position. They will have failed to carry out the high purpose which they had avowed, to fulfil the great responsibility which clearly rested upon them. The programme of the Foreign Relations Committee, even with the amendments eliminated, flies in the face of all that Senators like McCumber and Kellogg and several others have stood for; and the programme can not be carried out if that group of Senators stand firm for what they believe to be right. But if they mean to stand firm, now is the time for them to make their intention unmistakably known, and thus forefend all sorts of possibilities of confusion and mischief.

The blame for failure, if failure there is to be, will not rest primarily, however, upon the moderate reservationists. It will rest upon them only in as much as it has been in their power to compel success in the face of wofully bad policy both on the Administration and on the anti-Administration side. Mr. Lodge has managed to unite in his leadership what might be thought the almost incompatible faults of indecision and truculence; he has combined a maximum of offensiveness with a minimum of definite purpose. And the Administration side has shown an utter failure to realize the necessity of obtaining by a reasonable spirit of compromise and coöperation the aid of those without whose help it has been plain from the beginning that success was impossible.

Nor should another unfortunate factor in the case be left out of account. Among the thick-and-thin supporters of Mr. Wilson, opposition to the Covenant has been represented as inspired solely by partisan or personal malice, and has been contemptuously dismissed as sure to prove a mere bluff in the end. This has been as mischievous in its practical effect as it has been at variance with the truth. Throughout the country there are many men as high-minded, as sincere, and as competent as any advocate of the Covenant, who are profoundly convinced that it involves dangers that outweigh the evils which even outright rejection of the Treaty would involve. To brand all its opponents in the Senate as partisan or malignant is as gross a libel as it would be to place a like brand upon its supporters. These tactics have accomplished nothing whatever in the way of breaking down criticism, but have unquestionably served to intensify resentment and to stiffen opposition. The time is not yet, however, for casting up accounts; what is wanted at the moment is action, irrespective of who is to blame for the difficulties and perplexities of the situation.

When the Dew is on the Corn

THE Daylight-Saving law, a happy by-product of the war, was repealed by the votes of Congressmen who explained their action as due to pressure from the farmer. Farm workers of to-day, we are told, will not be dragged into the fields while wheat and corn are still dripping with the dew. How old-time farmers, lured into city life during the past twenty or thirty years, must rub their eyes and look again as they read all this in the morning paper! The farmer, shivering at the thought of the dew, unwilling to set his foot on the grass until sure that his shoes will not be dampened! What a contrast with the time when, as a boy, you hiked over the pasture-field looking among clumps of pawpaw bushes for old Selim, long before rosy-fingered Aurora shot the hill-tops with her shafts of gold. If his erratic grazing drew you under the honey-locusts in the still imperfect light, you might even have to sit down in the dew and extract a thorn from your foot, like the boy who has come down to us in bronze from some thorny field of the old Mediterranean world, though minus his sculptural dignity and plus a more comprehensive outfit of clothes. And after you had caught your horse and curried him, eaten your breakfast and reached the field with the double-shovel cultivator of that day, there was still dew enough on the corn to soak through your shirt and trickle down your sides as you went back and forth between the rows. If you had not appeared until the dew was gone, your neighbors would have thought something wrong.

In time of hay harvest, in those days, the ring of whetstone on scythe, or the clatter of the mowing-machine if your field was fairly level, was often heard while the moon still had power to throw a shadow. If you used the scythe, you knew how much more easily the stems were snipped while still soft with the dew and the larger the amount down at an early hour, the more you got from the curving rays of the sun in the heat of the day. In berrying season, the big and little sisters of the household were out in the briar-lined gullies as soon as there was light enough to tell a ripe berry from a green one, and back in the kitchen with their pails full for the jam jars, long before the sun was high enough to draw the dew either from the berry bushes or from its secondary lodging in their hair and dresses. The farm clock of that earlier day could have been adjusted with little violence to such mild legislation as has just been repealed. If not a daylight saver by instinct, it was so by compulsion. It was generally well ahead of sun time, and if not so nicely geared as to run precisely twenty-four hours to the solar day, the discrepancy was not usually on the side of laziness. To its initial handicap allowance was added the fact that the regular time for the dinner horn was about the hour of eleven. And if the housewife wanted to go to town in the afternoon, it might have emergency aid in reaching that hour. The attitude of the old-time farmer and his family to the time-piece was about as irreverent as that of the old Roman, who bluntly said, "My belly is my clock. It tells me when dinner-time comes."

The question most troublesome to the farmer visiting his city relatives in the past was what to do with the seemingly interminable space between daybreak and the call to breakfast. Lying awake in bed so long was an impossibility, developed from lifelong habit. Nor was he trained to enjoy sitting in a room and looking at windows across the street, or reading the Ladies Home Journal, or some volume of O. Henry or H. G. Wells which he might find on the table. If he could find his way from bedroom to door without too much danger of inciting a burglar alarm, he was more likely to solve the problem by a stroll through the streets, with a stop at some all-night restaurant, where ham and eggs, or buck-wheat cakes and sausage, might prepare the way for "breakfast" two hours later. But now it is the city clamoring for early hours, and restoring by local ordinance the daylight-saving repealed by Congress under pressure from the farm, where the toiler is unwilling to dampen his apparel with the moisture of dewy morn. Is the scene to be reversed? Will the city girl, on vacation at the farm, be seen soaking her skirts in the early dew in search of peaches or berries with which to quiet the complaints of her stomach until her country cousins announce the eight-thirty coffee and rolls? Or will she stay in her room and try to read the National Stockman or the Poultry-Breeders' Gazette until the hour when one can be seen out of bed on the farm without losing social caste?

In early Spring, or "when the frost is on the pumpkin," the dew is of course a little chilly. But the old-time farmer simply threw in a little more physical exertion, racing with his comrades, perhaps, to see who could put up the most corn-shocks, ten hills square, before the call of the dinner horn. The chill of the dew was met and routed by the steaming sweat of toil. But the Corn-cutters' Union would object to that, and it might be necessary now to keep up a fire at each end of the field, or furnish each cutter with something like the fur-and-leather outfit of the aviator, if corn must be cut in a temperature under forty degrees Fahrenheit. Otherwise the horrible sufferings of the tiller of the soil might bring some Foster from afar to the rescue with a general strike, and a demand for a four-hour farm day, beginning at ten o'clock.

We do not know the identity of the maiden to whom George Darley addressed his "Morning-song," nearly a century ago. She was in the country at the "dramatic date" of the effusion, as he bids her "behold how the early lark springs from the corn"; but no one who knows the older farm life and reads the verses through will mistake her for a genuine country girl. But now that even the hired hand refuses to wet his toes in the morning dew, the rural swain may perhaps fitly appear under the farm-house window at about 9 A. M., and sing to her who in an earlier day would have had the cows milked a good three hours past, the words of the closing stanza:

Then wake thee, my Lady-love!
Bird of my bower!
The sweetest and sleepest
Bird at this hour!

In remote spots among the hills, "Dad" may still get out and pole his lima beans before sun-up, and the boys jump from their beds by five o'clock, otherwise if not voluntarily. "In the by and large," however, with both houses of Congress afraid to ask the farmer to move up his clock in Summer, for fear of suggesting his presence in the field while yet the dew is on the corn, who shall say that the tiller of the soil is too stolid to change? At present, in his opposition to what others regard as a notable achievement of social progress, his attitude is just a little irritating. But in abandoning his old-time early rising, due to centuries of inherited habit, he has shown his ability to change. In time, perhaps, he will come the complete circle, and get back to early hours again by the route of a culturally implanted desire to get out, if not in his corn-field, at least in his automobile, and enjoy the sensuous charms of "incense-breathing morn." By that time, however, some other class may discover a grievance in "daylight-saving," and Congress will fly the track again. After all, we may be doomed to find that nothing short of a world war can unite us all in support of the easy trick of outwitting our traditional horology by forcing the helpless hands of the clock to point to six when it is really only five.

An Artists' Haven

MR. LOUIS TIFFANY has devoted his Long Island estate, with a generous endowment, to be an artists' home. There is no intention to found a school. Only residents who already have their rudiments will be admitted. Confidence is placed in the value of congenial association, of a dignified and relatively care-free manner of life, in withdrawal from confusion, and in access to the founder's rich collections of decorative art.

As the benefaction of an accomplished artist who is also a successful man of affairs, the gift is significant. Few living artists have touched the whole field of the arts and crafts at so many points as Mr. Tiffany. An excellent painter, an inventor of iridescent glass, a master decorator, Mr. Tiffany has had in his immediate employ famous painters and sculptors, capable journeyman artisans, young students, amateurs—everybody who in any degree can make or choose a fine object. Probably few men of our time have had so vividly, concretely, and continuously before them the whole problem of the artist in the modern world. His gift has behind it the weight and the grace of experience.

One need not be a fanatical Malthusian to see that social problems thicken with the mere growth of population. We have learned sooner to think in millions than to live wisely in them. Especially has the mere bigness of the world pressed on the artist. It has put him at arm's length from his patron, has necessitated costly and cumbersome mediation by dealers, has unhappily isolated the artist or made him perform more exceptional

